TO THE

Right Honorable and his ſingular good Lord,

Sir William Cecill, Baron of Burghleygh, Knight of the moſt noble order of the Garter, Lord high Treaſurer of England, Maiſter of the Courts of Wards and Liueries, and one of the Queenes Maieſties priuie Councell.

COnſidering with my ſelfe, right Honorable and my ſingular good Lord, how redie (no doubt) manie will be to accuſe me of vaine preſumption, for enterpriſing to deale in this ſo weightie a worke, and ſo far aboue my reach to accompliſh: I haue thought good to aduertiſe your Honour, by what occaſion I was firſt induced to vndertake the ſame, although the cauſe that moued me thereto hath (in part) yer this beene ſignified vnto your good Lordſhip.

Whereas therefore, that worthie Citizen Reginald Wolfe late Printer to the Queenes Maieſtie, a man well knowne and beholden to your Honour, meant in his life time to publiſh an vniuerſall Coſmographie of the whole world, and therwith alſo certaine particular hiſtories of euery knowne nation, amongſt other whom he purpoſed to vſe for performance of his intent in that behalfe, he procured me to take in hand the collection of thoſe hiſtories, and hauing proceeded ſo far in the ſame, as little wanted to the accompliſhment of that long promiſed worke, it pleaſed God to call him to his mercie, after fiue and twentie yeares trauell ſpent therein; ſo that by his vntimelie deceaſſe, no hope remained to ſee that performed, which we had ſo long trauelled about. Neuertheleſſe, thoſe whom he put in truſt to diſpoſe his things after his departure hence, wiſhing to the benefit of others, that ſome fruit might follow of that whereabout he had imployed ſo long time, willed me to continue mine endeuour for their furtherance in the ſame. Which although I was redie to doo, ſo far as mine abilitie would reach, and the rather to anſwere that truſt which the deceaſſed repoſed in me, to ſee it brought to ſome perfection: yet when the volume grew ſo great, as they that were to defraie the charges for the impreſſion, were not willing to go through with the whole, they reſolued firſt to publiſh the hiſtories of England, Scotland, and Ireland, with their deſcriptions; which deſcriptions, bicauſe they were not in ſuch readineſſe, as thoſe of forren countries, they were inforced to vſe the helpe of other better able to doo it than my ſelfe.

Moreouer, the Charts, wherein Maiſter Wolfe ſpent a great part of his time, were not found ſo complet as we wiſhed: and againe, vnderſtanding of the great charges and notable enterpriſe of that worthie Gentleman maiſter Thomas Sackford, in procuring the Charts of the ſeuerall prouinces of this realme to be ſet foorth, we are in hope that in time he will delineate this whole land ſo perfectlie, as ſhall be comparable or beyond anie delineation heretofore made of anie other region; and therefore leaue that to his well deſerued praiſe. If any well willer will imitate him in ſo praiſeworthie a worke for the two other regions, we will be glad to further his endeuour with all the helpes we may.

The hiſtories I haue gathered according to my skill, and conferred the greateſt part with Maiſter Wolfe in his life time, to his liking, who procured me ſo manie helpes to the furtherance thereof, that I was loth to omit anie thing that might increaſe the readers knowledge, which cauſeth the booke to grow ſo great. But receiuing them by parts, and at ſeuerall times (as I might get them) it may be, that hauing had more regard to the matter than the apt penning, I haue not ſo orderlie diſpoſed them, as otherwiſe I ought; chooſing rather to want order, than to defraud the reader of that which for his further vnderſtanding might ſeeme to ſatisfie his expectation.

I therefore moſt humblie beſeech your Honour to accept theſe Chronicles of England vnder your protection, and according to your wiſedome and accuſtomed benignitie to beare with my faults; the rather, bicauſe you were euer ſo eſpeciall good Lord to Maiſter Wolfe, to whom I was ſingularlie beholden; and in whoſe name I humblie preſent this rude worke vnto you, beſeeching God, that as he hath made you an inſtrument to aduance his truth, ſo it may pleaſe him to increaſe his good gifts in you, to his glorie, the furtherance of the Queenes Maieſties ſeruice, and the comfort of all hir faithfull and louing ſubiects.

Your Honours moſt humble to be commanded,

RAPHAEL HOLINSHED.

THE PREFACE

to the reader.

IT is dangerous (gentle reader) to range in ſo large a field as I haue here vndertaken, while ſo manie ſundrie men in diuers things may be able to controll me, and manie excellent wits of our countrie (as well or better occupied I hope) are able herein to ſurpaſſe me; but ſeeing the beſt able doo ſeeme to neglect it, let me (though leaſt able) craue pardon to put them in mind not to forget their natiue countries praiſe (which is their dutie) the incouragement of their woorthie countriemen, by elders aduancements; and the daunting of the vicious, by foure penall examples, to which end (as I take it) chronicles and hiſtories ought cheefelie to be written. My labour may ſhew mine vttermoſt good will, of the more learned I require their further enlargement, and of fault-finders diſpenſation till they be more fullie informed. It is too common that the leaſt able are readieſt to find fault in matters of leaſt weight, and therefore I eſteeme the leſſe of their carping, but humblie beſeech the ſkilfull to ſupplie my want, and to haue care of their dutie; and either to amend that wherein I haue failed, or be content with this mine endeuour. For it may pleaſe them to conſider, that no one can be eie-witneſſe to all that is written within our time; much leſſe to thoſe things which happened in former times, and therefore muſt be content with reports of others. Therein I haue beene ſo carefull, that I haue ſpared no paines or helpe of freends to ſearch out either written or printed ancient authors, or to inquire of moderne eie-witneſſes for the true ſetting downe of that which I haue here deliuered: but I find ſuch want in writers for the neceſſarie knowledge of things doone in times paſt, and lacke of meanes to obteine ſufficient inſtructions by reporters of the time preſent; and herewith the worthie exploits of our countriemen ſo manie, that it greeueth me I could not leaue the ſame to poſteritie (as I wiſhed) to their well deſerued praiſe. But I haue here imparted what I could learne, and craue that it may be taken in good part. My ſpeech is plaine, without any rhetoricall ſhew of eloquence, hauing rather a regard to ſimple truth, than to decking words. I wiſh I had beene furniſhed with ſo perfect inſtructions, and ſo many good gifts, that I might haue pleaſed all kinds of men, but that ſame being ſo rare a thing in any one of the beſt, I beſeech thee (gentle reader) not to looke for it in me the meaneſt.

But now for thy further inſtruction, to vnderſtand the courſe of theſe my labours. Firſt concerning the hiſtorie of England, as I haue collected the ſame out of manie and ſundrie authors, in whome what contrarietie, negligence, and raſhneſſe ſometime is found in their reports; I leaue to the diſcretion of thoſe that haue peruſed their works: for my part, I haue in things doubtfull rather choſen to ſhew the diuerſitie of their writings, than by ouer-ruling them, and vſing a peremptorie cenſure, to frame them to agree to my liking: leauing it neuertheleſſe to each mans iudgement, to controll them as he ſeeth cauſe. If ſome-where I ſhew my fanſie what I thinke, and that the ſame diſlike them; I craue pardon, ſpeciallie if by probable reaſons or plainer matter to be produced, they can ſhew mine errour; vpon knowledge whereof I ſhall be readie to reforme it accordinglie. Where I doo begin the hiſtorie from the firſt inhabitation of this Ile, I looke not to content ech mans opinion concerning the originall of them that firſt peopled it, and no maruell: for in matters ſo vncerteine, if I cannot ſufficientlie content my ſelfe (as in deed I cannot) I know not how I ſhould ſatiſfie others. That which ſeemeth to me moſt likelie, I haue noted, beſeeching the learned (as I truſt they will) in ſuch points of doubtfull antiquities to beare with my ſkill: ſith for ought I know, the matter is not yet decided among the learned, but ſtill they are in controuerſie about it, and as yet Sub iudice lis eſt. Well, howſoeuer it came firſt to be inhabited, likelie it is, that at the firſt the whole Ile was vnder one prince and gouernour, though afterwards (and long peraduenture before the Romans ſet any foot within it) the monarchie thereof was broken, euen when the multitude of the inhabitants grew to be great, and ambition entred amongſt them: which hath brought ſo manie good policies and ſtates to ruine and decaie.

The Romans hauing once got poſſeſſion of the continent that faceth this Ile, could not reſt (as it appeareth) till they had brought the ſame alſo vnder their ſubiection: and the ſooner doubtleſſe, by reaſon of the factions amongſt the princes of the land, which the Romans (through their accuſtomed ſkill) could turne verie well to their moſt aduantage. They poſſeſſed it almoſt fiue hundreth yeares, and longer might haue doone, if either their inſufferable tyrannie had not taken awaie from them the loue of the people, as well here as elſe-where; either that their ciuill diſcord about the chopping and changing of their emperours had not ſo weakened the forces of their empire, that they were not able to defend the ſame againſt the irruption of barbarous nations. But as we may coniecture by that which is found in hiſtories, about that time, in which the Romane empire began to decline, this land ſtood in verie weake ſtate: being ſpoiled of the moſt part of all hir able men, which were led awaie into forren regions, to ſupplie the Romane armies; and likewiſe (perhaps) of all neceſſarie armour, weapon, and treaſure: which being perceiued of the Saxons, after they were receiued into the Ile, to aid the Britons againſt the Scots and Picts then inuading the ſame, miniſtred to them occaſion to attempt the ſecond conqueſt, which at length they brought to paſſe, to the ouerthrow not onelie of the Britiſh dominion, but alſo to the ſubuerſion of the Chriſtian religion here in this land: which chanced (as appeareth by Gildas) for the wicked ſins and vnthankefulneſſe of the inhabitants towards God, the cheefe occaſions and cauſes of the tranſmutations of kingdoms, Nam propter peccata, regna tranſmutantur à gente in gentem.

The Saxons obteining poſſeſſion of the land, gouerned the ſame, being diuided into ſundrie kingdoms, and hauing once ſubdued the Britons, or at the leaſt-wiſe remooued them out of the moſt part of the Ile into od corners and mountaines, fell at diuiſion among themſelues, and oftentimes with warre purſued ech other, ſo as no perfect order of gouernement could be framed, nor the kings grow to any great puiſſance, either to mooue warres abroad, or ſufficientlie to defend themſelues againſt forren forces at home: as manifeſtlie was perceiued, when the Danes and other the Northeaſterne people, being then of great puiſſance by ſea, began miſerablie to afflict this land: at the firſt inuading as it were but onelie the coaſts and countries lieng neere to the ſea, but afterwards with maine armies they entred into the midle parts of the land. And although the Engliſh people at length came vnder one king, and by that meanes were the better able to reſiſt the enimies; yet at length thoſe Danes ſubdued the whole, and had poſſeſſion thereof for a time, although not long, but that the crowne returned againe to thoſe of the Saxon line: till ſhortlie after, by the inſolent dealings of the gouernours, a diuiſion was made betwixt the king and his people, through iuſt puniſhment decreed by the prouidence of the Almightie, determining for their ſinnes and contempt of his lawes, to deliuer them into the hands of a ſtranger; and therevpon when ſpite and enuie had brought the title in doubt, to whom the right in ſucceſſion apperteined, the Conquerour entred, and they remained a prey to him and his: who plucked all the heads and cheefe in authoritie ſo cleerelie vp by the roots, as few or none of them in the end was left to ſtand vp againſt him. And herewith altering the whole ſtate, he planted ſuch lawes and ordinances as ſtood moſt for his auaile and ſecuritie, which being after qualified with more milde and gentle lawes, tooke ſuch effect, that the ſtate hath euer ſithens continued whole and vnbroken by wiſe and politike gouernement, although diſquieted ſometime by ciuill diſſention, to the ruine commonlie of the firſt moouers, as by the ſequele of the hiſtorie you may ſee.

For the hiſtorie of Scotland, I haue for the more part followed Hector Boece, Iohannes Maior, and Iouan Ferreri Piemonteſe, ſo far as they haue continued it, interlaced ſomtimes with other authours as Houeden, Fourdon, and ſuch like; although not often, bicauſe I meant rather to deliuer what I found in their owne hiſtories extant, than to correct them by others, leauing that enterpriſe to their owne countrimen: ſo that whatſoeuer ye read in the ſame, conſider that a Scotiſhman writ it, and an Engliſhman hath but onelie tranſlated it into our language, referring the reader to the Engliſh hiſtorie, in all matters betwixt vs and them, to be confronted therewith as he ſeeth cauſe. For the continuation thereof I vſed the like order, in ſuch copies and notes as Maiſter Wolfe in his life time procured me; ſauing that in theſe laſt yeares I haue inſerted ſome ſuch notes as concerned matters of warre betwixt vs and the Scots, bicauſe I got them not till that part of the Engliſh hiſtorie was paſt the preſſe.

For Ireland, I haue ſhewed in mine epiſtle dedicatorie in what ſort, and by what helps I haue proceeded therein; onelie this I forgot to ſignifie, that I had not Giraldus Cambrenſis, and Flatſburie, vntill that part of the booke was vnder the preſſe, and ſo being conſtreined to make poſt haſt, I could not exemplifie what I would out of them all, neither yet diſpoſe it ſo orderlie as had beene conuenient, nor pen it with ſo apt words as might ſatisfie either my ſelfe, or thoſe to whoſe view it is now like to come. And by reaſon of the like haſte made in the impreſſion, where I was determined to haue tranſpoſed the moſt part of that which in the Engliſh hiſtorie I had noted, concerning the conqueſt of Ireland by Hen. the ſecond, out of Houeden & others, I had not time thereto; and ſo haue left it there remaining where I firſt noted it, before I determined to make any particular collection of the Iriſh hiſtories, bicauſe the ſame commeth there well inough in place, as to thoſe that ſhall vouchſafe to turne the booke it may appeare.

For the computation of the yeares of the world, I had by Maiſter Wolfes aduiſe followed Functius; but after his deceaſſe, M. W. H. made me partaker of a Chronologie, which he had gathered and compiled with moſt exquiſit diligence, following Gerardus Mercator, and other late Chronologers, and his owne obſeruations, according to the which I haue reformed the ſame. As for the yeares of our Lord, and the kings, I haue ſet them downe according to ſuch authors as ſeeme to be of beſt credit in that behalfe, as I doubt not but to the learned and ſkilfull in hiſtories it ſhall appeare. Moreouer, this the reader hath to conſider, that I doo begin the yeare at the natiuitie of our Lord, which is the ſureſt order (in my fanſie) that can be followed.

For the names of perſons, townes, and places, as I haue beene diligent to reforme the errours of other (which are to be aſcribed more to the vnperfect copies than to the authors) ſo may it be that I haue ſome-where committed the like faults, either by negligence or want of skill to reſtore them to their full integritie as I wiſhed. But what I haue performed, aſwell in that behalfe as others, the ſkilfull reader ſhall eaſily perceiue, and withall conſider (I truſt) what trauell I haue beſtowed to his behoofe in this huge volume; crauing onelie, that in recompenſe thereof he will iudge the beſt, and to make a freendlie conſtruction of my meaning, where ought may ſeeme to haue eſcaped my pen or the printers preſſe, otherwiſe than we could haue wiſhed for his better ſatiſfaction. Manie things being taken out as they lie in authors, may be thought to giue offenſe in time preſent, which referred to the time paſt when the author writ, are not onelie tollerable, but alſo allowable. Therefore (good reader) I beſeech thee to weigh the cauſes and circumſtances of ſuch faults and imperfections, and conſider that the like may creepe into a far leſſe volume than this, and ſhew me ſo much fauour as hath beene ſhewed to others in like cauſes. And ſithens I haue doone my good will, accept the ſame, as I with a free and thankefull mind doo offer it thee; ſo ſhall I thinke my labour well beſtowed. For the other hiſtories, which are alreadie collected, if it pleaſe God to giue abilitie, ſhall in time come to light, with ſome ſuch breefe deſcriptions of the forren regions whereof they treat, as may the better ſuffice to the readers contentation, and vnderſtanding of the matters conteined in the ſame hiſtories, reduced into abridgements out of their great volumes. And thus I ceaſſe further to trouble thy patience, wiſhing to thee (gentle reader) ſo much profit, as by reading may be had, and as great comfort as Gods holie ſpirit may endue thee with.

FINIS.

The politike Conqueſt of William the firſt.

Anno. 1.

THis William Duke of Normandie, baſe ſon of Robert the firſt Duke of Normandie, and nephew vnto Edward King of England, ſurnamed the Confeſſor, hauing vanquiſhed the Engliſh power, and ſlaine Harold in the field (as you may read at large towards the end of the hiſtorie of England) began his reigne ouer England the xv. daie of October being ſundaie, in the yeare after the creation of the world 5033. (as W. Hariſon gathereth) and after the birth of our Sauiour 1066. which was in the tenth yeare of the emperour Henrie the fourth, in the firſt of pope Alexander the ſecond, in the firſt of Philip king of France, and about the tenth of Malcolme the third, ſurnamed Camoir, king of Scotland.

Sim. Dun.

Immediatlie after he had thus got the victorie in a pight field (as before ye haue heard) he firſt returned to Haſtings, and after ſet forward towards London, waſted the countries of Suſſex, Kent, Hamſhire, Southerie, Middleſex, and Herefordſhire, burning the townes, and ſleaing the people, till he came to Beorcham. In the meane time, immediatlie after the diſcomfiture in Suſſex, the two earles of Northumberland and Mercia, Edwin and Marchar, who had withdrawne themſelues from the battell togither with their people, came to London, and with all ſpeed ſent their ſiſter quéene Aldgitha vnto the citie of Cheſter, and herewith ſought to perſuade the Londoners to aduance one of them to the kingdome: as Wil. Mal. writeth. But Simon of Durham ſaith, that Aldred archbiſhop of Yorke, and the ſaid earles with others would haue made Edgar Etheling king. Howbeit, whileſt manie of the Nobilitie and others prepared to make themſelues redie to giue a new battell to the Normans (how or whatſoeuer was the cauſe) the ſaid earles drew homewards with their powers, to the great diſcomfort of their fréends. Wil. Malm. ſéemeth to put blame in the biſhops, for that the lords went not forward with their purpoſe in aduancing Edgar Etheling to the crowne. For the biſhops (ſaith he) refuſed to ioine with the lords in that behalfe, and ſo through enuie and ſpite which one part bare to another, when they could not agrée vpon an Engliſhman, they receiued a ſtranger, inſomuch that vpon king William his comming vnto Beorcham, Aldred archbiſhop of Yorke, Wolſtane biſhop of Worceſter, and Walter biſhop of Hereford, Edgar Etheling, and the foreſaid earles Edwin and Marchar came and ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, whom he gentlie receiued, and incontinentlie made an agréement with them, taking their oth and hoſtages (as ſome write) and yet neuertheleſſe he permitted his people to ſpoile and burne the countrie.

The archbiſhop of yorke & other ſubmit themſelues to king William.

But now, when the feaſt of Chriſts natiuitie (commonlie called Chriſtmas) was at hand, he approched to the citie of London, and comming thither, cauſed his vauntgard firſt to enter into the ſtréets, where finding ſome reſiſtance, he eaſilie ſubdued the citizens that thus tooke vpon them to withſtand him, though not without ſome bloudſhed (as Gemeticen. writeth) but as by others it ſhould appéere, he was receiued into the citie without anie reſiſtance at all; and ſo being in poſſeſſion thereof, he ſpake manie fréendlie words to the citizens, and promiſed that he would vſe them in moſt liberall & courteous maner. Not long after, when things were brought in order (as was thought requiſite) he was crowned king vpon Chriſtmas daie following, by Aldred archbiſhop of Yorke. For he would not receiue the crowne at the hands of Stigand archbiſhop of Canturburie, bicauſe he was hated, and furthermore iudged to be a verie lewd perſon and a naughtie liuer.

Gemeticenſis.

William Conquerour crowned 1067. according to their account which begin the yeare on the daie of Chriſt his natiuitie.

At his coronation he cauſed the biſhops and barons of the realme to take their oth, that they ſhould be his true and loiall ſubiects (according to the maner in that caſe accuſtomed.) And being required thereto by the archbiſhop of Yorke, he tooke his perſonall oth before the altar of S. Peter at Weſtmiſter, to defend the holie church, and rulers of the ſame, to gouerne the people in iuſtice as became a king to doo, to ordeine righteous lawes ⁊ kéepe the ſame, ſo that all maner of bribing, rapine, and wrongfull iudgements ſhould for euer after be aboliſhed.

After this, he tooke order how to kéepe the realme in good and quiet gouernment, fortifieng the neceſſarie places, and furniſhing them with gariſons. He alſo appointed officers and councellers, ſuch as he thought to be wiſe and diſcréet men, and appointed ſhips to be in the hauens by the coaſt for the defenſe of the land, as he thought moſt expedient. After his coronation, or rather before (as by ſome authours it ſhould ſéeme) euen preſentlie vpon obteining of the citie of London, he tooke his iourney towards the caſtell of Douer, to ſubdue that and the reſt of Kent alſo: which when the archbiſhop Stigand and Egelſin the abbat of S. Auguſtines (being as it were the chiefeſt lords and gouernours of all Kent) did perceiue, and conſidered that the whole realme was in an euill ſtate; ⁊ that whereas in this realme of England, before the comming in of the forſaid duke William, there were no bondmen: now all, as well the Nobilitie as the Commonaltie were without reſpect made ſubiect to the intollerable bondage of the Normans, taking an occaſion by the perill and danger that their neighbours were in, to prouide for the ſafegard of them-

ſelues and their countrie. They cauſed all the people of the countie of Kent to aſſemble at Canturburie, and declared to them the perils and dangers imminent, the miſerie that their neighbours were come into, the pride and inſolencie of the Normans, and the hardneſſe and griefe of bondage and ſeruile eſtate. Whereupon all the people rather chooſing to end their vnfortunate life, than to ſubmit themſelues to an vnaccuſtomed yoke of ſeruitude and bondage, with a common conſent determined to méet duke William, and to fight with him for the lawes of their countrie. Alſo, the foreſaid Stigand the archbiſhop, and the abbat Egelſin, chooſing rather to die in battell, than to ſée their nation in ſo euill an eſtate, being encouraged by the examples of the holie Machabées, became capteins of the armie. And at a daie appointed, all the people met at Swaneſcombe, and being hidden in the woods, laie priuilie in wait for the comming of the foreſaid duke William.

Now, bicauſe it cannot hurt to take great héed, and to be verie warie in ſuch caſes, they agréed before hand, that when the duke was come, and the paſſages on euerie ſide ſtopped, to the end he ſhould no waie be able to eſcape, euerie one of them, as well horſſemen as footmen ſhould beare boughes in their hands. The next daie after, when the duke was come into the fields and territories néere vnto Swaneſcombe, and ſaw all the countrie ſet and placed about him, as it had béene a ſtirring and mouing wood, and that with a meane pace they approched and drew neare vnto him, with great diſcomfort of mind he woondered at that ſight. And aſſoone as the capteins of the Kentiſhmen ſawe that duke William was incloſed in the middeſt of their armie, they cauſed their trumpets to be ſounded, their banners to be diſplaied, and threw downe their boughes, & with their bowes bent, their ſwords drawne, and their ſpeares and other kind of weapons ſtretched forth, they ſhewed themſelues readie to fight. Duke William and they that were with him ſtood (as no maruell it was) ſore aſtonied, and amazed: ſo that he which thought he had alreadie all England faſt in his fiſt, did now deſpaire of his owne life. Therefore on the behalfe of the Kentiſhmen, were ſent vnto duke William the archbiſhop Stigand, and Egelſin abbat of S. Auguſtines, who told him their meſſage in this ſort.

> My lord duke, behold the people of Kent come forth to méet you, and to receiue you as their liege lord, requiring at your hands the things which perteine to peace, and that vnder this condition; that all the people of Kent enioy for euer their ancient liberties, and may for euermore vſe the lawes and cuſtomes of the countrie: otherwiſe they are readie preſentlie to bid battell to you, and them that be with you, and are minded rather to die here altogither, than to depart from the lawes and cuſtomes of their countrie, and to ſubmit themſelues to bondage, whereof as yet they neuer had experience.

The duke ſéeing himſelfe to be driuen to ſuch an exigent & narrow pinch, conſulted a while with them that came with him, prudentlie conſidering, that if he ſhould take anie repulſe or diſpleaſure at the hands of this people, which be the key of England, all that he had done before ſhould be diſanulled and made of none effect, and all his hope and ſafetie ſhould ſtand in danger and ieopardie: not ſo willinglie as wiſelie he granted the people of Kent their requeſt. Now when the couenant was eſtabliſhed, and pledges giuen on both ſides: the Kentiſhmen being ioyfull, conducted the Normans (who alſo were glad) vnto Rocheſter, and yéelded vp to the duke the earledome of Kent, and the noble caſtell of Douer. Thus the ancient liberties of England, and the lawes and cuſtomes of the countrie, which before the comming of duke William out of Normandie, were equallie kept throughout all England, doo (through this induſtrie and earneſt trauell of the archbiſhop Stigand and Egelſin abbat of S. Auguſtines) remaine inuiolablie obſerued vntill this daie within that countie of Kent. ¶ Thus far Thomas Spot, and after him William Thorne writeth the ſame. Of the which the former (that is Spot) liued in the daies of king Edward the firſt, and William Thorne in the daies of king Richard the ſecond.

The ancient liberties and lawes of England remaine in Kent onlie.

Wil. Thorne.

But now, before we procéed anie further in recitall of the Conquerours doings, we haue here in a table noted all the noble capteins and gentlemen of name, aſwell Normans as other ſtrangers, which aſſiſted duke William in the conqueſt of this land: and firſt, as we find them written in the chronicles of Normandie by one William Tailleur.

Sim.Dunel.

When king William had ſet all things in order through the moſt part of the realme, he deliuered the guiding thereof vnto his brother Odo, the biſhop of Bayeux, and his coſine William Fits Oſborne, whom he had made erle of Hereford.

King william goeth ouer into Normandy
Hen. Hunt.
Polychron.
Sim.Dun.

In Lent following he ſailed into Normandie, leading with him the pledges, and other of the chéefeſt lords of the Engliſh nation: among whom, the two earles Edwine and Marchar, Stigand the archbiſhop, Edgar Etheling, Walteof ſonne to Siward ſometime duke of Northumberland, and Agelnothus the abbat of Glaſtenburie were the moſt famous.

Edricke Syluaticus.

Soone after his departing, Edricke ſurnamed Syluaticus, ſonne to Alfricke that was brother to Edricke de Streona, refuſing to ſubmit himſelfe vnto the king, rebelled and roſe againſt ſuch as he had left in his abſence to gouerne the land.

Richard Fits Scrope.

Wherevpon thoſe that laie in the caſtell of Hereford, as Richard Fitz Scrope and others, did oftentimes inuade his lands, and waſted the goods of his farmors and tenants: but yet ſo often as they attempted to inuade him, they loſt manie of their owne ſouldiers and men of war. Moreouer, the ſaid Edricke calling to his aid the kings of the Welſhmen, Bleothgent and Rithwall, about the feaſt of the aſſumption of our Ladie, waſted the countrie of Hereford, euen to the bridge of the riuer of Wye, and obteined out of thoſe quarters a maruellous great ſpoile.

The riuer of wye.
King william returneth into England.

In the winter alſo following, and after king William had diſpoſed his buſines in Normandie, he returned into England, and euen then began to handle the Engliſhmen ſomewhat ſharpelie, ſuppoſing thereby to kéepe them the more eaſilie vnder his obedience. He alſo tooke awaie from diuerſe of the Nobilitie, and others of the better ſort, all their liuings, and gaue the ſame to his Normans.

H. Hunt.

Moreouer, he raiſed great taxes and ſubſidies through the realme: nor any thing regarded th'Engliſh Nobilitie, ſo that they who before thought themſelues to be made for euer by bringing a ſtranger into the realme, doo now ſée themſelues troden vnder foot, to be deſpiſed, and to be mocked on all ſides, inſomuch that many of them were conſtreined (as it were for a further teſtimonie of ſeruitude and bondage) to ſhaue their beards, to round their heare, and to frame themſelues as well in apparell as in ſeruice and diet at their tables after the Norman manner, verie ſtrange and farre differing from the ancient cuſtomes and old vſages of their countrie.

Matth. Paris.

Others vtterlie refuſing to ſuſteine ſuch an intollerable yoke of thraldome as was dailie laid vpon them by the Normans, choſe rather to leaue all both goods and lands, & after the maner of outlawes got them to the woods, with their wiues, children, and ſeruants, meaning from thenceforth wholie to liue vpon the ſpoile of the countries adioining, and to take whatſoeuer came next to hand.

Engliſhmen withdraw them to the woods as outlawes.

Wherevpon it came to paſſe within a while, that no man might trauell in ſafetie from his owne houſe or towne to his next neighbors, and euery quiet and honeſt mans houſe became as it were an hold or fortreſſe furniſhed for defenſe with bowes and arrowes, bils, polaxes, ſwords, clubs and ſtaues, and other weapons; the doores kept locked and ſtronglie boulted in the night ſeaſon, for feare to be ſurpriſed as it had béene in time of open warre, and amongſt publike enimies. Praiers were ſaid alſo by the maiſter of the houſe, as though they had beene in the middeſt of the ſeas in ſome ſtormie tempeſt, and when the windowes or doores ſhould be ſhut in and cloſed, they vſed to ſaie Benedicite, and others to anſwer, Dominus, in like ſort as the preeſt and his penitent were woont to doo at confeſſion in the church.

Notwithſtanding all this, K. William ſought to tame & vanquiſh thoſe of the Engliſh Nobilitie, who would not be at his becke. They againe on the other ſide made themſelues ſtrong, the better to reſiſt him, chooſing for their cheefe capteines and leaders, the earles Edwine & Edgar Etheling, who valiantlie reſiſted the Normans, and ſlue many of them with great rage and crueltie. And as they thus proceeded in their matters, king William being a politike prince, forward and painefull in his buſineſſe, ſuffered them not altogither to eſcape cleere awaie, but did ſore annoy and put them oft to remediles loſſes, though he abode in the meane time many laborious iournies, ſlaughters of his people, and damages of his perſon. Herevpon the Engliſh Nobilitie euer after, yea in time of peace, were hated of the king and his Normans, and at length were kept ſo ſhort, that being mooued partlie with diſdaine, and partlie with dread, they got them out of the realme, ſome into Scotland, ſome into Denmarke, others into Norway; and among theſe, the two earles Edwine and Marchar, with certeine biſhops & others of the cleargie, beſides manie alſo of the temporaltie, eſcaped into Scotland. Marleſwine & Goſpatricke, with a great number of other the Nobles of Northumberland, Edgar Ethling with his mother Agatha, and his ſiſters Chriſtine and Margaret, chanced alſo to be driuen into Scotland by tempeſt, as they ſailed towards the coaſts of Germanie, purpoſing to haue returned into Hungarie, where the ſaid Edgar was borne: howbeit being arriued in Scotland, he found ſo friendlie entertainment there, that finallie Malcolme the third then king of that realme, tooke his ſiſter Margaret to wife, and Chriſtine became a nunne, as in the Scotiſh chronicles more plainelie dooth appeere. King William heereby perceiuing daily how vnwilling the Engliſhmen were to be vnder his obeiſance, was in feare of rebellious commotions; and therfore to ſubdue them the better, he builded foure caſtels, one at Notingham, another at Lincolne, the third at Yorke, and the fourth neere vnto Haſtings, where he landed at his firſt comming into England.

Moreouer, to reduce the Engliſh people the ſooner vnto obedience and awe, he tooke from them all their armour and weapons. He ordeined alſo that the maiſter of euerie houſhold about eight of the clocke in the euening, ſhould cauſe his fire to be raked vp in aſhes, his lights to be put out, and then go to bed. Beſides this, to the end that euerie man might haue knowledge of the houre to go to reſt, he gaue order, that in all cities, townes, and villages, where anie church was, there ſhould a bell be roong at the ſaid houre, which cuſtome is ſtill vſed euen vnto this daie, and commonlie called by the French word, Couer few, that is, Rake vp the fier.

Math. Weſt.

This yeare on Whitſunday, Maud the wife of king William was crowned Queene by Aeldred archbiſhop of Yorke. The ſame yeare alſo was Henrie his ſonne borne here in England: for his other two ſonnes Robert and William were borne in Normandie, before he had conquered this land. About the ſame time alſo, Goodwine and Edmund ſurnamed the great, the ſonnes of K. Harold, came from Ireland, and landing in Somerſetſhire, fought with Adnothus that had beene maiſter of their fathers horſſes, whom they ſlue, with a great number of others; and ſo hauing gotten this victorie, returned into Ireland, from whence they came with a great bootie which they tooke in their returne out of Cornewall, Deuonſhire, and other places thereabouts. In like maner, Exceſter did as then rebell, and likewiſe the countrie of Northumberland, wherevpon the king appointed one of his capteines named Robert Cumin, a right noble perſonage (but more valiant than circumſpect) to go againſt the northerne people with a part of his armie, whileſt he himſelfe and the other part went to ſubdue them of Exceſter: where, at his comming before the citie, the citizens prepared themſelues to defend their gates and wals: but after he began to make his approch to aſſaile them, part of the citizens repenting their fooliſh attempts, opened the gates, and ſuffered him to enter. Thus hauing ſubdued them of Exceſter, he greeuouſlie puniſhed the cheefe offendors. But the counteſſe Gita, the ſiſter of Sweine K. of Denmarke, and ſometime wife to earle Goodwine, and mother to the laſt K. Harold, with diuers other that were got into that citie, found meanes to flie, and ſo eſcaped ouer into Flanders. King William hauing paſſed his buſineſſe in ſuch wiſe in Deuonſhire, haſted backe towards Yorke, being aduertiſed in the waie, that the Northumbers hauing knowledge by their ſpials, that Robert generall of the Normans being come to Durham, did not ſo diligentlie cauſe watch and ward to be kept about the towne in the night ſeaſon as was requiſite, did ſet vpon him about midnight, & ſlue the ſame Robert with all his companie, ſo that of ſeauen hundred which he brought with him, there was but one that eſcaped to bring tidings to the king their ſoueraigne.

Edmund the great.

Simon Dun.

This chaunced the 28. of Ianuarie on a wedneſday.
Polydor.

He heard alſo, how Edgar Etheling at the ſame time, being in the countrie, riding abroad with a troope of horſemen, and hearing of the diſcomfiture of thoſe Normans, purſued them egerlie, and ſlue great numbers of them, as they were about to ſaue themſelues by flight, with which newes being in no ſmall furie, he made ſpeed forward, and comming at the laſt into Northumberland, he eaſilie vanquiſhed the foreſaid rebels, and putting the cheefe authors of this mutinie to death, he reſerued ſome of the reſt as captiues, and of other ſome he cauſed the hands to be chopped off in token of their inconſtancie and rebellious dealing. After this, he came to Yorke, and there in like ſort puniſhed thoſe that had aided Edgar, which doone, he returned to London.

Polydor.

In the meane time, thoſe Engliſhmen that were fled (as you haue heard) into Denmarke, by continuall ſute made to Sueine then king of that realme, to procure him to make a iournie into England for recouerie of the right deſcended to him from his anceſtors, at length obteined their purpoſe, in ſo much that king Sueine ſent his ſonnes Harold and Canutus toward England, who with a nauie of two hundred ſaile, in the companie of Oſborne their vncle, arriued in the mouth of Humber betweene the two later ladie daies, and there landing their people with the Engliſh outlawes, whom they had brought with them, they ſtraightwaies marched towards Yorke, waſting and ſpoiling the countrie with great crueltie as they paſſed. Soone after alſo came Edgar, and ſuch other Engliſh exiles as had before fled into Scotland, and ioined their forces with them. When the newes of theſe things were brought to Yorke, the people there were ſtriken with a maruellous feare, inſomuch that Aeldred the archbiſhop (through verie greefe and anguiſh of mind) departed this life. The Normans alſo which laie there in garriſon, after they vnderſtood by their ſpies that the enimies were come within two daies iournie of them, began not a little to miſtruſt the faith of the citizens, and bicauſe the ſuburbes ſhould not be any aid vnto them, they ſet fire on the ſame, which by the hugeneſſe of the wind that ſuddenlie aroſe, the flame became ſo big, and mounted ſuch a height, that it caught the citie alſo, and conſumed a great part thereof to aſhes, togither with the minſter of S. Peter, and a famous librarie belonging to the ſame. Hereupon the Normans and citizens in like maner were conſtreined to iſſue forth at the ſame time, and being vpon the enimies before they had any knowledge of their approch, were forced to trie the matter by diſordered battell: whoſe number though it was far inferiour vnto theirs, yet they valiantlie defended themſelues for a time, till being oppreſſed with multitudes, they were ouercome and ſlaine, ſo that there periſhed in this conflict, to the number of thrée thouſand of them.

Normans ſlaine.

Simon Dun.

Manie of the Engliſhmen alſo that came with them to the field, were ſaued by the enimies, to the end they might gaine ſomewhat by their ranſomes, as William Mallet ſhirife of the ſhire, with his wife, and two of their children, Gilbert de Gaunt, and diuers other. This ſlaughter chanced on a ſaturdaie, being the ninetéenth day of September; a diſmall daie to the Normans.

A ſharpe winter, an enimie to warlike enterpriſes.

The two brethren hauing thus obteined this victorie, went on further into the countrie of Northumberland, and brought the ſame wholie to their ſubiection, insomuch that all the north parts were at their cōmandement. Upon this they meant to haue gone towards London with the like attempt in the ſouth parts, if the extreame and hard winter which chanced that yeare, had not ſtaied their enterpriſe, as it did king William from aſſailing them; who hearing of all their dooings in the north countrie, would elſe full gladlie haue ſet vpon them.

The Danes where they wintered.

Hen. Hunt.

Polydor.

In the meane time, the Danes wintered in Yorkeſhire, betwixt the two riuers Ouſe and Trent; but ſo ſoone as the ſnow began to melt, and the yce to thaw and waſte away, king William ſped him with great haſt toward his enimies into Yorkeſhire, and comming to the riuer of Trent, where it falleth into Humber, he pitched his tents there, to refreſh his people, for his enimies were at hand. The daie following he brought his armie into the field to fight with the Daniſh princes, who likewiſe in battell araie met them. Then began a right ſore and terrible battell, continuing a long ſpace in equall balance, till at length in one of the Daniſh wings the Norman horſemen had put their enimies to flight. Which when the reſidue of the Danes perceiued, and therewith put in a ſudden feare, they likewiſe fled. Harold and Canutus with a band of hardie ſouldiers that tarried about them, retired backe (though with much a doo and great danger) vnto their ſhips. Edgar alſo, by helpe of good horſes, eſcaped into Scotland with a few in his companie.

Earle Walteof, who had fought moſt manfullie in that battell, & ſlaine manie Normans with his owne hands, was reconciled into the kings fauour: but the reſidue were for the moſt part taken priſoners, and killed. William of Malmeſburie writeth, that king William comming at that time into the north parts, beſieged the citie of Yorke, and putting to flight a great armie of his enimies that came to the ſuccour of them within, not without great loſſe of his owne ſouldiers, at length the citie was deliuered into his hands; the citizens and other that kept it, as Scots, Danes, and Engliſhmen, being conſtreined thereto through lacke of vittels.

Other write, how the Danes, being loden with riches and ſpoiles gotten in the countrie, departed to their ſhips before the comming of king William.

Earle Edwines lands giuen vnto Alane earle of Britaine.

Here is not to be forgotten, that (as Iohn Leland hath noted) whileſt the Conquerour held ſiege before Yorke, at the earneſt requeſt of his wife Quéene Maud, he aduanced his nephew Alane earle of Britaine, with the gift of all thoſe lands that ſometime belonged vnto earle Edwine, the tenor of which gift inſueth:

Ego Gulihelmus cognomine Baſtardus, do & concedo tibi nepoti meo Alano Britanniæ comiti, & hæredibus tuis in perpetuum, omnes illas villas & terras, quæ nuper fuerunt comitis Eadwini in Eboraſhira, cum feodis militum & alijs libertatibus & conſuetudinibus, ita liberè & honorificè ſicut idem Eadwinus ea tenuit. Dat. in obſidione coram ciuitate Eboraci: that is, I William ſurnamed Baſtard, doo giue and grant to thee my nephue Alane earle of Britaine, and to thine heires for euer, all thoſe townes & lands that latelie were earle Eadwines in Yorkeſhire, with the knights fees and other liberties and cuſtomes, ſo freelie and honourablie as the ſaid Eadwine held the ſame. Giuen in our ſeege before the citie of Yorke.

Caſtell of Richmont.

The earle of Britaine, being a man of a ſtout ſtomach, and meaning to defend that which was thus giuen to him, built a ſtrong caſtell néere to his manor of Gillingham, and named it Richmont. The firſt originall line of the earles of Richmont (that bare their title of honor of this caſtell and towne of Richmont (as Leland hath ſet downe the ſame) is this: Eudo earle of Britaine, the ſonne of Geffrey, begat thrée ſonnes, Alane le Rous, otherwiſe Fregaunte, Alane the blacke, and Stephan. Theſe thrée brethren after their fathers deceaſe, ſuccéeded one another in the earledome of Britaine; the two elder, Alane the red and Alane the blacke died without iſſue.

Earle of Britaine.

Stephan begat a ſonne named Alane, who left a ſonne, which was his heire named Conan, which Conan married Margaret the daughter of William king of Scotland, who bare him a daughter named Conſtantia, which Conſtantia was coupled in marriage with Geffrey ſonne to king Henrie the ſecond, who had by hir Arthur, whom his vncle king Iohn, for feare to be depriued by him of the crowne, cauſed to be made awaie; as ſome haue written.

Simon Dun.

Matth. Paris maketh mention but of Sweine and Oſborne whom he calleth brethren.

But now to returne where we left touching the Danes. Simon Dunel. affirmeth, that Harold and Canute or Cnute the ſonnes of Sweine king of Denmarke, with their vncle earle Oſborne, and one Chriſtianus a biſhop of the Danes, and earle Turketillus were guiders of this Daniſh armie, & that afterwards, when king William came into Northumberland, he ſent vnto earle Oſborne, promiſing him that he would permit him to take vp vittels for his armie about the ſea coaſtes; and further, to giue him a portion of monie, ſo that he ſhould depart and returne home as ſoone as the winter was paſſed.

Wil. Malmſ.

But howſoeuer the matter went with the Danes, certeine it is by the whole conſent of writers, that king William hauing thus ſubdued his enimies in the north, he tooke ſo great diſpleaſure with the inhabitants of the countrie of Yorkeſhire and Northumberland, that he waſted all the land betwixt Yorke and Durham, ſo that for the ſpace of thréeſcore miles, there was left in maner no habitation for the people, by reaſon whereof it laie waſt and deſert for the ſpace of nine or ten yeares. ¶ The goodlie cities with their towers and ſtéeples ſet vp on a ſtatelie height, and reaching as it were into the aire: the beautifull fields and paſtures, watered with the courſe of ſwéet and pleaſant riuers, if a ſtranger ſhould then haue beheld, and alſo knowne before they were thus defaced, he would ſurelie haue lamented: or if any old inhabitant had béene long abſent, & newly returned thither, had ſéene this pitifull face of the countrie, he would not haue knowne it, ſuch deſtruction was made through out all thoſe quarters, whereof Yorke it ſelfe felt not the ſmalleſt portion.

Simon Dun.

The biſhop of Durham Egelwinus with his cleargie fled into holie Iland with S. Cutberts bodie, and other iewels of the church of Durham, where they tarried thrée moneths and od daies, before they returned to Durham againe. The kings armie comming into the countrie that lieth betwixt the riuers Theiſe and Tine. found nothing but void feelds and bare walles; the people with their goods and cattell being fled and withdrawne into the woods and mountaines, if any thing were forgotten behind, theſe new geſts were diligent inough to find it out.

In the beginning of the ſpring, king William returned to London, and now after all theſe troubles, began to conceiue greater hatred againſt the Engliſhmen than euer before; ſo as doubting that hee ſhould neuer by gentleneſſe win their good willes, he now determined by a harder meaſure to meete with them; inſomuch that he baniſhed a great number, other ſome alſo (not a few) he ſpoiled of their goods, thoſe eſpeciallie of whom he was in hope to gaine any great portion of ſubſtance.

Priuileges and freedoms renoked.

Matth.Paris

Thus were the Engliſhmen generallie in danger to loſe life, lands and goods, without knowledge, or orderlie proceeding in iudgement, ſo that no greater miſerie in the earth could be imagined, than that where into our nation was now fallen. He tooke from the townes and cities, from the biſhops ſées and abbeies all their ancient priuileges and freedoms, to the end they ſhould not onelie be cut ſhort and made weaker, but alſo that they (for the obteinment of their quietneſſe) might redeeme the ſame of him for ſuch ſummes of monie as pleaſed him to exact. Among other things, he ordeined that in time of warre they ſhould aide him with armor, horſſe and monie, according to that order which he ſhould then preſcribe: all which he cauſed to be regiſtred, inrolled, and laid vp in his treaſurie. But diuerſe of the ſpirituall perſons would not obey this ordinance, whom he baniſhed without remorſe.

The hard dealing of K. William againſt the Engliſhmen.

About this time the archbiſhop Stigand, and Alexander biſhop of Lincolne fled to Scotland, where they kept themſelues cloſe for a ſeaſon. But the king ſtill continued in his hard procéeding againſt the Engliſhmen, inſomuch that now proteſting how he came to the gouernance of the realme only by plaine conqueſt, he ſeized into his hands moſt part of euerie mans poſſeſſions, cauſing them to redeeme the ſame at his hands againe, and yet reteined a propertie in the moſt part of them; ſo that thoſe that ſhould afterwards enioy them, ſhould acknowledge themſelues to hold them of him, in yeelding a yeerlie rent to him and his ſucceſſors for euer, with certeine other prouiſions, whereby in caſes of forfeiture the ſame lands ſhould returne to him, and his ſaid ſucceſſors againe. The like order he appointed to be vſed by other poſſeſſors of lands, in letting them forth to their tenants. He ordeined alſo, that the Termes ſhould be kept foure times in the yeere, in ſuch places as he ſhould nominate, and that the iudges ſhuld ſit in their ſeuerall places to iudge and decide cauſes and matters in controuerſie betwixt partie and partie, in manner as is vſed vnto this day. He decreed moreouer, that there ſhould be ſhiriffes in euerie ſhire, and iuſtices of the peace to keepe the countries in quiet, and to ſée offendors puniſhed. Furthermore, he inſtituted the court of the Excheker, and the officers belonging to the ſame, as the barons, the clearks, and ſuch other, and alſo the high court of Chancerie.

The inſtitution of the foure Termes.

The Excheker.
The Chancerie.

After he had in this ſort ordeined his magiſtrates and miniſters of the lawes, he laſtlie tooke order what ordinances he would haue obſerued: whervpon abrogating in maner all the ancient lawes vſed in times paſt, and inſtituted by the former kings for the good order and quietnes of the people, he made new, nothing ſo equall or eaſie to be kept; which neuertheleſſe thoſe that came after (not without their great harme) were conſtreined to obſerue: as though it had béene an high offenſe againſt GOD to aboliſh thoſe euill lawes, which king William (a prince nothing friendlie to the Engliſh nation) had firſt ordeined, and to bring in other more eaſie and tollerable.

New lawes.

¶ Here by the waie I giue you to note a great abſurditie; namelie, that thoſe lawes which touched all, and ought to be knowne of all, were notwithſtanding written in the Norman toong, which the Engliſhmen vnderſtood not; ſo that euen at the beginning you ſhould haue great numbers, partlie by the iniquitie of the lawes, and partlie by ignorance in miſconſtruing the ſame, to be wrongfullie condemned: ſome to death, and ſome in the forfeitures of their goods; others were ſo intangled in ſutes and cauſes, that by no means they knew how to get out, but continuallie were toſſed from poſt to piller; in ſuch wiſe that in their minds they curſſed the time that euer theſe vnequall lawes were made.

The lawes were written in the Norman toong.

The maner for the triall of cauſes in controuerſie, was deuiſed in ſuch ſort as is yet vſed. Twelue ancient men (but moſt commonlie vnlearned in the lawes) being of the ſame countie where the ſute laie, were appointed by the iudges to go togither into ſome cloſe chamber, where they ſhould be ſhut vp, till vpon diligent examination of the matter they ſhould agrée vpon the condemnation or acquiting of the priſoner, if it were in criminall cauſes; or vpon deciding in whom the right remained, if it were vpon triall of things in controuerſie. Now when they were all agréed, they came in before the iudges, declaring to what agréement they were growne: which doone, the iudges opened it to the offendors or ſutors, and withall gaue ſentence as the qualitie of the caſe did inforce and require. There may happilie be (as Polydor Virgil ſaith) that will mainteine this maner of procéeding in the adminiſtration of iuſtice by the voices of a iurie, to haue béene in vſe before the conquerors daies, but they are not able to proue it by any ancient records of writers, as he thinketh: albeit by ſome of our hiſtories they ſhould ſéeme to be firſt ordeined by Ethelred or Egelred. Howbeit this is moſt true, that the Norman kings themſelues would confeſſe, that the lawes deuiſed and made by the Conqueror were not verie equall; inſomuch that William Rufus and Henrie the ſonnes of the Conqueror would at all times, when they ſought to purchaſe the peoples fauor, promiſe to aboliſh the lawes ordeined by their father, eſtabliſh other more equall, and reſtore thoſe which were vſed in S. Edwards daies. The like kind of purchaſing fauor was vſed by king Steephen, and other kings that followed him. But now to the matter, king William hauing made theſe ordinances to keepe the people in order, ſet his mind to inrich his cofers, and thervpon cauſed firſt a tribute to be leuied of the commons, then the abbeies to be ſearched, and all ſuch monie as any of the Engliſhmen had laid vp in the ſame, to be kept. Beſides all this, he ſeized into his hands their charters of priuileges made to them by the Saxon kings of the land, and ſpared not ſo much as the iewels and plate dedicated to ſacred vſes. All this did he (as ſome write) by the counſell of the earle of Hertford.

Sim.Duncl.

Stigand archbiſhop of Canturburie depriued.

1 Firſt, for that he had wrongfullie holden that biſhoprike, whileſt the archbiſhop Robert was liuing.

2 Secondlie, for that he kept the ſee of Wincheſter in his hands, after his inueſtiture vnto Canturburie, which he ought not to haue doone.

3 Thirdlie, for that he had receiued the pall at the hands of pope Benedict the tenth, whom the cardinals, as one not lawfullie elected, had depoſed.

Howbeit, manie writers burthen king William (who was preſent at this ſynod) for the procuring of Stigand his depriuation, to the end he might place a ſtranger in his roome. For as he had rooted out the Engliſh Nobilitie, and giuen awaie their lands & liuings to his Normans; ſo meant he to turne out the Engliſh cleargie from bearing any office of honor within the realme, which meaning of his did well appeare at his councell, wherin diuers biſhops, abbats, and priors were depoſed, and Normans preferred to their places. Stigand after his depriuation was kept in perpetuall priſon at Wincheſter, till he died, and yet (as ſome write) the ſame Stigand was an helper vnder hand for king William to atteine the crowne.

Thomas a canon of Bayeux made archbiſhop of Yorke. Lanfranke conſecrated archbiſhop of Canturburie. Matth. Weſtm. hath the eight Kal. of Maie, but Wil. Mal. and Eadmerus the fourth Kal. of September.

Anno Reg. 5. Wil. Mal, Eadmerus.

In the feaſt of Pentecoſt next inſuing, the king being at Windſor, gaue the archbiſhoprike of Yorke vnto one Thomas, a canon of Bayeux, and to Walkelme one of his chaplins he gaue the biſhoprike of Wincheſter. After this, calling one Lanfranke an Italian from Caen where he was abbat, he made him archbiſhop of Canturburie, who was conſecrated there in the feaſt of S. Iohn Baptiſt, in the yeare folowing, which was after the birth of our Sauiour 1071. The foreſaid Thomas was the fiue and twentith biſhop that had gouerned in that ſee of Yorke, & Lanfranke the three & thirtith in the ſee of Canturburie. But yer long, betwixt theſe two archbiſhops there roſe great contention for the primaſie of their churches, in ſo much that the archbiſhop of Yorke appealed to Rome, where they both appeared perſonallie before pope Alexander, in whoſe preſence Lanfranks cauſe was ſo much fauoured, that not onelie the foreſaid Thomas, but alſo Remigius the biſhop of Dorcheſter were for reaſonable cauſes depriued of their croſiers and rings: and Lanfranke at their humble requeſt was a meane to the pope for them in the end, that they might be reſtored to their ſtaues, which was accordinglie obteined. For when the pope heard Lanfranke declare in their fauour, how neceſſarie their ſeruice might be to the king, in the eſtabliſhment of his new gotten kingdome, he ſaid to Lanfranke; Well, looke you then to the matter, you are the father of that countrie, and therefore conſider what is expedient to be done therein: their ſtaues which they haue ſurrendered, there they be, take them, and diſpoſe them as you ſhall thinke moſt profitable for the aduancement of the chriſtian religion in that countrie. Wherevpon, Lanfranke tooke the ſtaues, and deliuered them to the former poſſeſſours, and ſo were they in the popes preſence reſtored to their former dignities. One cauſe why Thomas was depriued (as ſome writers ſaie) was, for that he had holpen duke William toward his iournie into England when he came to conquer it, for the which pleaſure to him then ſhewed, the duke promiſed him a biſhoprike, if euer he obteined victorie ouer the Engliſh: an other cauſe, for that he was a prieſts ſonne. Now, when the pope vnderſtood the full ground of their contention to be for the primaſie of the two ſees, Canturburie and Yorke, and had heard what could be alledged on both ſides, he remitted the determination thereof to the king and biſhops of England, that by the hiſtories and records of the land, the matter might be tried, iudged and ordered.

Matth. Weſt.

The ſubiection of the archbiſhoprike of Yorke, to the archbiſhoprike of Canturburie.

Wherefore at their comming home, and after long debating and diſcuſſing of the cauſe (as in William Marleburgh it appeareth more at large) at a ſynod holden at Windſor, in the yeare 1072. ſentence was giuen on Lanfranks ſide, ſo that in all things concerning religion and the faith of holie church, the archbiſhop of Yorke ſhould be euer ſubiect to the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and come with all the biſhops of his prouince to what place ſoeuer the archbiſhop of Canturburie ſhould ſummon any councell within the realme of England. Moreouer, when anie elected biſhop of Canturburie was to be conſecrated, the archbiſhop of Yorke (for the time being) ſhould come to Canturburie, and conſecrate him there. And if the archbiſhop of Yorke was to be inſtalled and conſecrated, then ſhould he come to Canturburie, or to what place it ſhould pleaſe the archbiſhop of Canturburie to aſſigne, and there to be confirmed of him, taking an oth with profeſſion of due obedience vnto the higher ſee. Now, as the ſaid Thomas of Yorke did yeeld obedience to Lanfranke of Canturburie, ſo likewiſe the elect biſhop of Glaſcow in Scotland named Michaell, was ſoone after conſecrated of the foreſaid Thomas archbiſhop of Yorke, and made an oth of obedience vnto the ſaid archbiſhop, as to the primate of all Scotland: and after him Tothade the biſhop of S. Andrewes did the like, by commandement of Malcolme the third of that name king of Scotland, and Margaret his wife, who thought good by this recogniſance of obedience and dutie, ſo to prouide againſt further inconuenience to come, that hereafter, one of the biſhops of their realme ſhould not take vpon them to conſecrate an other: or doo any thing contrarie to the ancient decrees of the old fathers, that might be preiudiciall to the authoritie of the archbiſhop of Yorke, at whoſe appointment thoſe and the like things were accuſtomed to be doone. In this controuerſie (or the like) it is left written, that in a court held at Rome (the time is not mentioned) the pope perceiuing the ſtrife betweene theſe two prelats to be but for the higheſt place or primaſie in the church; he ſolemnelie gaue ſentence by decree, that the ſee of Yorke ſhould haue in title Primas Angliæ, & Canturburie Primas totius Angliæ, which titles doo yet remain to them both.

But to leaue this, and to ſpeake of other things which chanced in the meane time that this controuerſie depended betwixt the two archbiſhops, I find that Edwin and Marchar earles of Mertia and Northumberland, hauing of late obteined pardon for their former miſdemeanor, & reconciled to the king, began now ſo much to miſlike the ſtate of the world againe, as euer they did before. For perceiuing how the Engliſhmen were ſtill oppreſſed with thraldome & miſerie on ech hand, they conſpired, & began a new rebellion, but with verie ill ſucceſſe, as ſhall heraſter appeare. The king vnderſtanding of their dealings, and being not onelie armed throughlie with temporall force, but alſo endued with the ſpirituall power of his archbiſhop Lanfranke (who aided him in all that he might, for the ſuppreſſing of thoſe rebels) waſted the countries exceedinglie, where he vnderſtood that they had gotten anie releefe, minding vtterlie to vanquiſh them with ſword, fire, and hunger, or by extreame penurie to bring them vnder. They on the other part make as ſtout reſiſtance; and perceiuing that it ſtood them vpon, either to vanquiſh or to fall into vtter ruine, they raiſe a mightie ſtrong hoſt, and make Edgar Etheling their capteine, a comelie gentleman and a valiant, in whome alſo the whole hope of the Engliſh nation was repoſed, as appeareth by this his accuſtomed by-word, Edgar Etheling Englands dearling. Amongſt other noble men that were chiefe dooers in the aſſembling of this armie, Frederike abbat of S. Albons, a prelate of great wealth and no leſſe puiſſance, was a principall.

Matt. Paris.

The king perceiuing his eſtate to be now in no ſmall danger, is in a great perplexitie what to doo, in the end, he counſelleth with the ſaid Lanfranke archbiſhop of Canturburie, how he might remedie the matter; who told him that in ſuch a deſperate caſe, the beſt waie for him ſhould be to ſéeke by faire words and friendly offers to pacifie the Engliſh Nobilitie, which by all meanes poſſible would neuer ceaſſe to moleſt him in the recouerie of their liberties. Wherevpon he made meanes to come to ſome agréement with them, and ſo well the matter procéeded on his ſide, that the Engliſhmen being deceiued through his faire promiſes, were contented to common of peace, for which purpoſe they came alſo vnder the conduct of the abbat Frederike vnto Berkamſted, where (after much reaſoning and debating of the matter for the concluſion of amitie betwixt them) king William in the preſence of the archbiſhop Lanfranke and other of his lords, tooke a perſonall oth vpon all the relikes of the church of S. Albons, and the holie euangeliſts (the abbat Frederike miniſtring the ſame vnto him) that he would from thenceforth obſerue and kéepe the good and ancient approued lawes of the realme, which the noble kings of England his predeceſſors had made and ordeined heretofore; but namelie thoſe of S. Edward, which were ſuppoſed to be moſt equall and indifferent.

The peace being thus concluded, and the Engliſhmen growne thereby to ſome hope of further quietneſſe, they began to forſake their alies, and returned each one, either to his owne poſſeſſions, or to giue attendance vpon the king. But he warilie cloking his inward purpoſe, notwithſtanding the vnity latelie made, determineth particularlie to aſſaile his enimies (whoſe power without doubt ſo long as it was vnited, could not poſſiblie be ouercome, as he thought) and being now by reaſon of this peace diſſeuered and diſperſed, he thought it high time to put his ſecret purpoſes in execution: wherevpon taking them at vnwares and thinking of nothing leſſe than warres and ſudden inuaſion, he impriſoneth manie, killeth diuers, and purſueth the reſidue with fire and ſword, taking awaie their goods, poſſeſſions, lands, and inheritances, and baniſhing them out of the realme. In the meane time, thoſe of the Engliſh Nobilitie, which could eſcape this his outragious tyrannie, got awaie, and amongſt other, Edgar Etheling fled againe into Scotland: but Edwin was ſlaine of his owne ſouldiers, as he rode toward Scotland. Earle Marchar, and one Hereward, with the biſhop of Durham named Egelwinus, got into the Ile of Elie, in purpoſe there to defend themſelues from the iniurie of the Normans, for they tooke the place (by reaſon of the ſituation) to be of no ſmall ſtrength. Howbeit king William endeuouring to cut them ſhort, raiſed a power, and ſtopped all the paſſages on the eaſt ſide, and on the weſt part he made a cauſie through the fennes, of two miles in length, whereby he got vnto them, and conſtreined them to yeeld. But Marchar, or (as others haue) Hereward, foreſéeing the imminent danger likelie to take effect, made ſhift to get out of the Ile by bote, and ſo by ſpéedie flight eſcaped into Scotland. The biſhop of Durham being taken, was ſent to the abbey of Abingdon, to be kept as priſoner, where he was ſo ſparinglie fed, that within a ſhort ſpace he died for hunger.

Some write that he was ſo ſtubborne-harted, that after he knew he ſhould remaine in perpetuall priſon, he refuſed his meate, and ſo pined him ſelfe to death.

In this meane time, and whileſt king William was thus occupied in rooting out the Engliſh, Malcolme king of Scotland had waſted the countries of Theiſedale, Cleueland, and the lands of S. Cutbert, with ſundrie other places in the north parts. Wherevpon Goſpatrike being latelie reconciled to the king & made earle of Northumberland, was ſent againſt him, who ſacked and deſtroied that part of Cumberland which the ſaid Malcolme by violence had brought vnder his ſubiection. At the ſame time Malcolme was at Weremouth, beholding the fire which his people had kindled in the church of Saint Peter to burne vp the ſame, and there hearing what Goſpatrike had doone, he tooke ſuch diſpleaſure thereat, that he commanded his men they ſhould leaue none of the Engliſh nation aliue, but put them all to the ſword without pitie or compaſſion, ſo oft as they came to hand. The bloudie ſlaughter which was made at this time by the Scots, through that cruell commandement of Malcolme, was pitifull to conſider, for women, children, old and yong, went all one way: howbeit, manie of thoſe that were ſtrong and able to ſerue for drudges and ſlaues, were reſerued, and carried into Scotland as priſoners, where they remained manie yeares after; in ſo much that there were few houſes in that realme, but had one or mo Engliſh ſlaues and captiues, whom they gat at this vnhappie voiage. Miſerable was the ſtate of the Engliſh at that time, one being conſumed of another ſo vnnaturallie, manie of them deſtroied by the Scots ſo cruellie, and the reſidue kept vnder by the king ſo tyrannicallie.

A bloudie cōmandement executed vpon the Engliſh by the Scots.

But to returne to the purpoſe in hand, king William hearing of all theſe things, was not a little mooued at the ſame, but chéefelie with Malcolme king of Scots, for that his countrie was the onelie place wherein all the mal-contents of his realme had their refuge. Wherfore, thinking to reuenge the loſſe of his ſubiects, and to bring that realme alſo vnto his ſubiection, he went thither with an huge armie, about the middle of Auguſt, where he firſt inuaded the bounds of Galloway, bicauſe he heard how the Engliſh were latelie fled thither. But after he had wearied his ſouldiers in vaine purſuit of them (who kept themſelues in the mountaines and marres grounds) he gaue ouer the enterpriſe, and drew towards Lothiam, where king Malcolme laie with all his power, & ſundrie Engliſh fugitiues, with whome he determined by battell either to end his trouble, or elſe to looſe his life. Now as both the kings with their armies were readie to encounter, Malcolme began to doubt ſomewhat of the fierſeneſſe of the battell, bicauſe he ſaw the great puiſſance and readie willes of the Engliſh and Normans to fight, wherevpon he ſent an harrold to king William to treat of peace, wherewith he was content at the laſt (though with much adoo) and ſo a vnitie inſued betwixt them, vpon theſe conditions; namelie, that king Malcolme ſhould doo homage to king William for the realme of Scotland, and therevpon deliuer ſufficient hoſtages: and that on the other ſide, king William ſhould pardon all the Engliſh outlawes in Scotland which then rebelled againſt him. The place where this peace was concluded, was called Abirnethi. After this, king William returned into England, where he yer long tooke the earledome of Northumberland from Goſpatrike, and gaue it to Waltheof the ſonne of Siward; bicauſe of right it ſéemed to deſcend vnto him from his father, but chéefelie from his mother Alfreda, who was the daughter of Aldred ſometime earle of that countrie.

Yoong Edgar alſo grew in verie good credit with him, for though he had twiſe broken his oth of allegiance, and run to the Scots as a rebell, yet now of his owne motion, returning to the king and crauing pardon, he was not onelie receiued, but alſo highlie honoured and preferred in his court.

Mount caſter now Newcaſtell.

The yeare 1074. thrée moonks of the prouince of Mercia, purpoſing to reſtore religion after their maner within the prouince of Northumberland, came into Yorke, and required of Hugh Fitz Baldricke (then ſhirife of the ſhire) to haue ſafe conduct vnto Monkaſter, which afterwards hight Newcaſtell, and ſo is called to this day. Theſe moonks, whoſe names were Aldwin, Alſwin, and Remfred, comming vnto the foreſaid place, found no token or remanent of any religious perſons, which ſometime had habitation there (for all was defaced and gone:) wherevpon, after they had remained there a while, they remooued to Iarrowe, where finding the ruines of old decaied buildings and churches, perteining in times paſt to the moonks that there inhabited, they had ſuch aſſiſtance at the hands of Walkher biſhop of Durham, that at length, by the diligent trauell and ſute of theſe moonks, thrée monaſteries were newlie founded and erected in the north parts, one at Durham, an other at Yorke, and the third at Whitby. For you muſt conſider, that by the inuaſion of the Danes, the churches and monaſteries throughout Northumberland were ſo waſted and ruinated, that a man could ſcarſelie find a church ſtanding in all that countrie, as for thoſe that remained, they were couered with broome or thatch: but as for any abbey or monaſterie, not one was left in all the countrie, neither did any man (for the ſpace of two hundred yeares) take care for the repairing or building vp of any thing in decaie, ſo that the people of that countrie wiſt not what a moonke ment, and if they ſaw any, they wondered at the ſtrangeneſſe of the ſight.

A rebellion raiſed againſt K. William.

Whileſt the king remained thus in Normandie, Roger earle of Hereford (contrarie to the kings mind and pleaſure) married his ſiſter vnto Rafe earle of Cambridge, or (as other haue) Northfolke, and withall began a new conſpiracie againſt him. Amongſt other alſo of the aſſociats, earle Walteof the ſonne of earle Siward was one, who afterward miſtruſting the ſucceſſe of this deuiſe, firſt vttered it to archbiſhop Lanfranke, and by his aduice ſailed ouer into Normandie, and there diſcloſed the whole matter to king William: but in the meane time, the other two earles; namelie, Hereford and Cambridge had ſo farre procéeded in the matter, that they were vp in armour. Howbeit, Wolſtan biſhop of Worceſter, and Egelwine abbat of Eueſham, with the ſhirife of Worceſter & Walter Lacie, ſo reſiſted the earle of Hereford, that he could not paſſe the Seuerne to ioine with the earle of Cambridge. On the other ſide, Odo the biſhop of Bayeux, and Geffrey the biſhop of Conſtances purſued the earle of Cambridge ſo narrowlie with an other armie, which they had gathered of the Engliſh and Normans, that they conſtreined him to flée into Britaine, whereby the rebellion was verie much appeaſed.

In the meane time, the king vnderſtanding by earle Walteof how the matter went in England, came ouer with all ſpéed out of Normandie, & within a ſhort ſpace brought the reſidue of the conſpirators into ſuch a feare, that they were ſcattered and put to flight, without attempting anie further exploit or conſpiracie againſt him. Manie of them alſo were apprehended and put to death, among whom Roger and Walteof were moſt famous. And though Walteof (as yée haue heard before) diſcloſed the treaſon, yet to the end he ſhould offend no more hereafter, he was beheaded at Wincheſter by the kings commandement, and his bodie hauing béene firſt buried in the ſame place where he ſuffered, was after conueied vnto Crowland, and there more honorablie interred.

Earle Walteof beheaded.

This earle Walteof or Waldeue was ſonne (as ye haue heard) to Siward the noble earle of Northumberland, of whoſe valure in the time of K. Edward the confeſſor ye haue heard. His ſon the foreſaid Walteof in ſtrength of bodie and hardineſſe did not degenerate from his father, for he was tall of perſonage, in ſinews and muſculs verie ſtrong and mighty. In the ſlaughter of the Normans at Yorke, he ſhewed proofe of his proweſſe, in ſtriking off the heads of manie of them with his owne hands, as they came forth of the gates ſinglie one by one: yet afterwards, when the king had pardoned him of all former offenſes, and receiued him into fauour, hée gaue to him in mariage his néece Iudith the daughter of Lambert earle of Lens, ſiſter to Stephen erle of Albermare, and with hir he had of the kings gift, all the lands and liberties belonging to the honor of Huntingdon: in conſideration whereof, he aſſigned to hir in name of hir dower, all the lands that he held from Trent ſouthward. Shée bare by him two daughters, Mand and Alice. We find, that he was not onlie earle of Northumberland, but alſo of Northampton and Huntingdon..

This was the end of the foreſaid conſpiracie. At this verie time the Danes being confederate with theſe rebels, and by them ſolicited, ſet forth towards England vnder the leading of Cnuto, ſonne to Sueno, and earle Haco, and (vnlooked for) arriue here in England with two hundred ſailes. But hearing that the ciuill tumult was ended, and ſéeing no man readie either to countenance or encourage them in their enterpriſe, they ſailed firſt into Flanders, which they ſpoiled, and after into their owne countrie, with little deſire or will to come againe into England. King William alſo vnderſtanding that they were thus departed, paſſed ouer into Britaine, and there beſieged the caſtell of Doll that belonged to Ralfe earle of Cambridge or Northfolke: but by the comming of Philip the French king, king William being vnprouided of ſufficient vittels for his armie, was conſtreined to raiſe his ſiege, although with great loſſe both of men and horſſes.

Biſhops ſées remooued.

King William after his comming from the ſiege of Doll, remained a certeine time in quiet, during which ſeaſon, Lanfranke the archbiſhop called a ſynod or councell of the cleargie at London, wherein amongſt other things it was ordeined, that certeine biſhops ſées ſhould be remooued from ſmall townes to cities of more fame, whereby it came to paſſe that Chicheſter, Exceter, Bath, Saliſburie, Lincolne &

At this ſynod alſo Woolſtan biſhop of Worceſter was preſent, whom Lanſranke would haue depoſed for his inſufficiencie of learning; as he colourablie pretended, but indeed to pleaſure the king, who faine would haue placed a Norman in his roome: but (as they ſaie) by a miracle which he preſentlie wrought, in cauſing his croſier ſtaffe to ſticke faſt in the toome of ſaint Edward (to whom he proteſted and ſaid he would reſigne it, for that he obteined the ſame by his gift) he did put the king and the archbiſhop into ſuch feare, that they ſuffered him ſtill to enioy his biſhoprike without any further vexation. In the yeare following, king William led a mightie armie into Wales, and ſubdued it; receiuing of the rulers and princes there their homages and hoſtages. About the ſame time, Robert the kings eldeſt ſonne, a right worthie perſonage, but yet as one of nature ſomewhat vnſtable, entred into Normandie as a rebell to his father, and by force tooke diuers places into his hands. Which he did by the practiſe of Philip the French king, who now began to doubt of the great puiſſance of king William, as foreſeeing how much it might preiudice him, and the whole realme of France in time to come. Wherefore to ſtop the courſe of his proſperous ſucceſſe, he deuiſed a meane to ſet the ſonne againſt the father. True it is that king William had promiſed long afore to reſigne the gouernment of Normandie vnto the ſaid Robert his ſonne. Wherevpon the yoong man, being of an ambitious nature, and now pricked forward by the ſiniſter counſell of his adherents, ſeeketh to obteine that by violence, which he thought would be verie long yer he ſhould atteine by curteſie. King William hereof aduertiſed, was not a little mooued againſt his diſobedient ſonne, and curſſed both him and the time that euer he begat him. Finallie, raiſing an armie, he marched towards him, ſo that they met in the field. Aſſoone as the one came in ſight of the other, they encountred at a place called Archenbraie, and whileſt the battell was at the hotteſt, and the footmen moſt buſied in fight, Robert appointed a power of horſſemen to breake in vpon the reereward of his enimies; & he himſelfe following after with all his might, chanced among other to haue a conflict with his owne father, ſo that thruſting him through the arme with his lance, he bare him beſide his horſſe, and ouerthrew him to the ground. The king being falne, called to his men to remount him. Robert perceiuing by his voice that it was his father, whom he had vnhorſſed, ſpeedilie alighted, and tooke him vp, asking him forgiueneſſe for that fact, and ſetting him vp on his owne horſſe, brought him out of the preaſe, and ſuffered him to depart in ſafetie. King William being thus eſcaped out of that preſent danger, and ſeeing himſelfe not able to reſiſt the puiſſance of his enimies, left the field to his ſon, hauing loſt many of his men which were ſlaine in battell and chace, beſides a great number that were hurt and wounded, among whom his ſecond ſonne William ſurnamed Rufus or Red, was one; and therefore (as ſome write) he bitterlie curſſed his ſon Robert, by whom he had ſuſteined ſuch iniurie, loſſe, and diſhonor. Howbeit, other write, that for the curteſie which his ſonne ſhewed, in releeuing and helping him out of danger, when he was caſt off his horſſe, he was mooued with ſuch a fatherlie affection, that preſentlie after they were made friends, the father pardoned his ſonne all his former offenſes, and therevpon found him euer after more tractable and obedient than before.

After this battell, king William being thus accorded with his ſonne, returned with him into England, and immediatlie ſent him againſt Malcolme king of Scotland, who hauing broken the truce in time of the trouble betwixt king William and his ſonne, had doone much hurt by forraies vpon the Engliſh borders, waſting all Northumberland euen to the riuer of Tine. Howbeit, when he heard that Robert approched with his armie towards him, he retired into Scotland. Robert Curthuze then lodged with his armie vpon the banks of the riuer of Tine, where he began the foundation of a caſtell, whereof the towne of Newcaſtell did after take both beginning and name, for before this ſeaſon it was called Moncaſter.

The foundation of Newcaſtell vpon Tine, which before that ſeaſon was called Moncaſter.

About the ſame time, Odo the biſhop of Bayeux was ſent to Northumberland, to reuenge the death of Walkher biſhop of Durham, whom not long before the people of Northumberland had ſlaine in a tumult. The occaſion of his death grew by the death of one Liulfus, a noble man of thoſe quarters, and deerelie beloued of the people, bicauſe he was deſcended of honorable parentage, and had married the ladie Algitha daughter vnto earle Alered, and ſiſter to Alfleda the mother of earle Walteof.

Simon Dun.

This Liulfus, a man of great poſſeſſions through England, now that the Normans ruled in all places, quietlie withdrew himſelfe vnto Durham, and grew into ſuch familiaritie and credit with the biſhop, that touching the order of temporall matters, he would doo nothing without his aduice. Whereat Leofwin the biſhops chapline conceiued ſuch enuie (for that he was not ſo often called to counſell as before) that in the end he procured by his malicious meanes one Gilbert (to whom the biſhop had committed the rule of the earledome) to murther the ſaid Liulfus by night in his manor place not farre from Durham. Whereof the biſhop hauing vnderſtanding, and knowing that the matter would be greeuouſlie taken of the people, ſent out letters and meſſengers into the countrie, offering to purge himſelfe of the ſlaughter of this man, according to the order of the canon lawes: howbeit he did nothing leſſe. Among other things concerning his purgation, he ſaid that he had baniſhed Gilbert and others, (who had committed the murther) out of Northumberland. Herevpon the malice of the people was kindled againſt him. For when it was knowne that he had receiued the murtherers into his houſe, and fauoured them as before, they ſtomached the matter highlie: inſomuch that when by the trauell of thoſe that went to and fro betwixt the biſhop and the kinſfolks of Liulfus, a daie was appointed, on the which the biſhop ſhould come to farther communication with them at Gateshead, he repaired thither according to his promiſe, but refuſing to talke with them abroad, he kept himſelfe ſtill within the church, and ſent forth ſuch of his counſell as ſhould commune with them. But when the people that were there gathered in great numbers, had ſignified in plaine words that he ſhould either come forth and ſhew himſelfe amongſt them, or elſe that they ſhould fire the place where he ſat: he cauſed Gilbert to go forth vnto them firſt, whom they ſlue, and his partakers alſo that iſſued out of the church with him for his defenſe. But when the peoples furie was not ſo quenched, the biſhop himſelfe caſting the ſkirts of his gowne ouer his face, came likewiſe forth, and was immediatlie ſlaine of the people. After this, they ſet the church on fire, bicauſe Leofwine the biſhops chapline and others were yet within, and refuſed to come foorth: howbeit in the end, being compelled by the rage of the fire to come out, the ſaid Leofwine was alſo ſlaine and hackt in peeces (as he had well deſerued) being the ringleader of all the miſcheefe.

Note the ſequele of the neglect of iuſtice in the former ſtorie.

¶ Thus maie we ſee what followed of the neglecting of iuſtice in the biſhop: for if he had either baniſhed Gilbert and other his complices (accordinglie as he pretended to doo) or otherwiſe had ſeene due puniſhment executed againſt them, the peoples rage had neuer proceeded ſo far as it did: for they could not perſuade themſelues, but that the biſhop was guiltie and priuie to Liulfus death, ſith he had receiued the murtherers into his houſe, the verie ſame night in which the fact was doone, and kept them ſtill about him, which his bearing with them coſt him his owne life. But now to the hiſtorie.

When biſhop Odo was come into thoſe parties to reuenge the biſhops death with an armie (as we haue ſaid) he ſore afflicted the countrie, by ſpoiling it on euerie ſide with great crueltie. Here king William placed and diſplaced diuerſe rulers ouer the Northumbers: for firſt he appointed one Copſi to haue the rule of that countrie, in place of Marchar who before had held the ſame. This Copſi expelled Oſulfe the ſonne of earle Edulfe brother to earle Aldred, which Oſulfe was ſubſtitute vnto the earles Edwine and Marchar, who although he was driuen out of his gouernement by Copſi, yet recouering his forces againe, he ſlue the ſame Copſi as he entred into the church of Newburne. But within a few moneths after, the ſame Oſulfe (as he ran with his horſſe againſt a theefe) was thruſt through the bodie with a ſpeare, which the theefe held in his hand, and ſo died. Then Goſpatrike was aſſigned by king William to haue the gouernement there: whoſe mother Aldgitha was daughter to Vthred ſometime earle of Northumberland begotten vpon Elfgiua the daughter of king Egelred.

Goſpatrike.

Some write, that Goſpatrike purchaſed the earledome of king William, and ſo held it, till the king tooke it from him againe, and then gaue it vnto earle Walteof or Waldeue. Next after him Walkher the foreſaid biſhop of Durham had the whole adminiſtration cõmitted to him, but (after he was ſlaine as yee haue heard) one Alberike ruled that countrie, and laſtlie, Robert Mulbray a right noble perſonage (for his wiſedome and valiancie highlie renowmed with all men) was created earle of Northumberland, and gouerned the people of thoſe parties in ſuch politike and wiſe order, that during his time, it is hard to ſaie, whether his quietneſſe or the obedience of the people was greater.

Robert Mulbray earle of Northumberland.

In like manner, after the foreſaid Walkher; one William was created biſhop of Durham, who was the originall founder of vniuerſitie colledge in Oxford, and by whoſe aſſiſtance, the moonkes gaping both for riches, eaſe, and poſſeſſions, found the means to diſplace the ſecular prieſts of the colledge of Durham, that they might get into their roomes, as they did indeed ſoone after, to their great gaine and aduantage. But to returne againe to the courſe of the hiſtorie. Shortlie after the reuenge of the death of Walkher biſhop of Durham, the fornamed biſhop Odo the kings brother was ſuſpected of ſome vntruth and ſiniſter dealing, wher vpon he was ſent as a baniſhed man into Normandie, or rather (as other write) committed to priſon, where he remained, not as a clerke, but as a baron of the realme; for he was both biſhop and earle of Kent.

The king hauing at length obteined ſome reſt from wars, practiſed by ſundrie meanes to inrich his cofers, and therefore raiſed a tribute through out the whole kingdome; for the better leuieng whereof, he appointed all the ſubiects of his realme to be numbred, all the cities, townes, villages, and hamlets to be regiſtred, all the abbies, monaſteries and priories to be recorded. Moreouer, he cauſed a certificat to be taken of euerie mans ſubſtance, and what he might diſpend by the yeare; he alſo cauſed their names to be written which held knights fees, & were bound therby to ſerue him in the wars. Likewiſe he tooke a note of euerie yoke of oxen, & what number of plow lands, and how manie bondmen were within the realme. This certificat being made & brought vnto him, gaue him full vnderſtanding what wealth remained among the Engliſh people. Herevpon he raiſed his tribute, taking ſix ſhillings for euerie hide of land through out this realme, which amounted to a great maſſe of monie when it was all brought togither into his Excheker. ¶ Here note by the waie, that an hide of land conteineth an hundred acres, and an acre conteineth fortie perches in length, and foure in bredth, the length of a perch is ſixteene foot and an halfe: ſo that the common acre ſhould make 240. perches; & eight hides or 800. acres is a knights fee, after the beſt approued writers and plaine demonſtration. It hapned about the ſame time, that when king William had finiſhed the rating of his ſubiects, that there roſe a ſtrife betwixt Thurſtane abbat of Glaſtenburie a Norman, and the moonkes of that houſe. One cauſe thereof was, for that the abbat would haue compelled them to haue left the plaine ſong or note for the ſeruice which pope Gregorie had ſet foorth, and to haue vſed an other kind of tune deuiſed by one William of Feſcampe: beſide this, the ſaid abbat ſpent and waſted the goods that belonged to the houſe, in riot, leacherie, and by ſuch other inſolent meanes (withdrawing alſo from the moonkes their old accuſtomed allowance of diet) for the which they firſt fell at altercation in words, and afterwards to fighting. The abbat got armed men about him, and falling vpon the moonkes, ſlue three of them at the high altar, and wounded xviij. Howbeit the moonkes for their parts plaied the pretie men with formes and candelſticks, defending themſelues as well as they might, ſo that they hurt diuers of the abbats adherents, and droue them out of the quier.

Such as were called to be iuſtices, were enimies to all iuſtice; wherupon greater burdens were laid vpon the Engliſh, inſomuch that after they had beene robbed and ſpoiled of their goods, they were alſo debarred of their accuſtomed games and paſtimes. William had taken the oth of fealtie and loialtie of all his lords, Edgar Etheling, who was reconciled vnto his fauour (as you haue heard) obteining licence of him to depart the realme for a ſeaſon, ſailed into Puglia with two hundred ſouldiers: of whoſe acts there and returne into England I ſpare to ſpeake, bicauſe I find litle or nothing of moment recorded. And now king William, who hauing brought the Engliſhmen ſo lowe and bare, that little more was to be got out of their hands, went once againe ouer into Normandie with an huge maſſe of mony, where ſoone after he fell ſicke, ſo that he was conſtrained to keepe his bed longer than he had beene accuſtomed to doo, whereat Philip the French king in ieſting maner ſaid, that king William his couſine laie now in childbed (alluding belike to his big bellie, for he was verie corpulent) and withall added; Oh what a number of candels muſt I prouide to offer vp at his going to church! certeinelie I thinke that 100000. will not ſuffice, &c. This frumping ſpeech ſo moued the king, that he made this anſwere: Well, I truſt when I ſhall be churched, that our couſine ſhall be at no ſuch coſt, but I will helpe to find him a thouſand candels my ſelfe, and light them too, to ſome of their paines, if God grant me life. Which promiſe he bound with an oth, and in deed performed. For in Iulie next inſuing, when their corne, fruit, and grapes were moſt floriſhing, and readie for the ſickle, he entred France with a great armie, ſet fire on manie of their cities and townes in the weſtſide of that countrie, & came at laſt to the citie of Maunt, which he burnt with the church of our ladie, and an ankreſſe incloſed in the wall thereof as an holie cloſet, for the force of the fire was ſuch as all went to wrecke. In this heat king William tooke ſuch a ſickneſſe (which was likewiſe aggrauated by the fall of an horſſe as he rode to and fro, bicauſe he was not able to trauell on foot about his palace by reaſon of his diſeaſe) that coſt him his life; ſo that when he had ordeined his laſt will, and taken order for the ſtaie of things after his deceaſe, he departed this life on the 9. day of September, in the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour 1087. and 74. (as Polydor ſaith) of his age, hauing gouerned Normandie about 51. yeres, and reigned ouer England 20. yeares, ten moneths, and 28. daies (as all writers doo report.)

He ſet all priſoners at libertie ſaith Wil. Malm.
Polydor.

Not long before his death, he releaſed his brother Odo biſhop of Bayeux out of priſon, Marchar earle of Northumberland, and Wilnotus the ſonne of king Harold, or (as ſome ſay) his brother. Moreouer he repented him (as ſome ſay) when he lay on his deathbed, his of cruell dealing with the Engliſh, conſidering that by them he had atteined to ſuch honour and dignitie, as to weare the crowne and ſcepter of a kingdome: but whether he did ſo or not, or that ſome monke deuiſed the excuſe in fauour of the prince: ſurelie he was a puiſſant prince, and though his time was troubleſome, yet he was right fortunate in all his attempts. Againe, if a man ſhall conſider that in a ſtrange realme he could make ſuch a conqueſt, and ſo exactlie and readilie aſſure the ſame to his heires, with new lawes, orders, and conſtitutions (which are like for euer to endure) he would thinke it a thing altogither void of credit. Yet ſo it was, & ſo honourable were his doings in the ſight of the world, that thoſe kings, which ſucceeded ſithens his death, begin their account at him, as from one that had by his prudence renewed the ſtate of the realme, and inſtituted an other forme of regiment, in atchiuing whereof he did not ſo much pretend a rightfull challenge by the grant of his coſine king Edward the Confeſſor, as by the law of armes and plaine conqueſt, than the which (as he ſuppoſed) there could be no better title.

Herevpon alſo thoſe that haue ſithens ſucceeded him, vſe the ſame armes as peculiar to the crowne of England, which he vſed in his time; namelie, thrée lions paſſant gold in a field gewels (as Polydor writeth) the thrée floure delices were ſince that time annexed thereto by Edward the third, by reaſon of his claime to the crowne of France, whereof hereafter ye ſhall heare. Among other gréeuances which the Engliſh ſuſteined by the hard deling of the Conquerour, this is to be remembred, that he brought Iewes into this land from Rouen, and appointed them a place to inhabit and occupie.

He bare but two lions or rather leopards as ſome thinke.

Polydor.

There be that write, how the inconſtancie of the Engliſh people by their oft rebellions occaſioned the king to be ſo rough and rigorous againſt them; wheras (of his naturall diſpoſition and proper inclination) he was rather gentle and courteous than ſharpe and cruell. But ſith he continued his extremitie euen to his laſt daies, we may rather beléeue, that although from his childhood he ſhewed ſome tokens of clemencie, bountie, and liberalitie; yet by following the wars, and practiſing to reigne with ſterneneſſe, he became ſo inured therewith, that thoſe peaceable vertues were quite altered in him, and in maner clearelie quenched. He was indued with a certeine ſtoutneſſe of courage and ſkill in feats of warre, which good hap euer followed: he was frée from lecherous luſts, without ſuſpicion of bodilie vices, quicke of wit, deſirous of honor, painefull, watchfull, and able to tolerate heat and cold, though he were tall of ſtature, and verie groſſe of bodie.

Toward the end of his daies he waxed verie deuout, and became deſirous to aduance the ſtate of the church, inſomuch that he builded thrée abbeies in thrée ſeuerall places, endowing them with faire lands and large poſſeſſions, one at the place where he vanquiſhed king Harold, fiue miles from Haſtings, which he named Battell, of the field there fought: the other at Celby in Yorkeſhire: and the third in Normandie at Caen, where his wife Quéene Maud had builded a nunnerie, which Maud died in the yéere 1084. before the deceaſe of the king hir huſband.

After his death, his bodie was buried in Caen, in S. Stephans church; but before it could be committed to the ground, the executors were conſtreined to agrée with the lord of the ſoile where the church ſtood, which (as he ſaid) the king in his life time had iniuriouſlie taken from him, and gaue him a great ſumme of monie to releaſe his title.

They gaue him an hundred pound, ſaith Hen. Marle.

¶ By this we may conſider the great miſerie of mans eſtate, in that ſo mightie a prince could not haue ſo much ground after his death as to couer his dead corps, without dooing iniurie to another. This alſo may be a ſpeciall leſſon for all men, and namelie for princes, noblemen, and gentlemen, who oftentimes to enlarge their owne commodities, doo not regard what wrong they offer to the inferiour ſort.

Hen. Marle.

The ſaid king William had by Maud his wife the daughter of Baldwine earle of Flanders, foure ſonnes, Robert ſurnamed Curthoſe (vnto whome he bequeathed the duchie of Normandie) Richard who died in his youth, William ſurnamed Rufus, to whom he gaue by teſtament the realme of England, and Henrie ſurnamed Beauclerke for his cunning, knowledge and learning, vnto whom he bequethed all his treaſure and moueable goods, with the poſſeſſions that belonged to his mother. Beſides theſe foure ſonnes, he had alſo by his ſaid wife fiue daughters, Cecilie, who became a nunne; Conſtance, who was married to Alane duke of Britaine: Adela, who was giuen in mariage to Stephan earle of Blois (of whom that Stephan was borne which reigned after Henrie the firſt) Adeliza, who was promiſed in mariage to Harold king of England (as before you haue heard) but ſhe died yer ſhe was maried either to him, or to any other, and ſo likewiſe did the fift, whoſe name I cannot reherſe.

John Rous.

But to conclude, though king William held the Engliſh ſo vnder foot, that in his daies almoſt no Engliſhman bare any office of honor or rule in his time, yet he ſomewhat fauoured the citie of London, and at the earneſt ſute of William a Norman then biſhop of that ſée, he granted vnto the citizens the firſt charter, which is written in the Saxon tong, ſealed with gréene wax, and expreſſed in viij. or ix. lines at the moſt, exemplified according to the copie, and ſo printed, as followeth.

But howſoeuer he vſed the reſt of the Engliſh, this is recorded of ſome writers, that by his rigorous procéedings againſt them, he brought to paſſe that the countrie was ſo rid of théeues and robbers, as that at length a maid might haue paſſed through the land with a bag full of gold, and not haue met with any miſdooer to haue bereft hir of the ſame: a thing right ſtrange to conſider, ſith in the beginning of his reigne there were ſuch routs of outlawes and robbers, that the peaceabler people could not be ſafelie poſſeſſed of their owne houſes, were the ſame neuer ſo well fortified and defended.

Among manie lawes made by the ſaid William, this one is to be remembred, that ſuch as forced any woman, ſhould loſe their genitals.

Shooting.

The vſe of the long bowe (as John Rous teſtifieth) came firſt into England with this king William the Conquerour: for the Engliſh (before that time) vſed to fight with axes and ſuch hand weapons: and therefore in the oration made by the Conquerour before he gaue battell to king Harold, the better to encourage his men, he told them they ſhould encounter with enimies that wanted ſhot.

In the yeare of our Lord 1542. Monſieur de Caſtres biſhop of Baieulx and abbat of Saint Eſtienne in Caen, cauſed the ſepulchre of this William to be opened, wherein his bodie was found whole, faire and perfect; of lims, large and big; of ſtature and perſonage, longer than the ordinarie ſort of men: with a copper plate fairlie gilt, and this epitaph therevpon ingrauen:

WIlliam, ſurnamed Rufus or William the Red, ſecond ſonne to William Conqueror, began his reigne ouer England the ninth of September, in the yeare 1087. about the 31. yeare of the emperour Henrie the fourth, and the 37. of Philip the firſt, king of France, Vrbane the ſecond then gouerning the ſée of Rome, and Malcolme Cammoir reigning in Scotland. Immediatlie after his fathers deceaſſe, and before the ſolemnitie of the funerals were executed, he came ouer into England with no leſſe ſpéed than was poſſible, and following the counſell of Lanfranke archbiſhop of Canturburie (in whome he repoſed all his truſt) he ſought to win the fauour of the Péers and Nobilitie of the realme by great and liberall gifts. For although there were but few of the homeborne States that bare rule in the land at this ſeaſon; yet thoſe that remained, and whome his father in extreme ſort had wronged, he verie gentlie enterteined, promiſing them not onlie to continue their good lord and ſoueraigne, but alſo to make more fauourable ordinances than his father had left behind him; and furthermore to reſtore the former lawes and liberties of the realme, which his ſaid father had aboliſhed. Thus by faire words and policie he obtained his purpoſe. Howbeit ſoone after he forgat himſelfe, and impriſoned Marchar and Wilnot, whom he had brought ouer with him from Normandie, being ſet at libertie by his father.

Lanfranke had fauoured him euen of a child.

William Rufus is crowned the 26. of September.
Polydor.
His bountifull munificence.

The Nobles at the firſt wiſhed rather to haue had the elder brother duke Robert to haue gouerned them: howbeit by the aide onelie of the ſaid Lanfranke, whoſe authoritie was of no ſmall force amongſt all the lords of the land, this William (according to his fathers aſſignation) was proclaimed and crowned at Weſtminſter on the 26. of September (being ſundaie, the 6. kalends of October) and the 11. indiction, as the beſt writers doo report. After his coronation, to gratifie the people, he went to Wincheſter, where he found great treaſure which his father had laid vp there for his owne vſe: this he fréelie ſpent in large gifts, and all kind of princelie largeſſe. He ſet verie manie priſoners at libertie, & did many other things to benefit the people, wherein the diligence and good aduice of Lanfranke did not a little preuaile. For he perceiued that there was in the king a variable mind, an vnſtable nature, and a diſpoſition to lightneſſe and follie. Wherefore hée tooke oftentimes the more paines in perſuading him not onelie to liberalitie (which is none of the leaſt vertues in a prince) but alſo to vſe a diſcréet and orderlie behauiour in all his doings. Moreouer, he ſticked not to put him in feare of an euill end, and troubleſome regiment likelie to inſue, if he did giue himſelfe to vice and wilfulneſſe, & neglect the charge thus by the prouidence of GOD committed to his hands. After this maner did the ſaid prelat trauell with the king, whom we will leaue at this time as it were hearkening to his admonitions, and ſet forth by the waie what his brother Robert did, whileſt William Rufus his brother was occupied in ſuch wiſe as you haue heard.

It happened that this Robert was abroad in Germanie, when king William his father died (whither he went to raiſe a power, to the intent he might therby obteine the poſſeſſion of Normandie, which he truſted to enioy in his fathers life time) where hearing newes of his death, he haſted ſtraightwaies into Normandie, and there being ioyfullie receiued, was peaceablie proclaimed duke of that countrie, with great gladneſſe and ſhouting of the people.

After this, conſidering with himſelfe how diſhonorable a thing it was for him, that his yoonger brother ſhould poſſeſſe the crowne of England, which of right (as he ſaid) belonged vnto him, by reaſon of his age; he determined with all expedition to paſſe the ſeas with an armie, and recouer that into his hands, which his father had giuen from him, partlie (as it is thought) for his wilfulneſſe and diſobedience towards him, and partly alſo bicauſe he doubted that if he ſhould leaue it vnto him, he would through his too much gentleneſſe and facilitie, giue occaſion to the Engliſh to reſume ſtrength, and therby to reuolt. Wherefore he iudged his yoonger brother the ſaied William (a man of a rougher nature) the méeter of the twaine for the gouernement.

As duke Robert was thus moued by his owne deſire to bereue his brother of the dominion of England, land, ſo he was not a little incenſed therunto by ſuch of the Engliſh Nobilitie and Normans, as came dailie ouer vnto him out of the realme, complaining of the preſent ſtate of the world, as thoſe that miſliked of the whole maner of regiment vſed in the beginning of the reigne of his brother William. His vncle Odo alſo (then biſhop of Baieux) furthered the matter all that he might. This Odo was at firſt in great eſtimation with his brother the Conqueror, and bare great rule vnder him, till at length for enuie that the archbiſhop Lanfranke was preferred before him, he conſpired againſt him, who vnderſtanding thereof, committed him forthwith to priſon, where he remained, till the ſaid prince then lieng on his death-bed, releaſed and reſtored him to his former libertie. When the king was dead, William Rufus tooke him backe into England, ſuppoſing no leſſe but to haue had a ſpeciall freend and a truſtie counceller of him in all his affaires. But yer long after his comming thither, he fell againe into the ſame offenſe of ingratitude, wherof he became culpable in the Conquerors daies: for perceiuing that Lanfranke was ſo highlie eſteemed with the king, that he could beare no rule, and partlie ſuſpecting that Lanfranke had beene cheefe cauſer of his former impriſonment, he conſpired with the reſt againſt his nephue, and therevpon wrote ſundrie letters ouer vnto duke Robert, counſelling him to come ouer with an armie in all haſt, to take the rule vpon him, which by his practiſe ſhould eaſilie be compaſſed.

Odo the biſhop of Baieux conſpireth againſt his nephue William Rufus.

Duke Robert being thus animated on all ſides, and yet wanting ſufficient monie to the furniture of this iournie, engaged a portion of his duchie of Normandie, as the countie of Conſtantine to his yoongeſt brother Henrie, for a great ſum of gold, and therwith returned anſwer to the foreſaid biſhop, that he ſhould prouide and looke for him vpon the ſouth coaſt of England, at a certeine time appointed. Herevpon Odo fortified the caſtell of Rocheſter, & began to make ſore wars againſt the kings friends in Kent: he procured others of the complices alſo to do the like in other parts of the realme; and firſt on the weſt part of England, where Geffrey biſhop of Conſtans with his nephue Robert de Mowbray earle of Northumberland ſetting forth from Briſtow, came toward Bath, which towne they tooke and ſacked, and likewiſe Berkley, with a great part of Wiltſhire, and brought the ſpoile and booties backe to Briſtow, where they had a caſtell ſtronglie fortified for their more ſafetie. In like maner Roger de Bygod, departing from Norwich, with great forraies ouerrode and robbed all the countries about, and conueied ſuch riches as he had gotten into the ſaid citie. In like ſort did Hugh de Grandmeſnill at Leiceiſter, ſpoiling and waſting all the countries about him.

The earle of Shrewſburie called Roger de Mountgomerie, with a power of Welſhmen ſet forth from Shrewſburie, and with him were William biſhop of Durham the kings houſhold chapline, Barnard of Newmerch, Roger Lacie, and Raſe Mortimer, (all Normans or Frenchmen) who ioyning their powers togither, inuaded the countrie, and with fire and ſword did much hurt where they came, killing and taking a great number of people. Afterwards comming to Worceſter, they aſſaulted the citie, ouerran the ſuburbs, & ſet the ſame on fire. But the citizens ſhutting faſt the gates of their citie (though with the ſudden comming of the enimies they were ſomewhat afraid) made valiant reſiſtance: and conueieng their goods, their wiues, and their children into the caſtell, got them to the walles and places of defenſe, to repell & beat backe the enimies. Among them in the towne was biſhop Woolſtan, whom the citizens would haue compelled to go into the caſtell for his ſurer ſafegard, but he refuſed it.

Biſhop Woolſtan.

At length it chanced that the enimies (continuing the ſaid ſiege) began to wax negligent, and ranged abroad in the countrie, little regarding watch and ward about their campe, wherevpon the Engliſh within the citie tooke this oportunitie, being mooued thereto with the comfortable exhortation of biſhop Woolſtan, and ſailing forth of the towne did ſet on their enimies with great fiercenes, whome they got at ſuch aduantage, that they ſlue and tooke that daie aboue fiue M. men (as Henrie of Huntingdon recordeth.) For the Engliſh bearing a continuall malice in their hearts againſt the French and Normans, did now their beſt to be fullie reuenged of them, vpon ſo conuenient an occaſion offered. Thoſe that eſcaped by flight, hid themſelues in the next townes, making ſuch ſhifts for their liues as the preſent neceſſitie could miniſter.

They ſlue fiue hundred, and chaſed the reſidue as ſaith Simon Dunel.

Whileſt the realme was thus troubled on ech ſide, archbiſhop Lanfranke ſendeth, writeth, and admoniſheth all the kings freends to make themſelues readie to defend their prince. And after he vnderſtood that they were aſſembled togither for that purpoſe, he counſelleth the king to march into the field with them ſpeedilie, to repreſſe his enimies. The king following his counſell, firſt appointed his nauie to ſcowre and keepe the ſeas, and to withſtand (if it were poſſible) the arriuall of his brother by faire words. Alſo he reconcileth Roger de Mountgomerie earle of Shrewſburie vnto him, and therewith maketh large promiſes to the Engliſh, that he would out of hand giue and reſtore vnto them ſuch fauourable lawes as they would wiſh or deſire. Moreouer he commanded all vniuſt impoſts, tolles and tallages to be laid downe, and granted free hunting in the woods, chaſes and forreſts. All which grants and promiſes he kept not long, though for the time he greatlie contented the people with ſuch a ſhew of good meaning towards them. This doone, he goeth with a mightie armie into Kent, where the ſedition began, and firſt comming to the caſtell of Tunbridge, he compelled capteine Gilbert to yeeld vp the fortreſſe into his hands. Then went he to Horne caſtell, where he heard ſaie Odo was (but the report was vntrue, for he had betaken himſelfe to the caſtell of Pemſey) which when he had ouerthrowne, he haſted forth vnto Pemſey, and beſieged the caſtell there a long ſeaſon, which the biſhop had ſtronglie fortified.

Wil. Malm.

During this time, and about the fiftieth daie after the beginning of the ſiege, word was brought to the king, that his brother duke Robert was landed at Southampton, and minded with all poſſible ſpeed to come to the ſuccour of the biſhop, and of other his freends, whom he and his power had not a little afflicted. ¶ Here authors varie: for ſome report that duke Robert came not ouer himſelfe at the firſt at all, but ſent a part of his armie, with a certeine number of ſhips, which encountring with the kings fleet, were diſcomfited. Others write that duke Robert hearing of the loſſe of his men, came after himſelfe, and landed with a mightie armie as before, which is moſt likelie. And certeinlie (as Gemeticen. affirmeth) he might eaſilie as then haue recouered England from his brother, if he had not lingred the time, conſidering that Euſtace earle of Bullongne, Odo biſhop of Baieux, and the earle of Mortaigne, with other lords of Normandie that were paſſed to England, had alreadie taken Rocheſter, and diuers other caſtels in the prouince of Canturburie, keeping the ſame a certeine time, ſtill looking that he ſhould haue come ouer to their aid, which he deferred to doo, till they were conſtreined by ſiege and lacke of neceſſarie ſuccor to returne into Normandie, leauing thoſe places which they had won vnto the king, and that to their great diſhonor. But howſoeuer it was, the king ſtill continued the ſiege before Pemſey caſtell, till Odo (through want of victuals) was glad to ſubmit himſelfe, and promiſed to cauſe the caſtell of Rocheſter to be deliuered: but at his comming thither, they within the citie ſuffered him to enter, and ſtreightwaies laid him faſt in priſon. Some iudge that it was doone vnder a colour by his owne conſent.

Simon Dun.

There were in Rocheſter a ſort of valiant gentlemen (the flower in maner of all Normandie) with Euſtace earle of Bolongne, and manie gentlemen of Flanders, which were in mind to defend the place againſt the king: who hearing what was doone, came with his armie and beſieged the citie of Rocheſter on ech ſide ſo ſharpelie, that they within were glad to deliuer it vp into his hands. Thus loſt biſhop Odo all his liuings and dignities in England, and ſo returned into Normandie, where vnder duke Robert he had the chéefe gouernement of the countrie committed vnto him.

After this he ouercame diuers of his enimies ſome by faire and ſome by fowle meanes. Notwithſtanding this, there yet remained the biſhop of Durham, one of the chéefe conſpirators, who withdrew himſelfe into the citie of Durham, there to lie in ſafetie, till he ſaw how the world would go: but being therein beſieged by the king, who came thither perſonallie, he was at length forced to ſurrender the citie, and yéeld himſelfe: wherevpon alſo he was exiled the land, with diuerſe of his complices. But within two yeares after, he was called home againe, and reſtored to his church, wherein he liued not long, but died for ſorrow, bicauſe he could not cléere himſelfe of offenſe in the ſaid rebellion, albeit that he laboured moſt earneſtlie ſo to doo, that he might thereby haue atteined to the kings fauor againe.

The biſhop of Durham exiled.

Whileſt theſe things were thus in hand, the archbiſhop Lanfranke falleth ſicke and dieth, in the 19. yeare after his firſt entring into the gouernment of the ſea of Canturburie. This Lanfranke (as ſhould ſéeme) was a wiſe, politike, and learned prelate, who whileſt he liued, mollified the furious and cruell nature of king William Rufus, inſtructing him to forbeare ſuch wild and outragious behauiours as his youthfulneſſe was inclined vnto: and moreouer perſuaded the Engliſh to obey the ſame king as their loiall prince, whereby they ſhould occaſion him to be their good lord and king, not vſing them rigorouſlie as his father had doon. So that Lanfranke could not well haue béene ſpared in the time of the rebellion, without great danger of ſubuerting the ſtate of the commonwealth. He builded two hoſpitals without the citie of Canturburie, for the reléefe of poore people and ſtrangers, the one of S. Iohn, the other at Harbaldowne. He aduanced the church of Rocheſter from foure ſecular clerkes, to the number of fiftie monkes: he repaired Chriſtes church in Canturburie, and the abbey of S. Albons, whereof he made one Paule that was his nephue abbat, which Paule gouerned that houſe by his vncles aſſiſtance greatlie to the aduancement thereof, as well in temporall as ſpirituall preferments, as it was then iudged. Likewiſe the ſaid Lanfranke was verie fortunate in the gouernement of his church and ſée of Canturburie, recouering ſundrie portions of lands and rents alienated from the ſame before his daies, inſomuch that he reſtored to that ſée 25. manors. For amongſt other, whereas Odo the Biſhop of Baieux, who alſo was Earle of Kent, bearing great rule in England vnder his nephue king William the Conquerour, had vſurped diuerſe poſſeſſions which belonged to the ſée of Canturburie, and had ſeized the franchiſes apperteining to the ſame Lanfranke, into his owne hands, by ſute and earneſt trauell he recouered the ſame, and being impleaded about that matter by the ſaid Odo, he ſo defended his cauſe, that in the end (though with much adoo) he had his will, and ſo remained in quiet poſſeſſion of his right after that ſo long as he liued, without any trouble or vexation concerning the ſaid poſſeſſions and liberties.

Lanfranke archbiſhop of Canturburie departeth this life.

Whereas alſo not onelie Walkhem the biſhop of Wincheſter, but diuerſe other biſhops in England were in mind to haue diſplaced monks out of their cathedrall churches, and to haue brought canons into their roomes, Lanfranke withſtood them, and would tollerate no ſuch diſlocation: an act at that time ſo well liked, that he was highlie commended for the ſame. After Lanfrankes death, the king began greatlie to forget himſelfe in all his dealings, inſomuch that he kept many concubines, and waxed verie cruell and inconſtant in all his doings, ſo that he became an heauie burthen vnto his people. For he was ſo much addicted to gather goods, that he conſidered not what perteined to the maieſtie of a king, inſomuch that nothing tending to his gaine, and the ſatiſfieng of his appetite, was eſtéemed of him vnlawfull, ſith he meaſured all things by the vncontrolled rule of his roialtie, and conſidered nothing what ſo high an office required. He kept the ſée of Canturburie foure yeares in his hands, to ſée who would giue moſt for it, in the meane time taking the profits thereof, and making the vttermoſt of the ſame that by any meanes could be deuiſed.

Lanfranke praiſed for holding with the monks.

The king giuen to ſenſuall luſt and couetouſneſſe.

The like he vſed when other benefices and abbeies were vacant, and furthermore that little which the prince ſpared, his officers and farmers, no leſſe couetous than he, conuerted to their aduantage: ſo that what by the king, and what by his procurators, the church of England was now ſore charged and fléeced of hir wealth. Diuerſe of hir prelates in like maner were not a little offended, to ſée their mother ſo ſpoiled of hir treaſure and liuelihood, inſomuch that they practiſed a redreſſe: and to begin withall, complained of the king to pope Vrban: but he was ſo buſied with other troubles of his owne néerer home, that he could haue no time to ſéeke meanes how to redreſſe enormities a far off, whereby the lands and goods belonging to the church here in England were ſtill waſtfullie ſpent and conſumed by the king and others, to whome he gaue or let them forth to farme at his owne pleaſure, and to his moſt commoditie.

But albeit the prince was of ſuch a diſpoſition by nature, yet there is one thing written of him which ought not to be forgotten, to admoniſh vs that there is no man of ſo euill an affection, but that ſometime he dealeth vprightlie, though it be by hap or other extraordinarie motion. It chanced that an abbeie was void of an abbat, wherein were two monkes verie couetous perſons aboue the reſt, and ſuch as by ſcraping and gathering togither, were become verie rich, for ſuch (ſaith Polydor) in thoſe daies mounted to preferment. Theſe two appointed to go togither to the court, ech hoping at their comming thither to find ſome meanes that he might be made abbat of that houſe. Being thus agréed, to the court they come, and there offer verie largelie to the king to obteine their ſute: who perceiuing their gréedie deſires, and caſting his eies about the chamber, eſpied by chance an other monke (that came to beare them companie, being a more ſober man, and ſimple after his outward appearance) whom he called vnto him, and aſked what he would giue him to be made abbat of the foreſaid abbeie. The monke after a little pauſe, made anſwere, that he would giue nothing at all for anie ſuch purpoſe, ſince he entred into that profeſſion of méere zeale to deſpiſe riches & all worldlie pompe, to the end he might the more quietlie ſerue God in holineſſe & puritie of conuerſation. Saieſt thou ſo, quoth the king, then art thou euen he that art worthie to gouerne this houſe: and ſtreightwaie he beſtowed the houſe vpon him, iuſtlie refuſing the other two, to their open infamie and reproch.

Simon Dun. warres betwixt the king and his brother Robert.

But to returne to our hiſtorie. After the expulſion of the biſhop of Durham, and other of his adherents, the king paſſed ouer into Normandie, purpoſing to depriue his brother of that dukedome, and being arriued there, he beſieged and tooke S. Valerie, Albemarle, and diuerſe other townes and caſtels, wherein he placed a number of his beſt ſouldiers, the better to mainteine warre againſt his foreſaid brother. Herevpon alſo the ſaid Robert ſent vnto the French king for aid, who came downe at his requeſt with a noble armie, and beſieged one of thoſe caſtels which king William had latelie woone; howbeit by ſuch meanes as king William made, in ſending to the French king an huge ſumme of monie, he raiſed his ſiege ſhortlie & returned home againe. At length a peace was concluded betwixt king William and the duke his brother, but yet verie diſhonorable to the ſaid Robert: for it was accorded, that king William ſhould reteine & ſtill inioy the countie of Ewe, with Feſcampe, the abbaſie of mount S. Michell, Chereburg, and all thoſe other places which he had woone & gotten out of his hands in this his late voiage. On the other ſide it was agreed, that king William ſhould aid the duke to recouer all other places beyond the ſeas, which belonged to their father. Alſo, that ſuch Normans as had loſt anie of their lands & liuings in England, for taking part with the duke in the late rebellion, ſhould be reſtored to the ſame. And furthermore, that whether ſoeuer of both ſhould die firſt, the ſuruiuer ſhould be his heire, and ſucceed in his dominions.

This peace was concluded at Caen, and that by procurement of the French king, at what time king William was verie ſtrong in the field neare vnto Ewe. After which concluſion, they vnited their powers, and beſieged their yoongeſt brother Henrie in the caſtell of mount S. Michell, which (being ſituat in the confines of Normandie and Britaine) he had ſtronglie fortified not long before for feare of afterclaps. But when they had lien about it by the ſpace of all the Lent ſeaſon, and had made manie bickerings with his men, more to their loſſe than lucre, they raiſed their ſiege, and voluntarilie departed. Not long after this, king William depriued Edgar Etheling of his honor, which duke Robert had aſſigned vnto him, baniſhing him out of Normandie for euer.

Sim. Duncl.

Shortlie after alſo the aforeſaid Henrie wan a ſtrong towne called Damfront, and furniſhing it at all points, he kept the ſame in his poſſeſſion as long as he liued, mauger both his brethren. Thus the war wared hot betweene thoſe three, howbeit ſuddenlie (I wot not vpon what occaſion) this Henrie was reconciled with king William and his brother Robert, ſo that all debates being quieted on euerie ſide, they were made friends and welwillers. King William alſo returned into England, hauing his brother Robert in his companie, all men reioiſing at their pacification and amitie, which happened in the yeare 1091. and fourth of the reigne of the king.

Toward the end whereof, and vpon the fift daie of October, a maruellous ſore tempeſt fell in ſundrie parts of England, but eſpeciallie in the towne of Winchcombe, where (by force of thunder and lightning) a part of the ſteeple of the church was throwne downe, and the crucifix with the image of Marie ſtanding vnder the rood-loft, was likewiſe ouerthrowne, broken, and ſhattered in peeces; then followed a foule, a noiſome, and a moſt horrible ſtinke in the church. On the 17. daie of the ſame moneth much harme was doone in London with an outragious wind, the violence whereof ouerturned and rent in peeces aboue fiue hundred houſes, at which time and tempeſt the roofe of S. Marie bowe church in cheape was alſo ouerthrowne, wherewith two men were ſlaine. Moreouer, at Saliſburie much hurt was doone with the like wind and thunder, for the top of the ſteeple and manie buildings beſides were ſore ſhaken and caſt downe. But now we will ſpeake ſomewhat of the doings of Scotland, as occaſion moueth. Whileſt (as yee haue heard) variance depended betweene king William and his brother duke Robert, the Scotiſh king Malcolme made ſore wars vpon the inhabitants of Northumberland, carrieng great booties and preies out of that countrie, which he inuaded euen to Cheſter in the ſtreet. Wherefore king William, ſoone after his returne, gathered his power togither, and ſped him northwards. But king Malcolme hearing of his puiſſance & great ſtrength ſent to him for peace, which was granted in the end.

Sim. Dun.

Some writers affirme, that king William prepared a great armie both by ſea and land againſt Malcolme; and that his nauie being abroad on the ſeas, was loſt by tempeſt, and the moſt part of his ſhips drowned; that the armie by land entring into Scotland, ſuffered manie damages through want of vittels, and ſo recoiled: finallie, that duke Robert lieng on the borders with an armie in his brothers name (wherby it ſhould appeare that the king himſelfe was not there) by the helpe and furtherance of Edgar Etheling, who then ſerued K. Malcolme in his wars, concluded a peace betwixt his brother and the ſaid Malcolme, vpon certeine articles, by vertue wherof certeine places in Northumberland were reſtored vnto Malcolme, which he had held in William Conquerours daies. Some other write in like maner, that king Malcolme did homage to king William and duke Robert that brought the ſaid Edgar Etheling into the fauour of the king.

Howſoeuer the truth of the ſtorie dooth ſtand in this behalfe, certeine it is, that the king returned out of Northumberland into the weſt parts of the realme, reteining ſtill with him duke Robert, who looked dailie when he ſhould performe ſuch couenants as were concluded vpon betwixt them in their late reconciliation. But when he ſaw that the king meant nothing leſſe than to ſtand to thoſe articles, and how he did onlie protract and delaie the time for ſome other ſecret purpoſe, he returned into Normandie in great diſpleaſure, and tooke with him the ſaid Edgar Etheling, of whom he alwaies made verie great account. Soone after king William returned into the north parts, and (as it chanced) he ſtaied a few daies about Carleil, where being delited with the ſituation of the towne (which had beene deſtroied by the Danes two hundred yeares before) he ſet workemen to repaire the ſame (meaning to vſe it in ſteed of a bulworke againſt the Scots on thoſe weſt borders) which when he had fenſed with walles, and builded a caſtell in the moſt conuenient place thereof, he cauſed churches and houſes to be erected for the benefit of ſuch people as he had determined to bring vnto the ſame. This being doone, he placed a colonie of ſouthren men there with their wiues and children, and gaue large priuileges vnto the towne, which they inioy at this daie.

The repairing and new peopling of Carleil.

Matth. Weſt.

¶ Here haue I thought good to aduertiſe you of an error in Matth. Weſt. crept in either through miſplacing the matter by means of ſome exemplifier, either elſe by the authors miſtaking his account of yeares, as 1072. for 1092. referring the repairing of Carleil vnto William Conquerour, at what time he made a iournie againſt the Scots in the ſaid yeare 1072. And yet not thus contented; to bewraie the error more manifeſtlie, he affirmeth, that the king exchanged the earledome of Cheſter with Raſe or Ranulfe de Micenis, alias Meſchines, for the earledome of Carleil, which the ſaid Meſchines held before, and had begunne there to build and fortifie that towne: whereas it is certeine that Ranulfe de Meſchines came to enioy the earledome of Cheſter by way of inheritance, as after ſhall appeare. For better profe whereof ye ſhall vnderſtand, that we find by ancient records, how one Hugh Lou or Lupus enioied the earledome of Cheſter all the daies of the Conqueror, and long after, which Hugh was ſonne to Richard earle of Auranges and the counteſſe Emma daughter of a noble man in Normandie named Herlowin, who maried Arlet the daughter of a burgeſſe in Falois, and mother to William Conquerour. So that the ſaid Hugh, being ſiſters ſonne to the Conqueror, receiued by gift at his hands the earldome of Cheſter, to hold of him as frélie by right of the ſword, as he held the realme of England in title of his crowne. For theſe be the words: Tenendum ſibi & hæredibus ita liberè ad gladium, ſicut ipſe (Rex) totam tenebat Angliam ad coronam.

Earle Hugh then eſtabliſhed in poſſeſſion of this earledome, with moſt large priuileges and fréedoms, for the better gouernement thereof, ordeined vnder him foure barons; namelie, his couſine Nigell or Neal baron of Halton, ſir Piers Malbanke baron of Nauntwich, ſir Euſtace * * baron of Malpaſſe, and ſir Warren Vernon baron of Shipbroke. Nigell held his baronie of Halton by ſeruice, to lead the Vauntgard of the earles armie when he ſhould make any iournie into Wales; ſo as he ſhould be the foremoſt in marching into the enimies countrie, and the laſt in comming backe: he was alſo coneſtable and marſhall of Cheſter. From this Nigell or Neal, the Lacies that were earles of Lincolne had their originall. When earle Hugh had gouerned the earledome of Cheſter the terme of 40. yeares, he departed this life, in the yeare 1107. He had iſſue by his wife Armetrida, Richard the ſecond earle of Cheſter after the conqueſt; Robert, abbat of Saint Edmundſburie: and Otwell, tutor to the children of king Henrie the firſt. Moreouer, the ſaid earle Hugh had a ſiſter named Margaret, that was maried to Iohn Bohun, who had iſſue by hir, Ranulfe Bohun, otherwiſe called Meſchines, which Ranulfe by that meanes came to enioy the earledome of Cheſter in right of his mother (after that earle Richard was drowned in the ſea) and not by exchange for the earledome of Carleil, as by this which we haue alreadie recited may ſufficientlie be proued.

Now to returne where we left. After that king William Rufus had giuen order for the building, fortifieng, and peopling of Carleil, he returned ſouthwards, and came to Gloceſter, where he fell into a gréeuous and dangerous ſickneſſe; ſo that he was in deſpaire and doubt of his life: wherefore he repented him of his former miſdéeds, and promiſed (if he eſcaped that dangerous ſickneſſe) to amend and become a new man. But when he had his health, that promiſe was quickelie broken, for his doings which were ſo bad and wicked before his ſickneſſe, being compared with thoſe which followed after his recouerie, might haue béene reputed good and ſufferable.

Anſelme elected archbiſhop of Canturburie.

Moreouer, whereas he reteined and kept in his hands the biſhoprike of Canturburie the ſpace of foure yeares, he now beſtowed it vpon Anſelme, who was before abbat of Bechellouin in Normandie; and for certeine abbeis which he had held long time in his poſſeſſion, he ordeined abbats: by meane whereof all men (but eſpeciallie the ſpiritualtie) began to conceiue a verie good opinion of him. The yere wherein Anſelme was thus elected, was from the birth of our Sauiour 1093. on the firſt of March, being the firſt ſundaie in Lent (as Eadmerus recordeth.) Furthermore he gaue the ſée of Lincolne (being void by the death of biſhop Remigius) to his councellour Robert Bluet; but afterward repenting himſelfe of ſuch liberalitie, in that he had not kept it longer in his hands towards the inriching of his coffers, he deuiſed a ſhift how to wipe the biſhops noſe of ſome of his gold, which he performed after this maner. He cauſed the biſhop to be ſued, quarelinglie charging him that he had wrongfullie vſurped certeine poſſeſſions, togither with the citie of Lincolne, which apperteined to the ſée of Yorke. Which although it was but a forged cauillation, and a ſhamefull vntruth; yet could not the biſhop be deliuered out of that trouble, till he had paid to the king fiue thouſand pounds. And as he dealt with the ſpiritualtie, ſo he cauſed diuerſe of the Nobilitie to be put to gréeuous fines, for tranſgreſſing of his lawes, though the fault were neuer ſo little. He alſo cauſed the archbiſhop Anſelme to paie him a great ſumme of monie, vnder colour of a contribution which was due in Lanfrankes daies, though it was certeinlie knowne that Lanfranke had paied it. Thus grew king William from time to time more ſharpe and rigorous to his ſubiects, ſo that whoſoeuer came within the danger of the laws, was ſure to be condemned; and ſuch as would plaie the promoters and giue informations againſt any man for tranſgreſſing the lawes, were highlie rewarded.

This yeare England and Normandie were ſore vexed with mortalitie both of men and beaſts, inſomuch that tillage of the ground was laid aſide in manie places, by reaſon wherof there folowed great dearth ⁊ famine. Manie grizelie and hideous ſights were ſeene alſo in England, as hoſts of men fighting in the aire, flaſhes of fier, ſtars falling from heauen, and ſuch like ſtrange wonders. About this time new occaſions of breach of amitie grew betwixt the king and his brother Robert, who accuſed him of periurie, for not obſeruing the articles of the laſt peace concluded betwixt them: wherefore he purpoſed to ſaile ouer into Normandie, and ſo came vnto Haſtings, about the firſt of Februarie, where he ſoiourned for a time, and cauſed the church of Battell abbeie to be dedicated in the honour of S. A peace concluded betwixt the king and his brother Robert.

After this, about midlent he paſſed ouer into Normandie with an armie, purpoſing to trie the matter with his brother in plaine battell, that thereby he might rather grow to ſome certeine point of loſſe or lucre, than to ſtand euer vpon vncerteinties, whether to haue peace or war, that he muſt be conſtreined to be at all times in a readineſſe to defend himſelfe. But after he was come into Normandie, ⁊ had forraied part of the countrie once or twice, he fell to a parle with his brother duke Robert, ⁊ in the end condeſcended to put the matter in compromiſe to the arbitrement of certeine graue perſons, whoſe iudgement the king reiected, bicauſe they gaue not ſentence on his ſide. Herevpon both parts prepared for war afreſh, inſomuch that the king perceiuing how his brother was aided by the French king, and that his power was too weake to withſtand them both, he ſent his commiſſion into England for the leuieng of 20. thouſand men, commanding that they ſhould be ſent ouer vnto him into Normandie by a daie, which was diligentlie performed. But as they were come togither abont Haſtings, readie to enter a ſhipboord, immediatlie commeth the kings lieutenant with a countermand, and ſignifieth to them, that the king minding to fauour and ſpare them for that iournie, would that euerie of them ſhould giue him 10. ſhillings (as Matt. In deed king William changing his mind, was now determined to end the matter with monie, and not with the ſword, as it afterward appeered: for by bribing of king Philip, in whome duke Robert had repoſed his whole truſt, he concluded peace vpon ſuch articles and conditions as he himſelfe required.

Robert earle of Northumberland refuſeth to come to the king.

Matth. Paris.

Hauing diſpatched his buſineſſe in Normandie, he returned into England, where he happened to meet with new and more dangerous wars: for the Welſhmen hearing of the variance betwixt the brethren, after their accuſtomed maner begin to inuade the Engliſh marſhes, taking booties of cattell, deſtroieng the countries, killing and ſpoiling many of the kings ſubiects, both Engliſh and Normans. After this (waxing proud of their good ſucceſſe) they beſieged the caſtell of Mountgomerie, where though the gariſon made ſtout reſiſtance for a time, yet in the end the enimie finding ſhift to ouerthrow the walles, entred perforce, and ſlue all that they found within. Wherewith though king William was offended when he heard of it, yet could he not remedie the matter as then, being troubled with a conſpiracie newlie kindled againſt him by Robert earle of Northumberland, who vpon diſpleaſure conceiued againſt him (bicauſe he was not rewarded nor thanked at his hands for his good ſeruice ſhewed in the killing of Malcolme king of Scotland) refuſed to come vnto him being ſent for by letters, and herewith began to practiſe with certeine other Noble men of that countrie, how to depoſe king William. But yer he could bring anie peece of his purpoſe to paſſe, the king hauing aduertiſement of his attempts, firſt appointed his brother the lord Henrie to go thither with an armie, and forthwith foloweth himſelfe; and comming to Newcaſtell, where the moſt part of his complices were aſſembled, he ſurpriſed them yer they could haue time to prouide for their ſafetie. That doone, he went to Tinmouth, and in the caſtell tooke the earles brother there, and after came to Banbourgh caſtell, which the ſaid earle with his wife and children did hold for their better ſafegard and defenſe.

Banbourgh yeelded to the king.

Some authors write, that when the king perceiued it would be hard for him to win Banbourgh caſtell (by reaſon of the great ſtrength thereof) without famine, he builded vp an other caſtell or baſtilion faſt by it, calling the ſame Maluoiſin, wherein he placed a great power of men, by whoſe meanes at length the earle was ſo narrowlie driuen, that when he ſought to haue eſcaped by night, he was eſpied, and therewith purſued ſo cloſelie by the kings ſouldiers, that he was forced to take ſanctuarie within the church of S. Oſwins at Tinmouth, from whence he was quicklie taken, and brought as priſoner to the kings preſence. Notwithſtanding, thoſe that remained within the caſtell, vpon truſt of the ſtrength of that place, would not yeeld by anie meanes; but ſtood ſtill to their tackling: wherevpon the king cauſed the earle their maiſter to be brought foorth before the gates, and threatned that he ſhould haue his eies put out, if they within did not ſtreightwaies giue vp the hold into his hands. Herevpon it came to paſſe, that the caſtell was yeelded, and thoſe that kept it were diuerſlie puniſhed, ſome by baniſhment, ſome by loſing their eares, ⁊ diuerſe by the loſſe of their hands, in example to others. The earle himſelfe was conueied to Windſor caſtell, and there committed to priſon.

The earle of Ewe.

Some write that the meaning of the earle and his complices (amongſt whom was William earle of Ewe, who renouncing his allegiance to Robert duke of Normandie, was become the kings man) was to haue diſplaced the king from his roiall throne, and to haue ſet vp his ſonne William de Albemarle, whome he had begotten of his concubine. But whatſoeuer their purpoſe was, after that the king had quieted his countrie in the north parts, he bent all his force againſt the Welſhmen, who the yeare before had deſtroied and ouerthrowne the caſtell of Moungomerie, and ſlaine the Normans that laie there in gariſon to defend it, whereat he was verie much offended, & therefore entering into Wales, he began to ſpoile and waſt the countrie. For he ſaw that the Welſhmen would not ioine in battell with him in the plaine field, but kept themſelues ſtill aloofe within the woods and mariſhes, and aloft vpon mountaines: albeit oftentimes when they ſaw aduantage, they would come forth, and taking the Engliſhmen and Normans at vnawares, kill manie, and wound no ſmall numbers, he ſtill purſued them by hils and dales, though more to the loſſe of his owne people than the hurt of the Welſhmen, who eaſilie eſchewed the danger of battell, and ſtill at the ſtraites and comberſome paſſages diſtreſſed manie of their enimies: whereby the king at length perceiuing that he could not preuaile againſt them, ceaſſed further to follow on with his purpoſed voiage, and therewith returned home, not without ſome note of diſhonor.

The councell of Clermount.

In like maner, pope Urban calling a councell at Clermount in Auergne, exhorted the chriſtian princes ſo earneſtlie to make a iourneie into the holieland, for the recouerie thereof out of the Saracens hands, that the ſaid great and generall iournie was concluded vpon to be taken in hand; wherein manie Noble men of chriſtendome went vnder the leading of Godfray of Bullion, and others, as in the chronicles of France, of Germanie, and of the holie land dooth more plainlie appeare. There went alſo among other diuers Noble men forth of this relme of England, ſpeciallie that worthilie bare the ſurname of Beauchampe. Robert duke of Normandie minding alſo to go the ſame iournie, and wanting monie to furniſh and ſet forth himſelfe, morgaged his duchie of Normandie to his brother king William, for the ſumme of ten thouſand pounds. About this time another occaſion was offered vnto king William, to laie a new paiment vpon his ſubiects, ſo gréeuous and intollerable, as well to the ſpiritualtie as the temporaltie, that diuerſe biſhops and abbats, who had alreadie made away ſome of their chalices and church iewels to paie the king, made now plaine anſwer that they were not able to helpe him with any more. Unto whom on the other ſide (as the report „ went) the king ſaid againe; Haue you not (I beſéech „ you) coffins of gold and ſiluer full of dead mens „ bones? Meaning the ſhrines wherein the relikes of ſaints were incloſed. Which (as his words ſéemed to import) he would haue had them conuert into monie, therewith to helpe him in that néed, iudging it no ſacrilege, though manie did otherwiſe eſtéeme it, conſidering (as he pretended) that it was gathered for ſo godlie an vſe, as to mainteine warres againſt Infidels and enimies of Chriſt.

But bicauſe he would not leaue this for an example to be followed of his ſucceſſours, he granted to the church of Canturburie the profits and reuenues of his manour of Petteham, vnto the vſe of the ſame church for the terme of ſeauen yeares, which amounted to the ſumme of thirtie pounds yearelie in thoſe daies.

Waterford in Ireland made a biſhoprike.

About the ſame time, the citizens of Waterford in Ireland, perceiuing that by reaſon of the great multitude of people in that citie, it was neceſſarie for them to haue a biſhop, obteined licence of their king and rulers to erect in their citie a biſhops ſée, and beſought them that it might pleaſe them to write vnto Anſelme the archbiſhop of Canturburie their primate, to haue his conſent therein, ſo as it might ſtand with his pleaſure to inſtitute and ordeine ſuch a one biſhop, to haue gouernement of their church, as they ſhould name, knowing him to be a man of ſuch learning, knowledge, diſcretion, and worthines, as were fit for the roome. Herevpon were letters ſent by meſſengers from Murcherdach king of Ireland vnto Anſelme, informing him of the whole matter: wherein one Malchus was commended and preſented vnto him to be admitted and conſecrated, if he thought good. Theſe letters were ſubſcribed with the hands, not onelie of king Murcherdach, but alſo of his brother duke Dermeth, biſhop Duſnald, Idiman biſhop of Methe, Samuell biſhop of Dublin, Ferdomnachus biſhop of Laginia or Leiniſter, and many others both of the ſpiritualtie and temporaltie.

But to the purpoſe, king William after his returne into England, remembring what damage he had ſuſteined two yéeres before at the hands of the Welſhmen, determined eftſoones to inuade their countrie, and therefore doubling his power, commeth into the marſhes, pitcheth his field, and conſulteth with his capteines what order he were beſt to vſe in that his enterpriſe, for the taming of his enimies. The Welſhmen hearing of the kings approch, and that his armie was farre greater than the laſt which he brought into their countrie, fell to their wonted policie, and got them into the woods, there to lie in wait, truſting more to the aduantage of ſtarting holes, than to their owne force & puiſſance.

King William, being ſtill inflamed with ire, for that he could not haue his will, determined with continuall warres to wearie the rebellious ſtomachs of the Welſhmen: and therefore was fired firſt to ſet vpon them of Angleſey, which being an Ile enuironed with the ſea, was euer a refuge for them when they were ſharpelie purſued. This enterpriſe was chéeflie committed vnto Hugh earle of Shrewſburie and Arundell, and to Hugh earle of Cheſter, who at their firſt comming wan the Ile, and tempered the victorie with great crueltie and bloudſhed, putting out the eies of ſome, cutting off the noſes, the armes, or hands of others, and ſome alſo they gelded. Moreouer (as authors write) the ſaid earle of Shreweſburie made a kenell of the church of Saint Fridancus, laieng his hounds within it for the night time, but in the morning he found them all raging wood. How true ſo euer this report is I wote not, but ſhortlie after they had executed (in maner as before is ſaid) ſuch ſtrange kinds of crueltie in that Ile, it chanced that a nauie of rouers came thither from the Iles of Orkney, whoſe chéefe admirall was named Magnus, who incountring with the ſaid earle of Shreweſburie, ſhot him into the eie with an arrow, which part of his body remained bare and vnarmed, ſo that by & by he fell downe dead out of his ſhip into the ſea. When Magnus beheld this, he ſaid ſcornefullie in the Daniſh toong, Leit loupe, that is; Let him leape now: the Engliſh neuertheleſſe had the victorie at that time (as ſome write) and ouercame their enimies with great ſlaughter and bloudſhed. The king goeth ouer into Normandie.

The king being thus at quiet and without warre in all places, began now to ſet his mind on building, and firſt cauſed new walles to be made about the tower of London, and alſo laid the foundation of Weſtminſter hall, which though it be a verie large and roomthie place, yet after it was finiſhed at his returne out of Normandie, he came to view it, and held his court therein with great pompe and honor. He repented that he had made it no larger, ſaieng; it was too little by the halfe, and therefore determined to haue made a new, and that this other ſhould haue ſerued but for a dining chamber. A diligent ſearcher (ſaith Matthew Paris) might yet find out the foundation of the hall, which he had purpoſed to build, ſtretching from the Thames ſide vnto the common ſtréet. But though thoſe his buildings were great ornaments to the realme, yet bicauſe he tooke vp monie by extortion of his ſubiects towards the charges of the ſame, he was euill ſpoken of; the report being ſpred, that he ſhould take them in hand but onelie vnder a colour to ſpoile his ſubiects, in gathering a far greater ſumme than the expenſes of them did amount vnto. About the ſame time that king William beganne theſe buildings, he went ouer into Normandie, to vnderſtand in what ſtate that countrie ſtood.

After the king had diſpatched his buſineſſe in Normandie, & was returned into England (as he was making prouiſion to ride forth on hunting) a meſſenger came ſuddenlie vnto him, bringing word, that the citie of Mans was beſieged, and like to be ſurpriſed. The king was then at dinner, meaning firſt to make an end thereof, and after to take aduice in that matter: but being reprooued by the meſſenger, for that to the great danger of his ſubiects which were beſieged he paſſed not to make delaies, rather than to go and ſuccour them with all ſpéed, he taketh the mans blunt ſpéech in ſo good part, that he called ſtraightwaie for maſons to breake downe the wall, to the end he might paſſe through the next way, and not be driuen to ſtep ſo farre out of his path, as to go forth by the doores; and ſo without any long aduiſement taken in the cauſe, he rode ſtraightwaie to the ſea, ſending his lords a commandement to follow; who when they came in his preſence, counſelled him to ſtaie till his people were aſſembled. Howbeit he would not giue eare to their aduice in that point, but ſaid; Such as loue me, I know well will follow me, and ſo went a ſhipboord, ſetting apart all doubts of perils; and yet was the weather verie darke, rough and cloudie, inſomuch that the maiſter of the ſhip was afraid, and willed him to tarrie till the wind did ſettle in ſome quiet quarter: but hée commanded to hoiſe vp ſailes, and to make all ſpéed that could be for life, incouraging the ſhipmaiſter with theſe words, that he neuer heard as yet of anie king that was drowned.

Thus paſſing the ſeas, he landed in Normandie, where he gathered his power, and made towards Mans. When thoſe which held the ſiege before the citie, heard of his approch, they brake vp their campe and departed thence: howbeit, the capteine named Helias, that pretended by title and right to be earle of Mans, was taken by a traine, and brought before the king, who ieſted at him, as though he had béene but a foole and a coward. Wherevpon, the ſaid Helias kindled in wrath, boldlie ſaid vnto him; Whereas „

Howbeit ſome write, that he was not taken at all, but eſcaped by flight. To procéed, king William being returned into England, and puffed vp with pride of his victories, and now ſéeing himſelfe fullie deliuered from all troubles of warre, began after his old manner to ſpoile and waſt the countrie by vnreaſonable exactions, tributes and paiments.

Variance betwixt the king and the archbiſhop Anſelme.

Herevpon fell a great controuerſie betwéene Anſelme and the king, who pretended a reproch of cruell ſurcharging of his commons with ſubſidies, lones, and vnreaſonable fines: but the chéefe cauſe was, for that he might not call his ſynods, nor correct the biſhops, but all to be doone as the king would. The king alſo chalenged the inueſtiture of prelates, and indéed ſore taxed both the ſpiritualtie and temporaltie, ſpending the monie vpon the reparations and buildings of the Tower, & Weſtminſter hall, as is before remembred. Beſides this, his ſeruants ſpoiled the Engliſh of their goods by indirect meanes: but eſpeciallie one Rafe ſometime chaplaine vnto William the Conquerour, & at this time the kings proctor and collector of his taſkes and ſubſidies was ſo malicious & couetous, that in ſtéed of two taſkes, he would leuie thrée, pilling the rich, and powling the poore, ſo that manie through his cruell dealing were oftentimes made to forfeit their lands for ſmall offenſes: and by his meanes alſo diuerſe biſhoprikes were bought and ſold as other kinds of merchandizes, whereby he was in ſingular fauour with the king.

The clergie out of order.

The clergie alſo were vſed verie ſtreightlie, and (as I ſuppoſe) not without good cauſe; for ſuerlie in thoſe daies it was far out of order, not onelie in couetous practiſes, but in all kinds of worldlie pompe and vanitie: for they had vp buſhed and braided perukes, long ſide garments verie gorgeous, gilt girdels, gilt ſpurs, with manie other vnſéemelie diſorders in attire.

Math. Paris.

To be ſhort, the contention grew ſo hot betwixt the king and Anſelme, who would alſo haue corrected ſuch vices in the clergie (as ſome write) that in the end the archbiſhop was quite caſt out of fauour.

A thouſand markes demanded of Anſelme.

Eadmerus.

There are which alledge the verie firſt and originall occaſion of their falling out to be, for that the archbiſhop denied to paie a thouſand marks of ſiluer at his requeſt: in conſideration of the kings great beneuolence ſhewed in preferring him to his ſée, whereas the archbiſhop iudged the offenſe of ſimonie, to reſt as well in giuing after his promotion receiued, as if he had bribed him aforehand, and therefore refuſed to make anie ſuch paiment: but yet (as Eadmerus writeth) he offered him fiue hundred pounds of ſiluer, which would not be receiued, for the king was informed by ſome of his councell, that the archbiſhop (in conſideration of his bountious liberalitie extended towards him) ought rather to giue him two thouſand pounds, than fiue hundred, adding, that if he would but change his countenance, and giue him no fréendlie lookes for a while, he ſhould perceiue that Anſelme would ad to the firſt offer, other fiue hundred pounds. But Anſelme was ſo far from being brought to the kings lure with ſuch fetches, that openlie to the kings face he told him, that better it ſhould be for his maieſtie to receiue of him a ſmall ſumme granted of him with a frée and franke hart, ſo as he might helpe him eftſoones with more, than to take from him a great deale at once, without his good will, in ſuch ſort as if he were his bondman. For your grace (ſaith he) may haue me, and all that is mine, to ſerue your turne with fréendlie beneuolence: but in the waie of ſeruitude and bondage you ſhall neither haue me nor mine. With which words the king was in maruellous choler, and therewith ſaid in anger: Well then, „ get thée home, take that which is thine to thy ſelfe, „ that which I haue of mine owne I truſt will ſuffice „ me. The archbiſhop béeing on his knées, roſe herewith „ and departed, reioiſing in his mind that the king had refuſed his offer, whereby he was deliuered out of ſuſpicion to haue bribed the king, and giuen him that monie in waie of reward for his preferment to the miter, as of malicious men would happilie haue béene conſtrued.

Math. Paris.

Wherevpon béeing after laboured to double the ſumme, he vtterlie refuſed, and determining rather to forſake the realme than to commit ſuch an offenſe, made ſuit to the king for licence to go to Rome to fetch his pall of the pope.

The king could not abide to heare the pope named.

The king hearing the pope named, waxed maruellous angrie: for they of Rome began alreadie to demand donations and contributions, more impudentlie than they were hitherto accuſtomed. And as it chanced, there was a ſchiſme at that time in the church, by reaſon the emperour Henrie had placed a pope of his owne aduancing (namely Wibteth archbiſhop of Rauenna) againſt pope Vrban: for the emperour mainteined that it belonged to his office onlie to elect and aſſigne what pope it pleaſed him.

King William therefore conceiued diſpleaſure againſt Vrban, who withſtood the emperours pretenſe, and alledged by the like, that no archbiſhop or biſhop within his realme ſhould haue reſpect to the church of Rome, nor to anie pope, with whome they had nothing to doo, either by waie of ſubiection, or otherwiſe; ſith the popes wandered out of the ſteps which Peter trode, ſéeking after bribes, lucre, and worldlie honor. He ſaid alſo that they could not reteine the power to loſe and bind, which they ſometime had, ſince they ſhewed themſelues nothing at all to follow his moſt vertuous life and holie conuerſation. He added furthermore, that for himſelfe, ſithens the conuerſion of the realme to the chriſtian faith, he had as great authoritie, franchiſes and liberties within the ſame, as the emperour had in his empire. And what hath the pope then to doo (quoth he) in the empire, or in my kingdome touching temporall liberties, whoſe dutie it is to be carefull for the ſoule of man, and to ſée that hereſies ſpring not vp, which if the prelates of the prouince be not able to reforme, then might the pope doo it, either by himſelfe or his legats.

Eadmerus.
The kings demand to Anſelme.

Againe, by reaſon of the ſchiſme, & for the diſpleaſure that he bare pope Vrban, he aſked Anſelme of which pope he would require his pall, ſith he was ſo haſtie to go to Rome for it: Wherto Anſelme anſwered, that he would require it of pope Vrban. Which words when the king had heard, he ſaid, I haue not as yet admitted him pope: adding further that it was againſt the cuſtome vſed either in his or his fathers time, that anie man within the realme of England ſhould name or obeie anie man for pope, without the kings licence and conſent, ſaieng moreouer, that if the ſaid Anſelme would ſéeke to take that prerogatiue and dignitie from him, it ſhould be all one, as if he ſhould go about to take awaie from him his crowne, and all other rotall dignitie. Wherevnto Anſelme anſwered, that at Rocheſter (before he was conſecrated biſhop) he had declared his mind therein, and that béeing abbat of Bechellouin in Normandie, he had receiued Vrban for pope; ſo that whatſoeuer chanced, he might reuolt from his obedience and ſubiection.

The king béeing the more kindled herewith, proteſted in plaine words, that Anſelme could not kéepe his faith and allegiance towards him, and his obedience alſo to the ſée of Rome, againſt his will and pleaſure. But (to conclude) this matter went ſo far in controuerſie betwixt the king and the biſhop, that a councell was called at Rockingham in Rutlandſhire, and there in the church within the caſtell, the matter was earneſtlie decided, and much adoo on euerie ſide, to haue conſtreined Anſelme to renounce his opinion, but he would not. Wherfore it was then deuiſed, that if he would not agrée to the kings pleaſure, they would by and by ſée if they might by any meanes depriue him: but Anſelme ſtill held hard, and could not be feared by all theſe threats; and in like maner to iudge of an archbiſhops cauſe, the other biſhops concluded that they had no authoritie.

Moreouer, while the matter was in conſultation among the biſhops, another of the kings councell that was a knight, came before Anſelme in place where he ſat almoſt alone, to looke for an anſwer by them from the king, which knight knéeling downe before the archbiſhop, ſpake theſe words vnto him: Reuerend father, your humble children beſéech your Grace not to haue your heart troubled with theſe things which you heare; but call to remembrance that bleſſed man Iob, vanquiſhing the diuell on the dunghill, and reuenging Adam whome he had ouercome in paradiſe. Which words the archbiſhop conſidering with a fréendlie countenance, perceiued that the minds of the people remained on his ſide, whereof both he and ſuch as were about him, were right ioifull and greatlie comforted, hauing hope (according to the ſcripture) that the * voice of the people was the voice of God. When the king vnderſtood all theſe things, he was marueilouſlie diſquieted in mind, and therefore perceiuing that the biſhops and other of his councell had promiſed more than they could performe, he blamed them for it: vnto whom the biſhop of Durham that was the chéefe dooer in this matter, framed this anſwer: He ſpake ſo faintlie (quoth he) and ſo coldlie at the firſt, that he ſéemed not to haue any ſtore of wit or wiſdome.

* If they be Gods people.

Finallie, the matter was deferred vntill the next morning, and then the ſaid biſhop of Durham, alledging that they could not well ouercome him by arguments, ſo long as he grounded his opinion in ſuch ſort vpon the ſcripture, and the authoritie of Saint Peter; The beſt way therefore (ſaid he) ſhall be, to compell him by force, either to agrée to the kings mind, or elſe to depriue him of his ring and ſtaffe, and after baniſh him the realme. But the lords of the councell allowed not the biſhops words herein. Well (ſaith the king) and what other way will you thinke good, if this like you not: ſo long as I may liue, I will not ſurelie ſuffer any to be my péere within my realme: and if you knew his cauſe to be ſo good, why did you ſuffer me to commenſe this action againſt him: go your waies therefore, and take aduice togither, for by Gods face (for that was his oth) if you condemne him not at my will, I will reuenge my ſelfe vpon you. Neuertheleſſe, when he was informed, that bicauſe he was an archbiſhop, they had no power to iudge or condemne him, though his cauſe prooued neuer ſo euill, which they could not perceiue ſo to be; he told them yet they might at the leaſtwiſe renounce their obedience to him, and forſake his companie, which they ſaid they might doo. Then doo it (ſaith the king) with ſpéed, that he may (when he ſhall ſée himſelfe abandoned, and deſpiſed of all men) repent that he hath followed Vrban, and neglected me his ſoueraigne lord and maiſter. And that ye may doo it the more ſafelie, firſt of all I depriue him of the ſuertie and allegiance which he may pretend to haue of me within all my dominions, and from henceforth I will haue no affiance in him, nor take him for an archbiſhop.

The king renounceth the archbiſhop for his ſubiect.

The biſhops would faine haue perſuaded Anſelme to haue ſhewed himſelfe conformable to the kings pleaſure, and therefore tooke paines with him earneſtlie in that behalfe, but all would not ſerue. He anſwered indéed verie curteouſlie, but his benefice he would not renounce, as touching the name and office, though in exterior things he were neuer ſo much diſquieted. The king perceiuing him to ſtand ſtiffe in his opinion, ſaid vnto his lords; His words are euer contrarie to my mind, and I will not take him for my freend, whoſoeuer dooth fauour him. I ſhall therefore require you that be péeres of my realme, to renounce all the faith and fréendſhip which you beare him, that he may ſée what he hath gained by that allegiance, which (to the offending of my perſon) he obſerueth to the apoſtolike ſée. Whereto the lords anſwered; As for vs, we were neuer his men, and therefore we cannot abiure any fealtie which we neuer acknowledged. He is our archbiſhop, and hath rule in matters perteining to chriſtian religion within this land, for which cauſe we that are chriſtians may not refuſe his authoritie whileſt we remaine here on earth, bicauſe he is attainted with no blemiſh of any heinous crime, which may conſtreine vs otherwiſe to doo. The king refrained and diſſembled his wrath, leaſt he ſhould prouoke them to further diſpleaſure by ſpeaking againſt their reaſon.

The biſhops driuen to their ſhifts how to ſhape an anſwer.

The biſhops were ſore abaſhed hereat, and driuen to a ſhrewd pinch. Now when, not long after, the king required to know of euerie of them apart, whether they vtterlie renounced all maner of ſubiection and obedience vnto Anſelme without any condition intermitted, or elſe that onelie which he did pretend by authoritie of the pope: the biſhops making anſwer diuerſlie herevnto, the king appointed thoſe to ſit downe by him as faithfull ſubiects, who acknowledged, that their renuntiation was abſolutelie made, without intermitting of any condition: as for the other, who proteſted that they renounced their ſubiection and obedience vnto him onelie in that which he preſumed vpon in the behalfe of the pope, he commanded them to go aſide, and to remaine in a corner of the houſe to heare the ſentence of their condemnation pronounced.

The meane to pacifie ẏ king.

Wherefore being put in a maruellous feare, they withdrew themſelues aſide, but yet ſtraightwaies they deuiſed a ſhift wherewith they had béene well acquainted before, as followeth. They preſented to the king a great maſſe of monie to appeaſe his wrath, and ſo thereby were reſtored to his fauour. Anſelme notwithſtanding was obſtinate in his opinion, ſo that in the end, the ſentence touching this controuerſie betwixt him and the king, was reſpited till the octaues of Pentecoſt next inſuing. All this was notified well inough to the pope, who vſed the matter with ſuch moderation, that by ſecret aduertiſements giuen, he tooke awaie from his brethren all rigorous waies of procéedings, saieng;

But yet the kings enmitie towards Anſelme was openlie declared, and that chéefelie for the deniall of the monie which he demanded; but at length he got it, though not with any frée hart or goodwill of the archbiſhop: inſomuch that the king reputed him giltie of treaſon. Within a few daies after, Walter biſhop of Alba, bringing to him his pall, verie wiſelie reconciled the pope and the king. Notwithſtanding all this, Anſelme could not purchaſe the kings goodwill to his contentment, though he wiſelie diſſembled for the time: ſo that when the biſhop of Alba ſhould returne to Rome, he made ſute for licence to go with him. Neuertheleſſe, the king offered him, that if he would deſiſt from his purpoſe, and ſweare vpon the euangeliſts neither to go to Rome, nor to appeale in any cauſe to the popes court, he might and ſhould liue in quietneſſe frée from all danger: but if he would not be ſo contented, he might and ſhould depart at his perill, without hope to returne hither againe. For ſurelie (ſaith he) if he go, I will ſeize the archbiſhoprike into mine owne hands, and receiue him no more for archbiſhop.

Anſelme herewith departing from the court, came to Canturburie, declaring openlie what had bin ſaid vnto him, and immediatlie ſought to flee out of the realme in the night, prouiding for himſelfe a ſhip at Douer. But his purpoſe being reuealed to the king, one William Warlewaſt the kings ſeruant was ſent after him, and finding him readie to depart, tooke from him all that he had, & gaue him a free paſport out of the land. Anſelme repairing to Rome, made vnto pope Vrban a greeuous information againſt the king, declaring into what miſerable ſtate he had brought the Realme, and that for want of aſſiſtance in his ſuffragans it laie not in him to reforme the matter.

Indeed we find not that any of the biſhops held with Anſelme in the controuerſie betwixt him and the king, Ranulph biſhop of Chicheſter excepted, who both blamed the king, and rebuked all ſuch biſhops as had refuſed to ſtand with Anſelme, and fauoured the king in caſes concerning the foreſaid variance. Moreouer, the ſame biſhop of Chicheſter withſtood the king and his officers in taking fines of preeſts for the crime of fornication; by reaſon of which preſumption, the king became ſore offended with him, & found meanes to ſuſpend many churches of his dioceſſe. Howbeit in the end, the biſhop demeaned himſelfe in ſuch wiſe, that he had his owne will, and his church doores were opened againe, which had beene ſtopped vp before with thornes. Beſides this, the king was contented, that the ſaid biſhop ſhould haue the fines of preeſts in crimes of fornication within his dioceſſe, and enioy many other priuileges in right of his church. But how beneficiall ſo euer he was vnto the ſee of Chicheſter, true it is (as Polydor writeth) that he let out diuers abbeies, and the biſhoprike of Wincheſter and Saliſburie, with the archbiſhoprike of Canturburie vnto certeine perſons that farmed the ſame at his hands for great ſummes of monie, in ſo much that (beſide the ſaid ſees of Canturburie, Wincheſter, and Saliſburie, which at the time of his death he kept in his hands) he alſo receiued the profits of eleuen abbeies which he had let out, or otherwiſe turned to his moſt aduantage.

Robert Loſaunge, of ſome called Herbert, that ſometime had bin abbat of Ramſey, and then biſhop of Thetford by gift of a thouſand pounds to the king (as before ye haue heard) repented him, for that he was inueſted by the king, who after he had bewailed his offenſe, went to Rome, and did penance for the ſame in all points as the pope enioined him. Which being doone, he returned into England, remoouing yer long his ſee from Thetford to Norwich, where he founded a faire monaſterie of his owne charges, and not of the churches goods (as ſome ſay) wherein is a doubt, conſidering he was firſt an abbat, and after a biſhop.

About this time, by the meanes of Stephan Harding a Monke of Shireborne, an Engliſhman, the order of Ciſteaux or white moonkes had his beginning within the countrie of Burgongne, as witneſſeth Ranulph the moonke of Cheſter: but other writers (as Iacob. Philippus) ſay that this Stephan was the ſecond abbat of that place, and that it was founded by one Robert abbat of Molmenſe, in the yeare of Grace 1098. This order was after brought into England by one called Walter Eſpeke, who founded the firſt abbeie of that religion within this relme at Riuall, about the yeare of Grace 1131.

But to returne againe to the king, who ſtill continued in his wilfull couetouſneſſe, pulling from the rich and welthie, to waſte and ſpend it out in all exceſſe, vaine riot, and gifts beſtowed on ſuch as had leaſt deſerued the ſame. And yet he was warned by manie ſtrange woonders (as the common people did deſcant) to reſtraine from theſe euill doings: for the Thames did riſe with ſuch high ſprings and tides, that manie townes were drowned, and much hurt doone in places about London, and elſewhere. Diuerſe rare things happened alſo at the ſame time, which I paſſe ouer. But the king hearing hereof, did nothing regard thoſe which were ſo bold as to tell him that they were euident ſignifications of ſome vengeance to follow therevpon. The king alſo himſelfe on a night as he ſlept & dreamed, thought that the veines of his armes were broken, and that the bloud iſſued out in great abundance. Likewiſe, he was told by Robert Fitz Hammon, that a monke ſhould dreame in his ſleepe, how he ſaw the king gnaw the image of Chriſt crucified with his teeth, and that as he was about to bite awaie the legs of the ſame image, Chriſt with his feet ſhould ſpurne him downe to the ground, inſomuch that as he lay on the earth, there came out of his mouth a flame of fire, and ſuch abundance of ſmoke, that the aire was darkened therewith. But the king made a ieſt of theſe and the like tales; He is a right moonke (ſaith he) and to haue a peece of monie, he dreameth ſuch things, giue him therefore an hundred ſhillings, and bid him dreame of better fortune to our perſon. Neuertheleſſe, the king was ſomewhat mooued herewith in the end, and doubted whether he ſhould go into the New forreſt to hunt on Lammas day (as he had purpoſed) or no, bicauſe his freends councelled him not to trie the truth of dreames to his owne loſſe and hinderance. Wherevpon he forbare to go foorth before dinner, but when he had dined and made himſelfe merrie with receiuing more drinke than commonlie he vſed to doo, abroad he got him into the forreſt with a ſmall traine: amongſt whom was one ſir Walter Tirell a French knight, whom he had reteined in ſeruice with a large ſtipend.

Sir walter Tirell.

This ſir Walter chanced to remaine with the king, when all the reſt of the companie was diſperſed here and there, as the maner in hunting is. Now as the ſunne began to draw lowe, the king perceiuing an hart to come alongſt by him, ſhot at the ſame, and with his arrow ſtroke him; but not greatlie hurting him, the beaſt ran awaie. The king, to marke which way the hart tooke, and the maner of his hurt, held vp his hand betweene the ſunne and his eies; who ſtanding in that ſort, out came another hart, at whom as ſir Walter Tirell let driue an arrow, the ſame by glanſing ſtroke the king into the breſt; ſo that he neuer ſpake word, but breaking off ſo much of the arrow as appeared out of his bodie, he fell downe, and giuing onelie one grone, immediatlie died, without more noiſe or mouing. Sir Walter running to him, and perceiuing no ſpeech nor ſenſe to remaine in him, ſtraitwaies got to his horſſe, and riding awaie, eſcaped and ſaued himſelfe: for few there were that purſued him, euerie man being amazed at the chance, ſome departing one waie, and ſome another, euerie one for his owne aduantage and commoditie, as the time then ſerued. The dead bodie of the king was ſtraight conueied to Wincheſter, and there buried the morrow after, which was the ſecond day of Auguſt, the yere of our Lord 1100. To this end came king William, after he had reigned almoſt 13. yeares, and liued 43. and ſomewhat more.

The king ſlaine.

Wil. Malm.

This prince, although euill reported of by writers for the couetous taſking of his ſubiects, and reteining of eccleſiaſticall liuings in his hands; yet was he endued with manie noble and princelie qualities. He had good knowledge in feats of warre, and could well awaie with bodilie labour. In all his affaires he was circumſpect; of his promiſe, truſtie; of his word, ſtedfaſt; and in his wars no leſſe diligent than fortunate. He gaue to the moonkes called Monachi de charitate in Southwarke, the great new church of S. Sauiour of Bermondſay, and alſo Bermondſeie it ſelfe. He founded a goodlie hoſpitall in the citie of Yorke, called S. Leonards, for the ſuſtentation and finding of the poore as well brethren as ſiſters. Towards ſouldiers and men of warre he was verie liberall, and to enrich them, he paſſed not for taking from farmers and huſbandmen what ſoeuer could be gotten. He was indeed of a prodigall nature, and therefore when in the begining of his reigne, doubting ſome troubles, he had aſſembled manie men of warre for his defenſe, there was nothing that they could aſke which he would denie them, in ſomuch that his fathers treaſures were ſoone conſumed, by reaſon whereof he was put to his ſhifts to prouide more. For though ſubſtance wanted to ſhew his liberalitie, yet there failed not in him a mind ſtill to be bountifull, ſith continuall vſe of giuing rewards, was in manner turned in him to a nature, ſo that to furniſh himſelfe with monie and neceſſaries, he was put to extremities vnbeſeeming a king; and to beſtow his beneuolence vpon ſome, he ſpared not to impouriſh others. For in ſuch ſort he was liberall, that therewith he was prodigall; and in ſuch wiſe ſtout of courage, as proud withall; and in ſuch maner ſeuere, as he ſeemed cruell and inexorable. But what meanes he vſed to make his beſt of benefices and ſpirituall liuings, partlie appeereth before.

The liberall hart of king William.

In deed ſuch was his condition, that who ſoeuer would giue, might haue, & that oftentimes without reſpect, whether their ſute was reaſonable and allowable or not, in ſomuch that it is ſaid of him, that being in Roan on a time, there came to him diuerſe Iewes who inhabited that citie, complaining to him, that diuerſe of their nation had renounced their Iewiſh religion, and were become chriſtians: wherefore they beſought him, that for a certeine ſumme of monie which they offered to giue, it might pleaſe him to conſtreine them to abiure chriſtianitie, and turne to the Iewiſh law againe. He was contented to ſatiſfie their deſires, and ſo receiuing the monie, called them before him, & what with threats, and putting them otherwiſe in feare, he compelled diuerſe of them to forſake Chriſt, and returne to their old errors.

Iewes.

There was about the ſame time a yoong man a Iew, who by a viſion appearing vnto him (as is ſaid) was conuerted to the chriſtian faith, and being baptiſed, was named Stephan, bicauſe S. Stephan was the man that had appeared to him in the viſion, as by the ſame he was informed. The father of the yoongman being ſore troubled, for that his ſonne was become a chriſtian, and hearing what the king had doone in ſuch like matters, preſented to him 60. marks of ſiluer, conditionally that he ſhould inforce his ſonne to returne to his Iewiſh religion. Herevpon was the yoong man brought before the king, vnto whom he ſaid; Sirra, thy father here complaineth that without his licence thou art become a chriſtian: if this be true, I command thee to returne againe to the religion of thy nation, without anie more adoo. To whom the yoongman anſwered, Your grace (as I geſſe) dooth but ieſt. Wherwith the king being mooued ſaid, What thou dunghill knaue, ſhuld I ieſt with thee? Get thee hence quicklie, and fulfill my commandement, or by S. Lukes face I ſhall cauſe thine eies to be plucked out of thine head. The yoongman nothing abaſhed hereat, with a conſtant voice anſwered, Trulie I will not doo it, but know for certeine, that if you were a good chriſtian, you would neuer haue vttered anie ſuch words, for it is the part of a chriſtian to reduce them againe to Chriſt which be departed from him; & not to ſeparate them from him, which are ioined to him by faith. The king herwith confounded, commanded the Iew to auant & get him out of his ſight. But his father perceiuing that the king could not perſuade his ſonne to forſake the chriſtian faith, required to haue his monie againe. To whom the king ſaid, he had doone ſo much as he promiſed to doo, that was, to perſuade him ſo far as he might. At length, when he would haue had the king to haue dealt further in the matter, the king (to ſtop his mouth) tendered backe to him the one halfe of his monie, & reteined the other to himſelfe.

An anſwer of a good Iew.

A pretie deuiſion.

Moreouer, to increaſe the ſuſpicion which men had of his infidelitie, it is written, that he cauſed a diſputation to be kept betwixt the Iewes & the chriſtians, promiſing that if the Iewes ouercame the chriſtians in argument, he would be a Iew: but the Iewes being ouercome, and receiuing the foile, would not confeſſe their errors, but alledged, that by factions (and not by reaſon) they were put to the worſe. Howbeit, what opinion ſoeuer he had of the Iewes faith, it appeereth by writers that he doubted in manie points of the religion then in credit. For he ſticked not to proteſt openlie, that he beleeued no ſaint could profit anie man in the Lords ſight, and therefore neither would he nor anie other that was wiſe (as he affirmed) make interceſſion, either to Peter, or to anie other for helpe.

King William ſuſpected of infidelitie.

He was of ſtature not ſo tall as the common ſort of men, red of haire, whereof he tooke his ſurname Rufus, ſomwhat big of bellie, and not readie of toong, ſpeciallie in his anger, for then his vtterance was ſo hindered, that he could ſcarſelie ſhew the conceits of his mind: he died without iſſue, and vſed concubines all the daies of his life. I find that in apparell he loued to be gaie and gorgeous, & could not abide to haue anie thing (for his wearing) eſteemed at a ſmall valure. Wherevpon it came to paſſe on a morning, when he ſhould pull on a new paire of hoſe, he aſked the groome of his chamber that brought them to him what they coſt? Three ſhillings ſaith he; Why thou horeſon (ſaid the king) dooth a paire of hoſe of three ſhillings price become a king to weare? Go thy waies, and fetch me a paire that ſhall coſt a marke of ſiluer. The groome went, and brought him another paire, for the which he paid ſcarſelie ſo much as for the firſt. But when the king aſked what they ſtood him in, he told him they coſt a marke: and then was he well ſatiſfied, and ſaid; Yea marie, theſe are more fit for a king to weare, and ſo drew them vpon his legs.

In this kings daies Iohn biſhop of Welles ioined the monaſterie of Bath vnto his ſee, and repairing the ſame monaſterie, began to inhabit there in the yeere 1094. The church of Couentrie was in like ſort ioined vnto the ſee of Cheſter by Robert biſhop of that dioceſſe. Wolſtan biſhop of Worceſter died about the ſame time, and Anſelme hauing purchaſed bulles of pope Paſchall, wherein was conteined an admonition vnto king William to deſiſt from his greeuous oppreſſing of the church, and to amend his former doings, was now on his returne towards England, and by the waie heard of the kings death. Hugh earle of Cheſter in this kings daies builded the abbeie of Cheſter, and procured Anſelme (afterwards archbiſhop of Canturburie) to come ouer from Normandie, that he might direct the ſame abbeie, and place ſuch religious perſons as were neceſſarie and conuenient for ſo good a foundation.

Couentrie church ioined to the ſee of Cheſter.

Long it was yer Anſelme would come ouer, bicauſe he doubted to be had in ſuſpicion of an ambitious deſire in ſéeking to be made archbiſhop of Canturburie. For it was talked that if he went ouer into England, he ſhould ſurelie be elected before he returned into Normandie. But at length ſo it chanced, that the foreſaid Hugh earle of Cheſter fell ſicke, and deſpairing of life, ſent with all ſpéed to Anſelme, requiring him moſt inſtantlie to come ouer to him lieng in extremitie of ſickeneſſe; adding, that if he haſted not the ſooner, it would be too late, whereof he would after repent him. Then Anſelme, for that he might not faile his fréend in ſuch neceſſitie, came ouer, and gaue order to the abbeie, according as it ſéemed beſt to him for the eſtabliſhment of religion there.

Thus farre William Rufus.

Henrie the firſt, yoongeſt ſonne to VVilliam the Conquerour.

HEnrie the yoongeſt ſonne to William the firſt, brother to Rufus latelie departed, the firſt of that name that ruled héere in England, & for his knowledge in good literature ſurnamed Beauclerke, was admitted king by the whole aſſent of the lords and commons, and began his reigne ouer England the firſt of Auguſt, in the yeare after the creation of the world 1067. after the birth of our Sauiour 1100. and 44. of the emperour Henrie the fourth, Paſchall the ſecond then gouerning the ſée of Rome, which was about the 51. yeare of Philip the firſt of that name king of France, and in the beginning of the reigne of Edgar king of Scotland. This king was conſecrated and crowned at Weſtminſter, the fift daie of Auguſt, by Thomas archbiſhop of Yorke, and Maurice biſhop of London, bicauſe at that time Anſelme archbiſhop of Canturburie was exiled. This prince had aforehand trained the people to his humor and veine, in bringing them to thinke well of him, and to conceiue a maruellous euill opinion of his brother duke Robert, perſuading them moreouer, that the ſaid duke was likelie to proue a ſharpe and rigorous gouernour, if he once obteined the crowne and dominion of the land. Moreouer, he cauſed to be reported for a certeine truth, that the ſame Robert was alreadie created king of Ieruſalem. And therfore conſidering that the kingdome of Paleſtine (as the rumor ran) was of greater reuenues than that of England, there was no cauſe why they ſhuld ſtaie for him, who would not willinglie leaue the greater for the leſſer. By which meanes the Nobilitie and Commons were the ſooner perſuaded to decline from the election of the ſaid Robert, and to receiue his brother Henrie for their lawfull king, who on the other ſide ceaſed not to promiſe mountaines, till his enterpriſe tooke effect; and then at leiſure paied ſome of them with molhils: as by the ſequele of the ſtorie ſhall more at large appéere.

This Henrie therefore comming thus to the crowne, conſidered furthermore with himſelfe, that hereafter, when his eldeſt brother Robert ſhould returne, and vnderſtand how the matter was brought about, he would thinke himſelfe to haue had much wrong, and béene verie euill dealt withall, ſith that as well by birthright, as alſo by agréement made with his brother William Rufus, he ought of right to be preferred, and therevpon would not faile but make earneſt claime againſt him. Wherefore yer he ſhould come home out of the holie land (where he then remained) the king ſtudied by all poſſible meanes how to gratifie all the ſtates of his realme, & to plant in their harts ſome good opinion of him. And firſt of all he reformed ſuch things as his brother had left verie preiudiciall to the eſtate of the church, ſetting the ſame frée which before was ſore oppreſſed. And furthermore, ſomwhat to reléeue the cõmon-wealth, he promiſed to reſtore the lawes of good king Edward, and to aboliſh or amend thoſe which by his father and brother were alreadie ordeined to the hurt & preiudice of the old ancient liberties of the realme of England. He reuoked Anſelme the archbiſhop of Canturburie out of exile, who fled (as yée haue heard) to auoid the wrath of king William. Moreouer, he placed in the ſée of Wincheſter, one William Gifford, a graue and diſcréet perſon, and alſo ordeined monkes of honeſt reputation to be abbats in certeine abbeis which had béene long void, and in the hands of William his brother: in like maner he remitted certeine paiments which his brother and predeceſſour had cauſed to be raiſed by waie of taxes and cuſtomes. Beſides this, on the 8. daie of September, he committed Rafe biſhop of Durham to the Tower of London, by whoſe lewd counſell his ſaid brother being ſeduced, had in his life time doone manie oppreſſions to his people. He ordeined alſo that one length of meaſuring ſhould be vſed through this realme, which was a yard, appointing it to be cut after the length of his owne arme. Manie other things he redreſſed, to the contentation and commoditie of his ſubiects, who gaue God thanks that he had in ſuch wiſe deliuered them out of the hands of cruell extortioners.

lawfull companie keeping with concubines: which demand was not miſliked at all. Herevpon they conſidered that Edgar king of Scotland had a ſiſter named Maud, a beautifull ladie, and of vertuous conditions, who was a profeſſed nunne in a religious houſe, to the end ſhe might auoid the ſtormes of the world, and lead hir life in more ſecuritie after hir fathers deceaſſe. This gentlewoman, notwithſtanding hir vow, was thought to be a meet bedfellow for the king: wherefore he ſent ambaſſadors to hir brother Edgar, requeſting that he might haue hir in mariage. But ſhe refuſing ſuperſtitiouſlie at the firſt to breake hir profeſſed vow, would not heare of the offer: wherewithall king Henrie being the more inflamed, ſent new ambaſſadors to moue the caſe in more earneſt ſort than before, in ſo much that Edgar, vpon the declaration of their ambaſſage, ſet the abbeſſe of the houſe (where then ſhe abode) in hand to perſuade hir, who ſo effectuallie and diuerſlie telling hir how neceſſarie, profitable, & honorable the ſame ſhould be both to hir countrie and kinred, did ſo preuaile at the laſt, that the yoong ladie granted willinglie to the mariage. Herevpon ſhe was tranſported into England, and wedded to the king, who cauſed the archbiſhop Anſelme to crowne hir queene on S. Martins daie, which fell vpon a ſundaie, being the eleuenth of Nouember.

¶It ſhould ſeeme by Eadmerus, that ſhe was neuer nunne, but onelie veiled by hir mother, and placed amongſt nunnes againſt hir will (as ſhe proteſted to the whole world) at ſuch time as archbiſhop Anſelme refuſed to ſolemnize the mariage betwixt them, till that doubt were cleared, and the occaſion remoued, wherevpon euill diſpoſed men would haue ſurmiſed ilfauoredlie, and reported the worſt. Howbeit whether ſhe were profeſſed, or veiled onelie, loth ſhe was to conſent at the firſt (as partlie ye haue heard) but after that ſhe was coupled with the king in mariage, ſhe prooued a right obedient wife.

The archbiſhop of Vienna the popes legat.

He is not receiued for legat.

About this ſeaſon the archbiſhop of Vienna came ouer into England with the popes authoritie (as he pretended) to be legat ouer all Briteine, which was ſtrange newes vnto England, and greatlie woondered at (as Eadmerus ſaith) of all men. For it had not beene heard of in England before that time, that any perſon ſhould ſupplie the popes roome, except the archbiſhop of Canturburie. And ſo he departed as he came, for no man receiued him as legat, neither did he exerciſe anie legantine authoritie. Not long after, the king ſent ambaſſadours to Rome, about a ſuit which he had againſt the archbiſhop Anſelme, for that he denied not onelie to doo him homage, but alſo would not conſecrate ſuch biſhops and eccleſiaſticall gouernours as he vndertooke to inueſt. Touching which matter no ſmall trouble aroſe, as hereafter ſhall appeere.

In the meane time, Robert the kings elder brother, returning out of the holie land, came into Normandie: for after he had aduertiſement of the death of his brother Rufus, and that his yoonger brother was crowned king of England, he was greatlie diſpleaſed in his mind, and meant with all ſpeed to aſſaie if he might recouer it out of his hands.

Duke Robert choſen king of Hieruſalem.

¶ We read, that when chriſtian princes had woone Hieruſalem, they met togither in the temple to chuſe a king for the gouernement of that citie and countrie, in which conuent duke Robert was choſen before all the reſidue to be king there, by reaſon of a miracle (as ſome haue left recorded) wrought by quenching of a taper, and the ſudden kindling thereof againe, as he held the ſame in his hand, ſtanding in the church before the altar amongſt other on Eaſter euen: ſo as thereby it ſhould be thought he was appointed among all the reſidue to be king, and ſo was nominated. But he hauing his mind more inclined to England, refuſed to take the charge vpon him: wherevpon after that daie he neuer greatlie proſpered in anie buſineſſe which he tooke in hand: as ſome doo gather. Other authors of good credit, which haue written that voiage into the holie land, make no mention of anie ſuch matter, but declare, that Godfraie of Bolongne was by the generall conſent of all the princes and capiteins there elected king, as in the deſcription of that voiage more plainelie appeereth. But now to returne from whence I haue digreſſed.

Polydor.

Anno Reg. 2.

When the fame was blowne into England, that duke Robert was returned into Normandie, and that the people had receiued him for their duke with great triumph and ioy: there were diuerſe which deſiring innouations, deliting in alterations, and being wearie of the quiet gouernement of king Henrie, wrote letters into England to the duke, ſignifieng to him, that if he would make haſt, and come to recouer the realme out of his brothers hands (who vſurped it by an vniuſt title) they would be readie to aid him with all their power. Herewithall the duke being readie of his owne accord to this enterpriſe, was not a little inflamed, and grew more earneſt to make haſt about this buſineſſe: in ſomuch as, where he would not ſeeme at the firſt to eſteeme greatlie of the offer made to him by the Engliſhmen, who had thus written ouer vnto him (blaming generallie all the Engliſh Nobilitie, for that while he was abroad in the ſeruice of the chriſtian common-wealth againſt the infidels, they would ſuffer him to be in ſuch wiſe defrauded of his fathers inheritance, by his brother, through their vntruth and negligence) yet although he meant to delaie the matter, and thought it rather better to diſſemble with them for a time, than to commit the ſucceſſe of his affaires and perſon to their inconſtancie; ſhortlie after being ſet on fire, and ſtill incouraged by the perſuaſion of Rafe biſhop of Durham (who by a woonderfull wilie ſhift, about the firſt of Februarie had broken out of priſon) with all ſpeed poſſible he gathered an armie, purpoſing out of hand to paſſe ouer with the ſame into England, and to hazard his right by dent of ſword, which was thus by plaine iniurie moſt wickedlie deteined from him.

Duke Robert is ſolicited to come into England to claim the crowne.

King Henrie in the meane time vnderſtanding his meaning, aſſembled likewiſe his power, and rigged forth a great number of ſhips, appointing them to lie in a readineſſe to ſtop his brothers comming to land if it might be. Duke Robert alſo meaning to ſet foreward, ſent certeine of his ſhips before, to chooſe ſome conuenient place where he might land with his armie: which ſhips by chance fell into the danger of the kings nauie, but yet abſteining from battell, they recouered the wind, and returned backe to the duke, ſignifieng from point to point how they had ſped in this voiage. The duke as he was of a bold courage, and of ſo gentle a nature that he beleeued he ſhould win their good wils, with whom he ſhould haue any thing to doo, paſſed forward, and approching to the kings nauie, vſed ſuch mild perſuaſions, that a great part of the ſouldiours which were aboord in the kings ſhips, ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, by whoſe conduct he arriued in Portſmouth hauen, and there landed with his hoſt, about the begining of Auguſt. ſubiects, raiſed his campe, and came to lodge néere vnto his enimies, the better to perceiue what he attempted and purpoſed to doo. They were alſo in maner readie to haue ioined battell, when diuers Noble men that owght good will to both the brethren, and abhorred in their minds ſo vnnaturall diſcord, began to entreat for peace, which in the end they concluded vpon, conditionallie that Henrie (who was borne after his father had conquered the realme of England) ſhould now enioy the ſame, yéelding and paieng yéerelie vnto duke Robert the ſumme of iij. M. marks. Prouided, that whoſe hap of the two it ſhuld be to ſuruiue or outliue, he ſhould be the others right and lawfull heire, by mutuall agréement. Conditionallie alſo, that thoſe Engliſh or Normans, which had taken part either with the king or the duke, ſhould be pardoned of all offenſes that could be laid vnto them for the ſame by either of the princes. There were twelue Noble men on either part that receiued corporall othes for performance of this agréement, which being concluded vpon in this ſort, duke Robert, who in his affaires ſhewed himſelfe more credulous than ſuſpicious, remained with his brother here in England till the feaſt of S. Michaell, and then ſhewing himſelfe well contented with the compoſition, returned into Normandie. In the ſecond yeare of this kings reigne, the Quéene was deliuered of hir daughter Maud or Mathild, ſo called after hir owne name, who afterward was empreſſe, of whom yée ſhall heare by Gods grace anon in this hiſtorie.

Robert de Beleſme earle of Shrewſburie.

Stafford waſted.

The king being now rid of forren trouble, was ſhortlie after diſquieted with the ſeditious attempts of Robert de Beleſme earle of Shrewſburie, ſonne to Hugh before named, who fortified the caſtell of Bridgenorth, and an other caſtell in Wales at a place called Caircoue, and furniſhed the towne of Shrewſburie, with the caſtels of Arundell & Tickehill (which belonged to him) in moſt ſubſtantiall maner. Moreouer he ſought to win the fauour of the Welſhmen, by whoſe aid he purpoſed to defend himſelfe againſt the king in ſuch vnlawfull enterpriſes as he ment to take in hand. But the king hauing an inkeling whereabout he went, ſtraitwaies proclaimed him a traitor, whervpon he got ſuch Welſhmen and Normans together as he could conuenientlie come by, with whom and his brother Arnold, he entred into Staffordſhire, which they forraied and waſted excéedinglie, bringing from thence a great bootie of beaſts and cattell, with ſome priſoners, whom they led foorthwith into Wales, where they kept themſelues as in a place of greateſt ſafetie.

Arundell caſtell beſieged.

Bridgenorth beſieged.

Anno Reg.3.

The earle of Shrewſburie baniſhed the realme.

The king in the meane time with all conuenient ſpéed raiſed a power, firſt beſieging the caſtell of Arundell, and then planting diuerſe baſtillions before it, he departed from thence, and ſending the biſhop of Lincolne with part of his armie to beſiege Tickehill, he himſelfe went to Bridgenorth, which he enuironed about with a mightie armie made out of all parts of his realme: ſo that what with gifts, large promiſes, and fearefull threatnings, at the laſt he allured to his ſide the fickle Welſhmen, and in ſuch wiſe wan them, that they abandoned the earle, and tooke part againſt him. Wherevpon the king within 30. daies ſubdued all the townes and caſtels (which he held) out of his hands, and baniſhed him the relme, and ſhortlie after confined his brother Arnold for his traitorous demeanour vſed againſt him, whereby their attempts were brought vnto an end.

A ſynod of biſhops.
Eadmerus.

After this, at the feaſt of ſaint Michaell, Anſelme archbiſhop of Canturburie held a councell at Weſtminſter, whereat were preſent the archbiſhop of Yorke, the biſhops of London, Winchester, Lincolne, Worceſter, Cheſter, Bath, Norwich, Rocheſter, and two other biſhops latlie elected by the king, namelie, Saliſburie and Hereford: the biſhop of Exceſter was abſent by reaſon of ſickneſſe.

Abbats & priors depriued.

Matth. Paris.

The cauſe why they wer depriued.

At this councell or ſynod, diuers abbats and priors, both French and Engliſh, were depriued of their promotions and benefices by Anſelme, bicauſe they had come vnto them otherwiſe than he pretended to ſtand with the decrées of the church; as the abbats of Perſor, Ramſey, Taueſtocke, Peterborow, Middleton, Burie, and Stoke, the prior of Elie, and others. The chéefeſt cauſe of their depoſing, was, for that they had receiued their inueſtitures at the kings hands.

S. Bartholomewes by Smithfield founded. Smithfield ſometimes a common laieſtall & a place of execution.

About the third yeare of K. Henries reigne, the foundation of ſaint Bartholomews by Smithfield was begun by Raier one of the kings muſicians (as ſome write) who alſo became the firſt prior thereof. In thoſe daies Smithfield was a place where they laid all the ordure and filth of the citie. It was alſo the appointed place of execution, where felons and other malefactors of the lawes did ſuffer for their miſdeeds.

Polydor. The king beſtoweth biſhopriks. Matth. Paris.

Sim. Dunel.

When the earle of Shrewesburie was baniſhed (as ye haue heard) the ſtate of the realme ſéemed to be reduced into verie good order and quietneſſe: ſo that king Henrie being aduanced with good ſucceſſe in his affaires, was now in no feare of danger any maner of waie. Howbeit herein he ſomewhat diſpleaſed the cleargie: for leaning vnto his princelie authoritie, he tooke vpon him both to nominate biſhops, and to inueſt them into the poſſeſſion of their ſées: amongſt whom was one Remclid, biſhop of Hereford by the kings ordinance. This Remclid or Remeline did afterwards reſigne that biſhoprike to the king, bicauſe he was perſuaded he had greatlie offended in receiuing the ſame at a temporall mans hands.

Trulie not onelie king Henrie here in England, but alſo other princes and high potentates of the temporaltie about the ſame ſeaſon, challenged this right of inueſting biſhops and other cleargie men, as a thing due vnto them and their predeceſſors, without all preſcription of time, as they alledged, which cauſed no ſmall debate betwixt them and the ſpiritualtie, as in that which is written thereof at large by others may more eaſilie appeere.

Anſelme refuſeth to conſecrate the biſhops inueſted by the king.

Howbeit Anſelme the archbiſhop of Canturburie more earneſt in this caſe than any other, would not admit nor conſecrate ſuch biſhops as were nominated and inueſted by the king, making no account of their inueſtiture: and further he tooke vpon him to admoniſh the K. not to violate the ſacred lawes, rites and ceremonies of chriſtian religion ſo latelie decréed concerning thoſe matters. But ſo far was the king from giuing any eare to his admonitions, that he ſtood the more ſtiffelie in his chalenge. And where Thomas the archbiſhop of Yorke was not long before departed out of this tranſitorie life, he gaue that benefice then void to one Gerard, a man of great wit, but (as ſome writers report) more deſirous of honor than was requiſite for his calling, and willed him in deſpite of Anſelme to conſecrate thoſe biſhops whom he had of late inueſted. This Gerard therfore obeieng his commandement, did conſecrate them all, William Gifford biſhop of Wincheſter excepted; who refuſed to be conſecrated at his hands, wherevpon he was depriued and baniſhed the relme. The archbiſhop Anſelme alſo was quite out of fauour, for that he ceaſed not to ſpeake againſt the K. in reproouing him in this behalfe, till time that the king was contented to referre the matter to pope Paſchall, and to ſtand to his decrée and determination: alſo, that ſuch as he had placed in any biſhoprike, ſhould haue licence to go to Rome to plead their cauſes, whither he promiſed ſhortlie to ſend his ambaſſadours, and ſo he did: appointing for the purpoſe, Herbert biſhop of Norwich, and Robert biſhop of Lichfield, being both of his priuie councell, and William Warlewaſt, of whom mention is made before, who went on their waie and came to Rome, according to their commiſſion.

Anno Reg. 4. Ambaſſadors ſent to Rome.

Anſelme goeth alſo to Rome.

After them alſo folowed Anſelme archbiſhop of Canturburie, Gerard archbiſhop of Yorke, & William the elect of Wincheſter, whom the pope receiued with a courteous kind of interteinement. But Anſelme was highlie honored aboue all the reſidue, whoſe diligence and zeale in defenſe of the ordinances of the ſée of Rome, he well inough vnderſtood. The ambaſſadours in like maner declaring the effect of their meſſage, opened vnto the pope the ground of the controuerſie begun betwéene the king and Anſelme, & with good arguments went about to prooue the kings cauſe to be lawfull. Vpon the otherſide, Anſelme and his partakers with contrarie reaſons ſought to confute the ſame. Wherupon the pope declared, that ſith by the lawes of the church it was decréed, that the poſſeſſion of any ſpirituall benefice, obteined otherwiſe than by meanes of a ſpirituall perſon, could not be good or allowable; from thenceforth, neither the king nor any other for him, ſhould challenge any ſuch right to apperteine vnto them.

Eadmerus. The ſaieng of Wil. Warleſwaſt to the pope.

The popes anſwer to him

The kings ambaſſadours hearing this, were ſomwhat troubled in their minds: wherevpon Willam Warlewaſt burſt out and ſaid with great vehemencie euen to the popes face: Whatſoeuer is or may be ſpoken in this maner to or fro, I would all that be preſent ſhould well vnderſtand, that the king my maiſter will not loſe the inueſtitures of churches for the loſſe of his whole realme. Vnto which words Paſchall himſelfe replieng, ſaid vnto him againe: If (as thou ſaieſt) the king thy maiſter will not forgo the inueſtiture of churches for the loſſe of his realme, know thou for certeine, and marke my words well, I ſpeake it before God, that for the ranſome of his head, pope Paſchall will not at any time permit that he ſhall enioie them in quiet. At length by the aduiſe of his councell, the pope granted the king certeine priuileges and cuſtomes, which his predeceſſours had vſed and enioied: but as for the inueſtitures of biſhops, he would not haue him in any wiſe to meddle withall: yet did he confirme thoſe biſhops whom the king had alreadie created, leaſt the refuſall ſhould be occaſion to ſowe any further diſcord.

Polydor,

This buſineſſe being in this maner ordered, the ambaſſadours were licenced to depart, who receiuing at the popes hands great rewards, and Gerard the archbiſhop of Yorke his pall, they ſhortlie after returned into England, declaring vnto the king the popes decrée and ſentence. The king being ſtill otherwiſe perſuaded, and looking for other newes, was nothing pleaſed with this matter. Long it was yer he would giue ouer his claime, or yéeld to the popes iudgement, till that in proceſſe of time, ouercome with the earneſt ſute of Anſelme, he granted to obeie the popes order herein, though (as it ſhould appeare) right ſore againſt his will.

Wil.Malm.

In this meane time, the king had ſeized into his hands the poſſeſſions of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and baniſhed Anſelme, ſo that he ſtaied at Lions in France for the ſpace of one yeare and foure moneths, during which time there paſſed manie letters and meſſages to and fro. The pope alſo wrote to king Henrie in verie courteous maner, exhorting him to call Anſelme home againe, and to releaſe his claime to the inueſtitures of biſhops, wherevnto he could haue no right, ſith it apperteined not to the office of any temporall magiſtrate: adding furthermore, if the king would giue ouer that vngodlie and vſurped cuſtome, that he would ſhew ſuch fréendlie fauour in all things, as by the ſufferance of God in any wiſe he might be able to performe, and further would receiue not onelie him, but alſo his yoong ſonne William (whom latelie it had pleaſed God to ſend him by his vertuous wife quéene Maud) into his protection, ſo that who ſo euer did hurt either of them, ſhould be thought to hurt the holie church of Rome.

The pope writeth courteouſlie to the king.

In one of the letters which the ſaid pope wrote vnto Anſelme (after that the king was contented to renounce the inueſtitures aforeſaid) he willed Anſelme, according to the promiſe which he had made, to aſſoile as well from ſinne as from penance due for the ſame, both the king and his wife quéene Maud, with all ſuch perſons of honour as in this behalfe had trauelled with the king to induce him to be agréeable to his purpoſe.

Moreouer, the earle of Mellent, and Richard de Riuers (who had counſelled the king to ſtand ſtoutlie in the matter, and not to giue ouer his title of ſuch inueſtitures, ſith his anceſtors had vſed them ſo long a time before his daies, by reaſon whereof, in renouncing his right to the ſame, he ſhould doo a thing greatlie preiudiciall to his roiall eſtate and princelie maieſtie) were now earneſt labourers to agrée the king and the pope, in ſo much that in the end the king was perſuaded by Anſelme and them to let go his hold, reſigning the inueſtitures with ſtaffe and ring; notwithſtanding that, he reſerued the right of elections, and ſuch other roialties as otherwiſe apperteined to to his maieſtie, ſo that ſuch biſhops as had doone homage to the king, were not diſabled thereby, but quietlie permitted to receiue their iuriſdictions.

Duke Robert commeth into England to viſit his brother.

About this time Robert duke of Normandie came into England to ſée his brother: who through the ſugred words and ſwéet enterteinment of the king, releaſed the yéerelie tribute of 3000. markes, which he ſhould haue had out of the realme vpon agréement (as before ye haue heard) but chéefelie indéed at the requeſt of the quéene, being inſtructed by hir huſband how ſhe ſhould deale with him that was knowne to be frée and liberall, without any great conſideration what he preſentlie granted.

Now hauing béene here a certeine time, and ſolaced himſelfe with his brother and ſiſter, he returned into Normandie, where ſhortlie after he began to repent him of his follie, in being ſo liberall as to releaſe the foreſaid tribute: wherevpon he menaced the king, and openlie in his reproch ſaid that he was craftilie circumuented by him, and flatlie couzened. Diuerſe in Normandie deſired nothing more than to ſet the two brethren at ſquare, and namelie Robert de Beleſme earle of Shrewſburie, with William earle of Mortaigne: theſe two were baniſhed the realme of England. The earle of Shreweſburie for his rebellious attempts (as before you haue heard) and the earle of Mortaigne left the land of his owne willfull and ſtubborne mind, exiling himſelfe onelie vpon hatred which he bare to the king: For being not contented with the earledome of Mortaigne in Normandie, and the earledome of Cornewall in England, he made ſute alſo for the earledome of Kent, which his vncle Odo ſometime held. Now bicauſe he was not onelie denied of that ſute, but alſo by order of lawe had certeine parcels of land taken from him, which he wrongfullie deteined, he got him into Normandie, and there made war both againſt thoſe places which the king held, and alſo againſt other that belonged to Richard earle of Cheſter, who was then vnder the kings tuition and gouernement by reaſon of his minoritie.

The threatning words of duke Robert comming at the laſt to king Henries eares, cauſed him forthwith to conceiue verie ſore diſpleaſure againſt the duke, in ſo much that he ſent ouer a power into Normandie, which finding no great reſiſtance, did much hurt in the countrie, by fetching and carieng ſpoiles and preies. Againe, the Normans rather fauoured than ſought to hinder the enterpriſe of king Henrie, bicauſe they ſaw how duke Robert with his fooliſh prodigalitie and vndiſcréet liberalitie had made awaie all that belonged to his eſtate; ſo that of the whole duchie of Normandie, he had not any citie or towne of name left in his owne poſſeſſion, Roan onelie excepted, which he alſo would haue alienated, if the citizens would haue conſented to his fond motion.

Now king Henrie hearing of the good ſucceſſe of his men, paſſed ouer himſelfe ſoone after with a mightie armie, and with little adoo tooke Eureux or (as others haue) Baieux and Caen, which cities when he had furniſhed with ſufficient gariſons of men, he repaſſed the ſea into England, bicauſe the winter approched, and the wether waxed troubleſome for ſuch as laie in the field. Herevpon duke Robert conſidering how vnable he was (by reaſon that his people failed him at néed) to reſiſt king Henrie, ſith the Britans alſo, and they of Aniou, tooke part with the ſaid king, he thought good to laie armour aſide, and to paſſe ouer into England, to entreat with him by way of brotherlie amitie, in full hope by that meanes to auoid this preſent danger. But at his arriuall here, he learned how the king his brother as then was at Northampton: wherefore he haſted thither, and comming to him, made earneſt ſute for peace, beſéeching the king in reſpect of brotherlie loue to grant the ſame; or if it were that he regarded not the goodwill of his naturall brother, to conſider at leaſt wiſe what apperteined to his accuſtomed gentleneſſe, and to thinke with himſelfe that warre betwixt brethren could not be mainteined without reproch, nor that victorie be honorable which was obteined againſt his owne fleſh. Wherefore he required him not to refuſe peace, fréendſhip, and voluntarie beneuolence, ſith he was now readie to render all that euer he had into his hands.

Anno Reg. 7.

The king nothing mooued herewith, but as one that diſdained to make a direct anſwer, murmured certeine things with himſelfe, and turned away from the duke, as one that either by experience knew his brothers light and vnſtable mind, or as one that determined to be reuenged of him euen to the vttermoſt. Duke Robert alſo, abhorring and vtterlie deteſting this his brothers pride, ſtreightwaies returned home, purpoſing with himſelfe to trie the hazard of warre, ſith he ſawe no hope to be had in brotherlie loue and amitie. Wherevpon he prouided for wars with all his power, ſéeking aid from all places where he might get any, though the king his brother gaue him ſmall leiſure thereto, who followed him incontinentlie with a new ſupplie of ſouldiours, deſiring nothing more than to get him within his danger.

They ioine in battell.

Soone after, both the brethren approching néere togither, ech of them pitched their campe within the ſight of other, preparing themſelues to giue battell with princelie ſtomachs. The king ſurmounting the duke his brother in number, firſt bringeth foorth his men in order of battell, and ſtreightwaies the duke likewiſe, both being readie to trie the matter by dint of ſword. Then the one prouoking the other, and the trumpets ſounding aloft, the conflict began. The kings ſouldiers truſting too much in their owne force, by reaſon of their great multitude, brake their arraie, and aſſailed their enimies on ech ſide verie diſorderlie: but the Normans being wiſelie ordered and inſtructed by their duke, kept themſelues cloſe togither: ſo that the kings battell, which had without order ſtept foorth to aſſaile them, finding ſturdie reſiſtance, began now to reſult or giue backe: for not onelie duke Robert but alſo William earle of Mortaigne preaſed foreward amongſt their men, and fought valiantlie with their owne hands. Wherupon the king, when he perceiued how his men began to ſhrinke, cried vpon them to ſtaie, and withall commanded his horſſemen to breake vpon the flanks of his enimies battell: which they did, with ſuch violence that they diſparkled the ſame, and cauſed the enimies to ſcatter. Herewith alſo the kings footmen, togither with the horſſemen inuaded the Normans afreſh, who neuertheleſſe reſiſted a while, till being compaſſed about in maner on euerie ſide, they began to flee: as oftentimes it chanceth, when a few driuen in ſunder by a multitude, are aſſailed on all ſides. The king then hauing vanquiſhed his aduerſaries, followeth the chaſe, and maketh great ſlaughter of them, though not without ſome loſſe of his owne: for the Normans deſpairing of ſafetie, turned oftentimes againe vpon their purſuers.

Duke Robert and the earle of Mortaigne fighting moſt manfullie in the verie preaſe of their enimies, were taken, or (as other ſaie) betraied, and deliuered into their enimies hands: beſide which twaine, William Criſpine, William Ferreis, Robert Eſtoutuille the elder, with foure hundreth men of armes, and to the number of 10. thouſand footmen were taken. As for the number that were ſlaine in this battell, there is none that declareth the certeintie: but yet it is reported by diuers writers, that no one battell in thoſe daies was ſorer fought, nor with greater bloudſhed either in Normandie, or elſewhere.

Gemeticenſis.

Gemeticenſis ſheweth bréeflie, that king Henrie was offended with his brother duke Robert, for alienating the duchie of Normandie his inheritance, & for waſting his reuenues with ſuch riotous demeanour as he vſed, ſo that he left himſelfe nothing but the citie of Roan, which he had not paſſed to haue giuen awaie alſo, if the citizens would thereto haue granted their conſent. The king (I ſaie) taking diſpleaſure herewith, went ouer into Normandie, and aſſuming a mightie power, firſt beſieged Baieur, & then halfe deſtroieng it, he tooke it by force. After this he tooke Caen alſo, and then beſieged a caſtell called Tenerchbray perteining to the earle of Mortaigne, during which ſiege his brother Robert, and the ſaid earle of Mortaigne came with a great multitude of people in hope to be reuenged of the king, and to chaſe him out of the countrie. But the puniſhment of God fell ſo vpon them, that they were both taken, and manie of their fréends with them, as Robert de Eſtoutuille, William de Criſpine, and others, who were brought before king Henrie as priſoners. ¶ Thus did almightie God grant vnto the king a notable victorie without bloodſhed, for he loſt not a man: as for his aduerſaries, there died in the field not paſt thrée ſcore perſons.

Wil. Malm.

This ſeemeth alſo to agrée with that which Wil. Malmesburie writeth: for he ſaith, that king Henrie with ſmall adoo brought into his hands duke Robert, who with a great troope of men came againſt him then lodging néere the ſaid caſtell of Tenerchbray. The earle of Mortaigne was alſo taken, but the erle of Shrewsburie eſcaped by flight, notwithſtanding he was apprehended, as he went about to practiſe ſome priuie conſpiracie againſt the king. ¶ This battell was fought (as the ſame Wil. Malme. affirmeth) vpon a ſaturdaie, being the daie of S. Michaell In gloria, and (as may be thought) by the prouident iudgement of God, to the end that Normandie ſhould be ſubdued vnto England on that daie, in the which 40. yeares paſſed, king William the Conquerour firſt ſet foot on land at Haſtings, when he came out of Normandie to ſubdue England. Neither dooth Simon Dunelmenſis varie in any thing from Gemeticenſis touching the concluſion of this buſineſſe, and the taking of duke Robert.

Theſe wars being thus finiſhed, and the countrie ſet in quiet, which through the méere folie of duke Robert was woonderfullie impoueriſhed, the king receiued the keies of all the townes and caſtels that belonged either to the duke or the earle of Mortaigne, and furniſhed the ſame with gariſons to be kept for his behoofe. Hauing thus pacified the countrie of Normandie, he came to Bec or Bechellouin, where archbiſhop Anſelme then remained, whome by mediation of fréends he receiued to fauour againe, and ſending him ouer into England, immediatlie after followed himſelfe.

Anſelme returneth home.

Duke Robert being alſo ſpoiled of his dominions, lands and liberties, was ſhortlie committed to priſon within the caſtell of Cardiff in Wales, where he remained about the ſpace of 26. yeares, and then died. He gouerned the duchie of Normandie 19. yeares, he was a perfect and expert warrior, & comparable with the beſt capiteines that then liued, had he béene ſomwhat more warie and circumſpect in his affaires, and therewithall conſtant in his opinion. His woorthie acts valiantlie and fortunatlie atchiued againſt the infidels, are notified to the world by manie and ſundrie writers, to his high commendation and long laſting praiſe. It is ſaid alſo, that he was after his taking once ſet at libertie by king Henrie, and bound to forſweare the realme of England and Normandie, being appointed to auoid within the ſpace of 40. daies, and twelue houres. But bicauſe he was perceiued to practiſe ſomewhat againſt the king, he was eftſoones taken againe, and hauing his eies put out, committed to priſon, where finallie worne through age and gréefe of mind, he ended his miſerable life. ¶ The forme of baniſhing men out of the realme, was ordeined by Edward the Confeſſor, and remained as a law in vſe till theſe our daies, for the benefit of them which fled to any church or other priuiledged place, thereby to eſcape the puniſhment of death due for their offenſes. By a latter cuſtome it was alſo deuiſed, that they ſhould beare a croſſe in their hand, as a ſigne that they were pardoned of life, for the holie place ſake where they ſought for ſuccour.

But duke Robert (as it ſhould appéere by that which others write) found no ſuch fauour, ſaue onlie libertie to walke abroad in the kings forreſts, parks, and chaſes néere the place where he was appointed to remaine; ſo that vpon a daie, as he was walking abroad, he got a horſſe, and with all poſt haſt rode his waie, in hope to haue eſcaped: howbeit his kéepers being aduiſed thereof, followed him with hue and crie, and at length ouertooke him in a medow, where he had laid his horſſe vp to the bellie in a quauemire. Then being brought backe, his kéepers kept him in cloſe priſon, aduertiſing the king of his demeanour:

whereupon he commanded that the ſight of his eies ſhould be put out, but ſo, as the balles of them ſhould remaine vnbroken, for the auoiding of a noiſome deformitie that otherwiſe would enſue, if the glaſſie tunicles ſhould take hurt.

In his returne out of the holie land, he maried one Sibell, the earle of Conuerſans ſiſter in Puglia, hir father hight Roger or Geffrey (as ſome bookes haue) and was nephue to Robert Guyſhard duke of Puglia, and by hir had iſſue one ſonne named William afterward earle of Flanders, whereof (God willing) more ſhall be ſaid hereafter.

Here muſt I leaue duke Robert, and ſpeake ſomwhat of Anſelme the archbiſhop, who ſhortlie after his returne into England, receiued letters from pope Paſchall, wherein Anſelme was authoriſed to diſpoſe and order things as ſhould ſéeme to him moſt expedient. Now, whereas the greater and better part of the Engliſh clergie conſiſted of préeſts ſonnes, he committed to his diſcretion the order to diſpenſe with them; namelie, that ſuch as were of commendable life and ſufficient learning, might be admitted to the miniſterie, as the neceſſitie of time and ſtate of the church ſhould require. The pope alſo by the ſame letters gaue Anſelme authoritie to abſolue Richard the prior of Elie, vpon his ſatiſfaction pretermitted, and to reſtore him to the gouernement of the priorie of Elie, if the king thought it conuenient.

About the calends of Auguſt, in this yeare 1107. the king held a councell of biſhops, abbats, and other lords of his realme in his pallace at London, where in the abſence of Anſelme, the matter touching the inueſtitures of churches, was argued vpon for the ſpace of thrée daies togither, and in the end bicauſe the pope had granted the homages of biſhops and other prelats to the king, which his predeceſſor Urban had forbidden, togither with the inueſtitures; the king was contented to conſent to the popes will in forbearing the ſame. So that when Anſelme was come, the king in preſence of him and a great multitude of his people, granted and ordeined, that from thenceforth no biſhop nor abbat ſhould be inueſted within the realme of England, by the hand either of the king or any laie man: on the other ſide it was granted againe by Anſelme, that no perſon elected into the prelacie, ſhould be depriued of his conſecration for doing his homage to the king.

These things thus ordred, the churches which through England had bin long vacant, were prouided of gouernors, which were placed without any inueſtiture of ſtaffe or ring. About this time, Anſelme conſecrated fiue biſhops at Canturburie in one day, archbiſhop William to the ſée of Wincheſter, Roger that was the kings chancellor to Saliſburie, William Warlewaſt to Exceſter, Remaline the quéenes chancellor to Hereford, and one Urban to Glamorgan in Wales.

About this ſeaſon a great part of Flanders being drowned by an exundation or breaking in of the ſea, a great number of Flemings came into England, beſéeching the king to haue ſome void place aſſigned them, wherein they might inhabit. At the firſt they were appointed to the countrie lieng on the eaſt part of the riuer of Twéed: but within foure yeres after, they were remoued into a corner by the ſea ſide in Wales, called Penbrokeſhire, to the end they might be a defenſe there to the Engliſh againſt the vnquiet Welſhmen.

Flemings cōming ouer into England, haue places appointed them to inhabit.

¶ It ſhould appeare by ſome writers, that this multitude of Flemings conſiſted not of ſuch onelie as came ouer about that time by reaſon their countrie was ouerflowne with the ſea (as ye haue heard) but of other alſo that arriued here long before, euen in the daies of William the Conquerour, through the fréendſhip of the quéene their countriewoman, ſithens which time their number ſo increaſed, that the realme of England was ſore peſtered with them: whereupon king Henrie deuiſed to place them in Penbrokeſhire, as well to auoid them out of the other parts of England, as alſo by their helpe to tame the bold and preſumptuous fierceneſſe of the Welſhmen. Which thing in thoſe parties they brought verie well to paſſe: for after they were ſetled there, they valiantlie reſiſted their enimies, and made verie ſharpe warres vpon them, ſometimes with gaine, and ſometimes with loſſe.

In the yeare 1108. Anſelme held an other ſynod or councell, whereat in preſence of the king, and by the aſſent of the earles and barons of the realme it was ordeined.

1 That préeſts, deacons, and ſubdeacons ſhould liue chaſtlie, and kéepe no women in their houſes, except ſuch as were néere of kin to them.

Préeſts are ſequeſtred frō their wiues.

2 That ſuch préeſts, deacons, and ſubdeacons, as contrarie to the inhibition of the councell holden at London, had either kept their wiues, or married other (of whom as Eadmerus ſaith, there was no ſmall number) they ſhould put them quite away, if they would continue ſtill in their préeſthood.

3 That neither the ſame wiues ſhould come to their houſes, nor they to the houſes where their wiues dwelled: but if they had any thing to ſay to them, they ſhould take two or thrée witneſſes, and talke with them abroad in the ſtréet.

4 That if any of them chanced to be accuſed of breaking this ordinance, he ſhould be driuen to purge himſelfe with ſix ſufficient witneſſes of his owne order, if he were a préeſt: if a deacon, with foure: and if a ſubdeacon, with two.

5 That ſuch préeſts as would forgo ſeruing at the altar, and holie order (to remaine with their wiues) ſhould be depriued of their benefices, and not ſuffered to come within the quire.

Archdeacons and canons.

6 That ſuch as contemptuouſlie kept ſtill their wiues, and preſumed to ſay maſſe, if being called to ſatiſfaction, they ſhould neglect it, they ſhould then be excommunicated. Within compaſſe of which ſentence all archdeacons and prebendarie canons were compriſed, both touching the forgoing of their women, and auoiding of their companie, and alſo the puniſhment by the cenſures of the church, if they tranſgreſſed the ordinance.

Archdeacons to be ſworne.

7 That euerie archdeacon ſhould be ſworne, not to take any monie for fauouring any perſon tranſgreſſing theſe ſtatutes: and that they ſhould not ſuffer any préeſts, whome they knew to haue wiues, either to ſay maſſe, or to haue any vicars. The like oth ſhould a deane receiue. Prouided that ſuch archdeacons or deanes as refuſed this oth, ſhould be depriued of their roomes.

Penance.

8 That préeſts, who leauing their wiues, would be content to ſerue God & the altar, ſhould be ſuſpended from that office, by the ſpace of fortie daies, and be allowed to haue vicars in the meane time to ſerue for them: and after, vpon performance of their inioined penance by the biſhop, they might returne to their function.

Eadmerus. The death of Gerard archbiſh. of Yorke. Thomas the kings chapleine ſucceeded in that ſee.

The doubt of Anſelme.

Anſelme writeth to the Pope.

About this time Gerard archbiſhop of Yorke died, whom one Thomas the kings chapleine ſucceeded, who for lacke of monie to furniſh his iournie, and for other cauſes (as in his letters of excuſe, which he wrot to Anſelme it dooth appeere) could not come to Canturburie for to be conſecrated of him in ſo ſhort a time as was conuenient. But Anſelme at length admoniſhed him by letters, that without delaie he ſhould diſpatch and come to be conſecrated. And wheras Anſelme vnderſtood that the ſame Thomas was purpoſed to ſend vnto Rome for his pall, he doubted, leaſt if the pope ſhould confirme him in his ſee by ſending to him his pall, he would happilie refuſe to make vnto him profeſſion of his due obedience. Wherefore to preuent that matter, Anſelme wrote to pope Paſchall, requiring him in no wiſe to ſend vnto the nominated archbiſhop of Yorke his pall, till he had (according to the ancient cuſtomes) made profeſſion to him of ſubiection, leaſt ſome troubleſome contentions might thereof ariſe, to the no ſmall diſquieting of the Engliſh church. He alſo aduertiſed pope Paſchall, that bicauſe he permitted the emperour to inueſt biſhops, and did not therefore excommunicate him, king Henrie threatened, that without doubt he would reſume the inueſtitures into his hands, thinking to hold them in quiet as well as he; and therefore beſought him to conſider what his wiſedome had to doo therein with ſpeed, leaſt that building which he had well erected, ſhould vtterlie decaie, & fall againe into irrecouerable ruine. For K. Henrie maketh diligentlie inquirie (ſaith he) what order you take with the emperour.

The popes anſwer to Anſelme.

The pope receiuing and peruſing theſe letters, wrote againe vnto Anſelme a verie freendlie anſwer concerning the archbiſhop of Yorke. And as for ſuffering of the emperour to haue the inueſtitures, he ſignified to him that he neither did nor would ſuffer him to haue them: but that hauing borne with him for a time, he now ment verie ſhortlie to cauſe him to feele the weight of the ſpirituall ſword of S. Peter, which alreadie he had drawen out of the ſcaberd, therewith to ſtrike if he did not the ſooner forſake his horrible errour & naughtie opinion.

The archbiſhop of Yorke refuſeth to come vnto Canturburie to be conſecrated.

Looke in the 9. page, and the firſt columne, of the debate betweene Thomas of Yorke & Lanfranke of Canturburie.

There was another cauſe alſo that moued Anſelme to doubt of the archbiſhop of Yorke his meaning, as after it appeered. For being ſummoned to come and receiue his conſecration at Canturburie (as alreadie yee haue heard) through counſell of the canons of Yorke he refuſed ſo to doo: bicauſe they informed him that if he ſo did, it ſhould be greatlie preiudiciall to the liberties of that ſee, whoſe archbiſhop was of like authoritie in all things vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie, ſo that he was bound onelie to fetch his conſecration and benediction at Canturburie, but in no wiſe to acknowledge anie ſubiection vnto that ſee. ¶ For ye muſt vnderſtand, that there was great ſtomaching betwixt the clergie of the two prouinces, Canturburie and Yorke, about the metropolitane prerogatiue: and euer as occaſion ſerued, and as they thought the fauor of the prince, or opportunitie of time might aduance their quarels, they of Yorke ſticked not to vtter their greeſes, in that (as they tooke it) ſome iniurie was offered them therein.

The archbiſhop of Yorke being thus inſtructed by the canons of his church, ſignified to archbiſhop Anſelme the cauſe why he came not at his ſummons. The copie of a parcell whereof is here exemplified. Cauſam, qua differtur ſacratio mea, quam nemo ſtudioſius quàm ego vellet accellerare, qui protulerunt, non deſiſtunt corroborare. Quamobrem, quàm periculoſum & quàm turpe ſit, contra conſenſum eccleſiæ, cui præfici debeo, regimen ipſius inuadere, veſtra diſcretio nouerit. Sed & quàm formidabile & quàm ſit euitandum, ſub ſpecie benedictionis maledictionem induere, &c: that is;

> The cauſe why my conſecration is deferred, which no man liuing would wiſh to be doone with more ſpeed than I my ſelfe: thoſe that haue prolonged it, ceaſſe not to confirme. Wherefore how dangerous and how diſhoneſt it ſhould be for me to inuade the gouernment of that church, which I ought to rule, without cõſent of the ſame, your diſcretion right well vnderſtandeth. Yea and how dreadfull a thing it is, and how much to be auoided to receiue a curſſe, vnder colour of a bleſſing, &c.

The biſhop of London deane to the archbiſhop of Canturburie. The biſhop of Rocheſter his chapleine.

Anſelme hauing alreadie written twice vnto the ſaid Thomas archbiſhop of Yorke about this matter, and now receiuing this anſwer, could not be quiet in mind, and therevpon taking aduice with certeine biſhops whom he called vnto him, determined to ſend two biſhops vnto the ſaid Thomas of Yorke: and ſo the biſhop of London (as deane to the archbiſhop of Canturburie) & the biſhop of Rocheſter (as his houſehold chapleine) were ſent to commune with him, who met them at his manour of Southwell, where they declared to him the effect of their meſſage: but he deferred his anſwer, till a meſſenger which he had ſent to the king (as then being in Normandie) was returned, and ſo without any full anſwer the biſhops came backe againe.

Anſelme ſendeth to the king.

Howbeit ſhortlie after, there came to Canturburie a meſſenger on the behalfe of the archbiſhop of Yorke, with letters incloſed vnder the kings ſeale, by the tenour whereof the king commanded Anſelme, that the conſecration of the archbiſhop of Yorke might ſtaie till the feaſt of Eaſter; and if he might returne into England by that daie, he promiſed (by the aduice had therein of the biſhops and barons of his realme) that he would ſet a direction betwixt them in all matters, whereof anie controuerſie had beene moued heretofore: or if he could not returne ſo ſoone, he would yet take ſuch order, that brotherlie loue & concord might remaine betwixt them. When he that brought theſe letters required an anſwer, Anſelme anſwered, that he would ſignifie his mind to the king, and not to his maiſter. Immediatlie therefore was the deane of Chicheſter ſent ouer from Anſelme, with a monke of Becheſlouin to the king, to informe him of all the matter, and to beſeech his maieſtie, by his authoritie to prouide, that no diſcord ſhould riſe to the diuiding of the preſent ſtate of the church of England. Furthermore, whereas he had commanded him to grant vnto Thomas the archbiſhop of Yorke, a time of reſpit; he ſhould take for certeine anſwer, that he would rather ſuffer himſelfe to be cut in peeces, than to grant ſo much as one houres ſpace on the ſaid Thomas of Yorke, whome he knew alreadie to haue ſet himſelfe vniuſtlie againſt the ancient conſtitutions of holie fathers, and againſt the Lord himſelfe. The meſſengers declared theſe things to the king, and brought word backe againe at their returne, that the king had heard their meſſage with fauourable mind, and promiſed by the power of God, to declare to the world that he coueted vnitie, and not any diuiſion in the church of England.

Anſelme ſicke.

All this while Anſelme was deteined with long and greeuous ſickneſſe, and yet not forgetfull of the obſtinate dealing of Thomas of Yorke, he wrote letters vnto him, by vertue whereof he ſuſpended him from exerciſing all paſtorall function, till he had reformed his errour, ſubmitted himſelfe to receiue his bleſſing, and acknowledged his ſubiection to the church of Canturburie, as his predeceſſours Thomas and Gerard had doone, and before them other ancients, as cuſtome had preſcribed. Thus he charged him, vpon paine of curſing, except he would renounce his archbiſhops dignitie: for in ſo dooing he did grant him licence to vſe the office and miniſterie of a preeſt (which before time he had taken vpon him) or elſe not.

Letters from Anſelme.

In the ſame letters he prohibited all the biſhops within the precinct of the Ile of Britaine, that in no wiſe they ſhould conſecrate him, vpon paine of curſing: and if he ſhould chance to be conſecrated by any ſtranger, that in no wiſe they ſhould (vnder the like paine) receiue him for archbiſhop, or communicate with him in any condition. Euerie biſhop alſo within the whole Ile of Britaine had a copie of theſe leters directed to him from Anſelme vnder his ſeale, commanding them to behaue themſelues therein according to the contents, and as they were bound by the ſubiection which they owght to the church of Canturburie. The letters were dated alike in March.

The prior of Elie, named Richard, deſirous to honour himſelfe and his houſe with the title of a biſhops dignitie, procured the erection of that biſhoprike, firſt mouing the king therein, and after perſuading with the biſhop of Lincolne to grant his good will: but yet yer the matter was brought to perfection, this prior died, and ſo the ſaid Haruie enioied the roome: wherein the prouerbe tooke place, that One ſoweth, but an other reapeth (as Polydor alledgeth it.) Shortlie after the deceaſſe of Anſelme, a Legat came from Rome, bringing with him the pall for the archbiſhop of Yorke. Howbeit now that Anſelme was dead, the ſaid Legat wiſt not what to doo in the matter, bicauſe he was appointed to deliuer the pall firſt and immediatlie vnto Anſelme, and further therein to deale (concerning the beſtowing thereof) as ſhould ſeeme good vnto him.

The earle of Mellent.

Samſon biſhop of worceſter.

In the feaſt of Pentecoſt next inſuing, the king returned from Normandie, and held his court at London, where after the ſolemnitie of that feaſt, he called an aſſemblie of the biſhops, to vnderſtand what was to be doone in the matter, for the conſecration of the archbiſhop of Yorke. Here were the letters ſhewed which the archbiſhop Anſelme had (a little before his death) directed vnto euerie of the biſhops as before yee haue heard. Which when the earle of Mellent had read, and vnderſtood the effect, he aſked what he was that durſt receiue any ſuch letters without the kings aſſent and commandement? At length the biſhops aduiſing themſelues what they had to doo, required Samſon biſhop of Worceſter to declare his opinion, who boldlie ſpake theſe words; Although this man, who is elected archbiſhop, is my ſonne, whome in times paſt I begot of my wife, and therfore ought to ſeeke his aduancement as nature and worldlie reſpects might moue me: yet am I more bound vnto the church of Canturburie, my mother, which hath preferred me to this honor that I doo beare, and by the miniſterie of a biſhoplike office hath made me partaker of that grace, which it hath deſerued to enioy of the Lord. Wherefore I would it ſhould be notified vnto you all, that I meane to obeie in euerie condition the commandement conteined in the letters of our father Anſelme concerning the matter which you haue now in hand. For I will neuer giue mine aſſent, that Thomas nominated archbiſhop of Yorke ſhall be conſecrated, till he haue profeſſed his due and canonicall obedience touching his ſubiection to the church of Canturburie. For I my ſelfe was preſent when my brother Thomas archbiſhop of Yorke, conſtreined both by ancient cuſtomes and inuincible reaſons, did profeſſe the like ſubiection vnto archbiſhop Lanfranke, and all his ſucceſſours the archbiſhops of Canturburie.

Looke in pag. 9. in both columns, where you ſhall ſee this matter determined.

The proteſtation of the biſhops to the king.

Theſe words thus vttered by the biſhop of Worceſter, all the biſhops returned togither, and comming before the kings preſence, boldlie confeſſed that they had receiued Anſelmes letters, and would not doo any thing contrarie to the tenour of the ſame. Whereat the earle of Mellent ſhooke the head, as though he ment to accuſe them of contempt towards the king. But the king himſelfe vttered his mind, and ſaid, that whatſoeuer other men thought of the matter, he ſuerlie was of the like mind with the biſhops, & would be loth to run in danger of Anſelms curſſe. Wherefore it was determined, that the elect of Yorke ſhould either acknowledge his ſubiection to the church of Canturburie, or elſe forgo his dignitie of archbiſhop: whervpon in the end he came to London, and there vpon the 28. daie of Maie was conſecrated by Richard biſhop of London, as deane to the ſee of Canturburie. Then hauing the profeſſion or proteſtation of his ſubiection to the ſee of Canturburie deliuered him vnder ſeale, he brake vp the ſame, and read the writing in maner and forme following:

The tenour of the profeſſion which the archbiſhop of Yorke made vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie.

Ego Thomas Eboracenſis eccleſiæ conſecrandus metropolitanus, profiteor ſubiectionem & canonicam obedientiam ſanctæ Dorobernenſi eccleſiæ, & eiuſdem eccleſiæ primati canonicè electo & conſecrato, & ſucceſſoribus ſuis canonicè inthronizatis, ſalua fidelitate domini mei Henrici regis Anglorum, & ſalua obedientia ex parte mea tenenda, quam Thomas anteceſſor meus ſanctæ Romanæ eccleſiæ ex parte ſua profeſſus eſt: that is;

I Thomas to be conſecrated metropolitane archbiſhop of Yorke, profeſſe my ſubiection and canonicall obedience vnto the holie church of Canturburie, and to the primate of the ſame church canonicallie elected and conſecrated, and to his ſucceſſours canonicallie inthronized, ſauing the faith which I owe vnto my ſoueraigne lord Henrie king of the Engliſh, and ſauing the obedience to be holden of my part, which Thomas my predeceſſour profeſſed on his behalfe vnto the holie church of Rome.

When this writing was read, the biſhop of London tooke it, and deliuered it vnto the prior of Canturburie, appointing him to keepe the ſame as a teſtimoniall for the time to come. Thus was Thomas the archbiſhop of Yorke conſecrated, being the 27. in number that had gouerned that ſee, who when he was conſecrated, the popes Legate went vnto Yorke, and there deliuered to the ſame archbiſhop the pall, wherewith when he was inueſted, he departed and returned to Rome, as he was appointed.

At the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe next inſuing, the king held his court at London with great ſolemnitie. The archbiſhop of Yorke prepared to haue ſet the crowne on the kings head, and to haue ſoong maſſe afore him, bicauſe the archbiſhops ſee at Canturburie was void. But the biſhop of London would not ſuffer it, claiming as high deane to the ſee of Canturburie to execute that office, and ſo did, leading the king to the church after the maner. Howbeit when they ſhould come to ſit downe at dinner, there kindled a ſtrife betwixt the ſaid two biſhops about their places, bicauſe the biſhop of London, for that he had beene ordeined long before the archbiſhop, and therefore not onelie as deane to the ſee of Canturburie, but alſo by reaſon of prioritie, pretended to haue the vpper ſeat. But the king perceiuing their maner, would not heare them, but commanded them out of his houſe, and get them to dinner at their innes.

Preeſts prohibited to marie or keepe women,

About the ſame time the cauſe of the mariage of preeſts and their keeping of women came againe into queſtion, ſo that by the kings commandement, they were more ſtreightlie forbidden the companie of women than before in Anſelmes time. For after his deceaſſe, diuerſe of them (as it were promiſing to themſelues a new libertie to doo that which in his life time they were conſtreined ſore againſt their willes to forbeare) deceiued themſelues by their haſtie dealing. For the king being informed thereof, by the force of the eccleſiaſticall lawes compelled them to ſtand to and obeie the decree of the councell holden at London by Anſelme (as before ye haue heard) at leaſt wiſe in the ſight of men. But if ſo it be (ſaieth Eadmerus) that the preeſts attempt to doo worſſe, as it were to the condemnation and reproofe of Anſelmes doings, let the charge light on their heads, ſith euerie man ſhall beare his owne burthen: for I know (ſaith he) that if fornicatours and adulterers God will iudge, the abuſers of their one couſins (I will not ſay their owne ſiſters and daughters) ſhall not ſuerlie eſcape his iudgement.

The archbiſhops ſee of Canturburie in the kings hand foure yeares.

Now, as alſo before, the king continued his inordinate deſire of inriching himſelfe, for the fulfilling of which hungrie appetite (called Sacra of the poets Per antiphraſin) he pinched manie ſo ſore, that they ceaſſed not to ſpeake verie ill of his doings. He did alſo incurre the miſliking of verie manie people, bicauſe he kept ſtill the ſee of Canturburie in his hands, and would not beſtow it, for that he found ſweetneſſe in receiuing all the profits and reuenues belonging therevnto, during the time that it remained vacant, which was the ſpace of foure yeares, or thereabouts.

In like maner, when he was admoniſhed to place ſome meet man in the roome, he would ſaie, that he was willing to beſtow it, but he tooke the longer time, for that he meant to find ſuch a one to prefer therto as ſhould not be too far behind Lanfranke and Anſelme in doctrine, vertue and wiſedome. And ſith there was none ſuch yet to be found, he ſuffered that ſee to be void till ſuch could be prouided. This excuſe he pretended, as though he were more carefull for the placing of a worthie man, than of the gaine that followed during the time of the vacation. Howbeit not long after, he tranſlated one Richard biſhop of London to that archbiſhoprike, who enioieng it but a while, he gaue the ſame to one Raſe then biſhop of Rocheſter, and made him archbiſhop of Canturburie, being the 35. in order that ruled that ſee. He was elected at Windſor the 26. of Aprill, and on the 16. daie of Maie inſtalled at Canturburie, great preparation being made for the feaſt which was holden at the ſame. Soone after likewiſe he ſent for his pall to Rome, which was brought from Paſchall by one Anſelme nephue vnto the late archbiſhop Anſelme. About this time alſo the pope found himſelfe greeued, for that his authoritie was but little eſteemed in England, & for that no perſons were permitted to appeale to Rome in caſes of controuerſie, and for that (without ſeeking to obteine his licence and conſent) they did keepe their ſynods & councels about eccleſiaſticall affaires, neither would obeie ſuch Legats as he did ſend, nor come to the conuocations which they held. In ſo much that one Cono the popes Legat in France had excommunicated all the preeſts of Normandie, bicauſe they would not come to a ſynod which they had ſummoned. Wherevpon the king being ſomewhat troubled, by aduice of his councell, ſent the biſhop of Exceſter to Rome, (though he were then blind) to talke with the pope concerning that matter.

Not long after this Thomas the archbiſhop of Yorke died: after whom ſucceeded Thurſtane, a man of a loftie ſtomach, but yet of notable learning, who euen at the verie firſt began to contend with Raſe the archbiſhop of Canturburie about the title and right of the primaſie. And though the king aduiſed him to ſtand to the order which the late archbiſhops of Yorke had obſerued, yet he would not ſtaie the matter, ſith he ſaw that archbiſhop Raſe being ſicke and diſeaſed, could not attend to preuent his doings. Thurſtane therfore conſecrated certeine biſhops of Scotland, and firſt of all Giles Aldane the elect biſhop of S. Ninian, who promiſed and tooke his oth (as the manner is) to obeie him in all things as his primate.

The citie of Worceſter about this ſeaſon was by a caſuall fire almoſt wholie burnt vp and conſumed. Which miſhap, bicauſe that citie ioineth neere vnto Wales, was thought to be a ſignification of troubles to folow by the inſurrection of the Welſhmen: who conceiuing hope of good ſpeed by their good ſucceſſe in the wars held with William Rufus, began now to inuade & waſte the Engliſh marſhes. Wherevpon king Henrie deſirous to tame their hautie ſtomachs (bicauſe it was a greefe to him ſtill to be vexed with ſuch tumults and vpriſings as they dailie procured) aſſembled a mightie armie, and went into Wales. Now bicauſe he knew the Welſhmen truſted more to the woods and mountains, than to their owne ſtrength, he beſet all the places of their refuge with armed men, and ſent into the woods certeine bands to laie them waſte, & to hunt the Welſh out of their holes. The ſoldiours (for their parts) needed no exhortation: for remembring the loſſes ſuſteined afore time at the Welſhmens hands, they ſhewed well by their freſh purſute, how much they deſired to

The king thus hauing vanquiſhed and ouercome the Welſhmen, placed gariſons in ſundrie townes & caſtels, where he thought moſt neceſſarie, and then returned to London with great triumph. Thither ſhortlie after came ambaſſadours from the emperour, requiring the kings daughter affianced (as before you haue heard) vnto him, and (being now viripotent or mariable) deſired that ſhe might be deliuered vnto them. King Henrie hauing heard their ſute and willing with ſpéed to performe the ſame, raiſed a great tax among his ſubiects, rated after euerie hide of land which they held, & taking of ech one thrée ſhillings towards the paiment of the monie which was couenanted to be giuen with hir at the time of the contract. Which when the king had leuied, with much more, towards the charges to be emploied in ſending hir forth, he appointed certeine of his greateſt péeres to ſafe conduct hir vnto hir huſband, who with all conuenient ſpéed conueied hir into Germanie, and in verie honorable maner there deliuered hir vnto the foreſaid emperour. After this, the king went into Normandie, and there created his ſonne William duke of that countrie, cauſing the people to ſweare fealtie and obedience to him, whereof roſe a cuſtome, that the kings of England from thenceforth (ſo long as Normandie remained in their hands) made euer their eldeſt ſonnes dukes of that countrie. In this yeare about the fiftéenth daie of October, the ſea ſo decreaſed and ſhranke from the old accuſtomed water-markes and coaſts of the land here in this realme, that a man might haue paſſed on foot ouer the ſands and waſhes, for the ſpace of a whole daie togither, ſo that it was taken for a great woonder. It was alſo noted, that the maine riuers (which by the tides of the ſea vſed to ebbe and flow twice in 24. houres) became ſo ſhallow, that in many places men might go ouer them without danger, and namlie the riuer of Thames was ſo lowe for the ſpace of a day and a night, that horſſes, men, and children paſſed ouer it betwixt London bridge and the tower, and alſo vnder the bridge, the water not reaching aboue their knées. Moreouer, in the moneth of December, the aire appeared red, as though it had burned. In like maner, the Winter was verie extreame cold with froſts, by reaſon whereof at the thawing and breaking of the yce, the moſt part of all the bridges in England were broken and borne downe.

Griffin ap Rice dooth much hurt on the marſhes.
Polydor.

Not long after this, Griffin ap Rées tooke a great preie and bootie out of the countries ſubiect to the king within the limits of Wales, and burned the kings caſtels, bicauſe he would not reſtore ſuch lands and poſſeſſions vnto him as apperteined to his father Rées or Rice. Howbeit, the king (notwithſtanding this buſineſſe) being not otherwiſe troubled with any other warres or weightie affaires, deferred his voiage into thoſe quarters, and firſt called a councell of his lords both ſpirituall and temporall at Saliſburie on the nintéenth daie of March, wherein manie things were ordeined for the wealth and quiet ſtate of the land. And firſt he ſware the Nobilitie of the realme, that they ſhould be true to him and his ſonne William after his deceaſſe. Secondlie, he appeaſed ſundrie matters then in controuerſie betwixt the Nobles and great Péers, cauſing the ſame to be brought to an end, and the parties made fréends: the diuiſion betwixt the archbiſhops of Yorke and Canturburie (which had long depended in triall, and could not as yet haue end) excepted. For ambitious Thurſtane would not ſtand to any decrée or order therin, except he might haue had his whole will, ſo that the king taking diſpleaſure with him for his obſtinate demeanor, commanded him either to be conformable to the decrée made in Lanfranks time, or elſe to renounce his miter, which to doo (rather than to acknowledge any ſubiection to the archbiſhop of Canturburie) he ſéemed to be verie willing at the firſt, but afterwards repented him of his ſpéech paſſed in that behalfe. Now when the councell was ended, and the king went ouer into Normandie, he followed, truſting by ſome meanes to perſuade the king, that he might haue his furtherance to be conſecrated, without recognizing any obedience to the ſée of Canturburie: but the king would not heare him, whereby the matter reſted long in ſute, as héereafter ſhall appeare.

Thurſtane refuſeth to obey the kings pleaſure.
Eadmerus.

¶ Hereby it is plaine (as Polydor ſaith) how the biſhops in thoſe daies were blinded with couetouſneſſe and ambition, not conſidering that it was their duties to deſpiſe ſuch worldlie pompe, as the people regard, and that their calling required a ſtudious endeuour for the health of ſuch ſoules as fell to their charge. Neither yet remembred they the ſimplicitie of Chriſt, and his contempt of worldlie dignitie, when he refuſed to ſatiſfie the humor of the people, who verie deſirouſlie would haue made him a king, but withdrew himſelfe, and departed to a mountaine himſelfe alone. They were rather infected with the ambition of the apoſtles, contending one with another for the primaſie, forgetting the vocation whereto Chriſt had ſeparated them, not to rule as kings ouer the gentiles; but to ſubmit their necks to the yokes of obedience, as they had Chriſt their maiſter an example and preſident.

The firſt vſe of parlements in England.

¶ Here is to be noted, that before this time, the kings of England vſed but ſeldome to call togither the ſtates of the realme after any certeine maner or generall kind of proceſſe, to haue their conſents in matters to be decréed. But as the lords of the priuie councell in our time doo ſit onlie when neceſſitie requireth, ſo did they whenſoeuer it pleaſed the king to haue any conference with them. So that from this Henrie it may be thought the firſt vſe of the parlement to haue procéeded, which ſith that time hath remained in force, and is continued vnto our times, inſomuch that whatſoeuer is to be decréed touching the ſtate of the commonwealth and conſeruation thereof, is now referred to that councell. And furthermore, if any thing be appointed by the king or any other perſon to be vſed for the wealth of the realme, it ſhall not yet be receiued as law, till by authoritie of this aſſemblie it be eſtabliſhed.

Now bicauſe the houſe ſhould not be troubled with multitude of vnlearned cõmoners, whoſe propertie is to vnderſtand little reaſon, and yet to conceiue well of their owne dooings: there was a certeine order taken, what maner of eccleſiaſticall perſons, and what number and ſort of temporall men ſhould be called vnto the ſame, and how they ſhould be choſen by voices of free holders, that being as atturnies for their countries, that which they confeſſed or denied, ſhould bind the reſidue of the realme to receiue it as a law. This counſell is called a parlement, by the French word, for ſo the Frenchmen call their publike aſſemblies.

The maner of the parlement in England.

The maner of their conſulting heere in England in their ſaid aſſemblies of parlement is on this wiſe. Whereas they haue to intreat of matters touching the commoditie both of the prince and of the people, that euerie man may haue free libertie to vtter what he thinketh, they are appointed to ſit in ſeuerall chambers, the king, the biſhops, and lords of the realme ſit in one chamber to conferre togither by themſelues; and the commoners called knights for the ſhires, citizens of cities, and burgeſſes of good townes in another. Theſe chooſe ſome wiſe, eloquent, and learned man to be their prolocutor or ſpeaker (as they terme him) who propoundeth thoſe things vnto them that are to be talked of, and aſketh euerie mans opinion concerning the concluſion thereof. In like ſort, when any thing is agreed vpon, and decreed by them in this place (which they call the lower houſe in reſpect of their eſtate) he declareth it againe to the lords that ſit in the other chamber called the higher houſe, demanding likewiſe their iudgements touching the ſame. For nothing is ratified there, except it be agreed vpon by the conſent of the more part of both thoſe houſes. Now when they haue ſaid their minds, and yeelded their confirmation therevnto, the finall ratification is referred to the prince; ſo that if he thinke good that it ſhall paſſe for a law, he confirmeth alſo by the mouth of the lord Chancelor of the realme, who is prolocutor to the lords alwaies by the cuſtome of that houſe.

The ſame order is vſed alſo by the biſhops and ſpiritualtie in their conuocation houſes. For the biſhops ſit in one place by themſelues as in the higher houſe, and the deanes, archdeacons, and other procurators of the ſpiritualtie in an other, as in the lower houſe, whoſe prolocutor declareth to the biſhops what is agreed vpon by them. Then the archbiſhop (by conſent of the more part of them that are aſſembled in both thoſe conuocation houſes) ratifieth and pronounceth their decrees for lawes, remitting (notwithſtanding) the finall ratification of them to the temporall houſes.

This is the order of the lawgiuing of England; and in ſuch decrees (eſtabliſhed by authoritie of the prince, the lords ſpirituall and temporall, and the commons of this realme thus aſſembled in parlement) conſiſteth the whole force of our Engliſh lawes. Which decrees are called ſtatutes, meaning by that name, that the ſame ſhould ſtand firme and ſtable, and not be repealed without the conſent of an other parlement, and that vpon good and great conſideration.

Simon Dun.

About this ſeaſon, one Owin (whome ſome name prince of Wales) was ſlaine, as Simon Dunelmen. writeth, but by whom, or in what ſort, he ſheweth not. In this eighteenth yeare of king Henries reigne, on All hallowes daie, or firſt of Nouember, great lightning, thunder, and ſuch a ſtorme of haile fell, that the people were maruelloüſlie amazed therwith. Alſo on the thirteenth of December, there happened a great earthquake, and the moone was turned into a bloodie colour: which ſtrange accidents fell about the middeſt of the night. At the ſame time, queene Maud, wife to king Henrie departed this life. But now to returne to other doings.

Foulke earle of Aniou.

It chanced vpon a ſmall occaſion, that verie ſore and dangerous warres followed out of hand, betwixt king Henrie and Lewes ſurnamed the groſſe king of France: the beginning whereof grew herevpon. Theobald earle of Champaigne, deſcended of the earles of Blois, was linked in amitie with king Henrie, by reaſon of affinitie that was betwixt them (for Stephan the earle of Blois married ladie Adila the ſiſter of king Henrie.) Now it happened, that the foreſaid Theobald had by chance offended the ſaid Lewes, who in reuenge made ſharpe warres vpon him. But earle Theobald hoping for aid to be ſent from his freends in the meane time valiantlie reſiſted him, and at length (by reaſon of a power of men which came to him from king Henrie) in ſuch ſort vexed and annoied the French king, that he conſulted with Baldwine earle of Flanders, and Foulke earle of Aniou, by what means he might beſt depriue king Henrie of his duchie of Normandie, and reſtore the ſame vnto William the ſonne of duke Robert, vnto whom of right he ſaid it did belong.

King Henrie paſſeth ouer into Normandie to aſſiſt the erle of Champaigne.

Now king Henrie hauing intelligence of his whole purpoſe, endeuoured on the otherſide to reſiſt his attempts, and after he had leuied a ſore tribute of his ſubiects, paſſed ouer into Normandie with a great power, and no ſmall maſſe of monie, where ioining with earle Theobald, they began to prepare for warre, purpoſing to follow the ſame euen to the vttermoſt. K. Lewes in the meane time, ſuppoſing that all hope of victorie reſted in ſpeedie diſpatch of preſent affaires, determined likewiſe to haue inuaded Normandie vpon the ſudden. But after he perceiued that his enimies were all in a redineſſe, and verie well prouided to reſiſt him: he ſtaied and drew backe a little while. Neuertheleſſe in the end he became ſo deſirous to be dooing with king Henrie, that approching neere vnto the confines of Normandie, he made manie ſkirmiſhes with the Engliſh, yet no notable exploit paſſed betwixt them in that yeare.

¶ Here will I leaue the kings of England and France ſkirmiſhing and encountring one another, and ſhew ſomething more of the contention that was betweene the archbiſhops of Canturburie and Yorke, to the end that their ambitious deſire of worldlie honor may in ſome reſpect appeere.

Anno. Reg. 18.
Anſelme the popes Legat.
The biſhop of Canturburie goth to Rome.

About this verie time, Anſelme the nephue to archbiſhop Anſelme came againe from Rome, with free authoritie to execute the office of the popes legat in England: which ſeemed a thing right ſtrange to the Engliſh clergie. Wherefore the biſhop of Canturburie, to preuent other inconueniences likelie to inſue, tooke vpon him to go vnto Rome, to vnderſtand the popes pleaſure concerning the truth and certeintie of this matter, and to require him in no wiſe to diminiſh the authoritie or to extenuat the prerogatiue of his ſee of Canturburie, which hitherto vſed to determine all cauſes riſing in his prouince.

This ſaid archbiſhop came to Rome, but finding not the pope there, he ſent meſſengers with letters vnto him, then lieng ſicke at Beneuento, and obteined a fauourable anſwer, wherewith returning towards England, he came to the king at Roan (where he had left him at his ſetting forth forward) certifieng him how he had ſped in this voiage. The forſaid Anſelme was alſo ſtaied by the king at Roan, and could not be ſuffered to paſſe ouer into England all that time, till it might be vnderſtood by the returne of the archbiſhop, what the popes pleaſure ſhould be further in that matter. Shortlie after whoſe repaire to the king, word was brought that pope Paſchall was departed this life, and that Gelaſius the ſecond was elected in his place. This Gelaſius (to auoid the dangers that might inſue to him by reaſon of the ſchiſme and controuerſie betwixt the ſée of Rome, and the emperour Henrie the fift) came into France, where he liued not long, but died in the abbeie of Clugnie, after whoſe deceaſe Calixtus the ſecond was called to the papaſie.

Thus by the chance and change of popes, the legatſhip of Anſelme could take no place, although his bulles permitted him without limitation of time, not onelie to call and celebrate ſynods for reformation of diſorders in the church, but alſo for the receiuing of Peter pence to be leuied in England (in the which point pope Paſchall in his life time thought them in England verie ſlacke) as by the ſame bulles more largelie dooth appéere. The archbiſhop of Canturburie had alreadie ſtaied foure or fiue yeares in the parties beyond the ſées, about the matter in controuerſie betwixt him and Thurſtane archbiſhop of Yorke, who was likewiſe gone ouer to ſolicit his cauſe. But where as at the firſt he could not find the king in anie wiſe agréeable to his mind, yet when the councell ſhould be holden at Rhemes by pope Calixt, he ſued at the leaſtwiſe for licence to go thither: but he could neither haue any grant ſo to doo, till he had promiſed (vpon his allegiance which he ought to the king) not to attempt anie thing there that might be preiudiciall to the church of Canturburie in anie maner of wiſe. Neuertheleſſe, at his comming thither, he ſo wrought with bribes and large gifts, that the popes court (a thing eaſilie doone in Rome) fauoured his cauſe; yea, ſuch was his ſucceſſe, that the pope conſecrated him with his owne hands, although king Henrie had giuen notice to him of the controuerſie depending betwixt Thurſtane and Rafe the archbiſhop of Canturburie, requiring him in no wiſe either to conſecrate Thurſtane himſelfe, or grant licence to anie other perſon to conſecrate him: for if he did, ſurelie (for his part) he would baniſh him quite out of his dominion, which ſhould not be long vndoone. In this meane time, the warres were buſilie purſued betwixt the two kings of England & France, and a battell was fought betwéene them, with great ſlaughter on both ſides for the ſpace of nine houres. The forewards on both parties were beaten downe and ouerthrowne; and king Henrie receiued ſundrie ſtripes on his head at the hands of one William Criſpine countie de Eureux, ſo as (though his helmet were verie ſtrong and ſure) the bloud burſt out of his mouth: wherewith he was nothing afraid, but like a fierce lion laid more luſtilie about him, and ſtroke downe diuerſe of his enimies, namelie the ſaid Criſpine, who was there taken priſoner at the kings féet. Now were the kings people incouraged at the valiancie and proweſſe of their king and chieftaine, ſo that at length they opened and ouercame the maine battell, and ſetting vpon the rereward, ouerthrew the whole armie of France, which neuer recoiled, but fought it out euen to the vttermoſt. There died and were taken priſoners in this conflict manie thouſands of men. The French king leauing the field, got him vnto a place called Andelie: and the king of England, recouering a towne by the waie called Nicaſium, which the French king had latelie woone, returned vnto Rouen, where he was with great triumph receiued, and highlie commended for his noble victorie thus atchiued.

But as he was come before the towne of Augen in the moneth of September, and aſſailed the ſame, he receiued his deaths wound in the head, wherevpon returning home in the ninth moneth after, when he could not be cured of his hurt, he departed this life at Roſlare the 17. daie of Iune.

Shortlie after Foulke earle of Aniou (who before had aided the French king againſt king Henrie) became now kings Henries fréend by aliance, marieng his daughter to William king Henries eldeſt ſonne. But the French king (as their hiſtories make mention) minding ſtill to be reuenged of the earle Theobald, inuaded his countrie againe with a puiſſant armie, and had deſtroied the citie of Chartres, which belonged vnto the ſame earle, had not the citizens humbled themſelues to his mercie: and ſo likewiſe did the earle, as may be thought. For in the warres which immediatlie followed betwixt Lewes and the emperour Henrie, the erle aided the French king againſt the ſame emperour to the vttermoſt of his power. Soone after this, the king came to an enterview with pope Calixtus at Giſors, where manie matters were talked of betwixt them: and amongſt other, the king required of the pope a grant of all ſuch liberties as his father enioied within the limits of England and Normandie, and chéefelie, that no legat ſhould haue any thing to doo within England, except he required to haue one ſent him for ſome vrgent cauſe.

Foulke earle of Aniou became the king of Englands man.

The king and the pope come to an enterview at Giſors

All which matters being determined (as the ſtate of the time preſent required) the pope beſought the king to be good vnto archbiſhop Thurſtane, and to reſtore him to his ſée: but the king proteſted that he had vowed neuer ſo to doo whileſt he liued. Wherevnto the pope anſwered, that he was pope, and by his apoſtolike power he would diſcharge him of that vow, if he would ſatisfie his requeſt. The king to ſhift the matter off, promiſed the pope that he would take aduice of his councell, and giue him further knowledge, as the cauſe required, wherevpon departing from thenſe, he did afterwards (vpon farther deliberation) ſend him this meſſage, in effect as followeth.

The kings anſwer ſent to the pope.

Whereas he ſaith he is pope, and will (as he ſaid) aſſoile me of the vow which I haue made, if contrarie thereto I will reſtore Thurſtane to the ſée of Yorke: I thinke it not to ſtand with the honor of a king, to conſent in any wiſe vnto ſuch an abſolution. For who ſhall beléeue an others promiſe hereafter, if by mine example he ſée the ſame ſo eaſilie by an abſolution to be made void? But ſith he hath ſo great a deſire to haue Thurſtane reſtored, I ſhall be contented at his requeſt, to receiue him to his ſée, with this condition, that he ſhall acknowledge his church to be ſubiect vnto the ſée of Canturburie, as his predeceſſours haue doone before him; although in fine this offer would not ſerue the turne.

ſo that William ſonne to king Henrie did homage vnto king Lewes for the duchie of Normandie. And further it was accorded betwéene them, that all thoſe that had borne armour either on the one ſide or the other, ſhould be pardoned, whoſe ſubiects ſoeuer they were. In like maner, Raſe archbiſhop of Canturburie returned into England, after he had remained long in Normandie, bicauſe of the controuerſie betwixt him and Thurſtan archbiſhop of Yorke, as is aforeſaid.

Eadmerus.

Now ſhortlie after his returne to Canturburie, meſſengers came with letters from Alexander king of Scotland vnto him, ſignifieng, that where the ſée of S. Andrews was void, the ſame king did inſtantlie require him to ſend ouer Eadmer a monke of Canturburie (of whome he had heard great commendation for his ſufficiencie of vertue and learning) to be ſeated there. ¶ This Eadmer is the ſame which wrote the hiſtorie intituled Hiſtoria nouorum in Anglia, out of which (as may appeare) we haue gathered the moſt part of our matters concerning Anſelme and Raſe archbiſhops of Canturburie, in whoſe daies he liued, and was Anſelmes diſciple.

Alexander K. of Scots.

Eadmer Anſelmes diſciple.

Archbiſhop Raſe was contented to ſatiſfie the requeſt of king Alexander in that behalfe, and obteining the conſent of king Henrie, he ſent the ſaid Eadmer into Scotland with letters of commendation vnto the ſaid king Alexander, who receiued him right ioifullie, and vpon the third daie after his comming thither (being the feaſt of the apoſtles Peter & Paule) he was elected archbiſhop of S. Andrews by the clergie and people of the land, to the great reioicing of Alexander, and the reſt of the Nobilitie. The next daie after the king talked with him ſecretlie of his conſecration, and vttered to him how he had no mind to haue him conſecrated at the hands of Thurſtan archbiſhop of Yorke. In which caſe when he was informed by the ſaid Eadmer, that no ſuch thing néeded to trouble his mind, ſince the archbiſhop of Canturburie, being primate of all Britaine, might conſecrate him as reaſon was; the king could not away with that anſwer, bicauſe he would not heare that the church of Canturburie ſhould be preferred before the church of S. Andrews. Herevpon he departed from Eadmer in diſpleaſure, and calling one William (ſometime monke of S. Edmundſbury) vnto him, a man alſo that had gouerned (or rather ſpoiled) the church of S. Andrews in the vacation: this William was commanded to take vpon him the charge thereof againe, at the kings pleaſure, whoſe meaning was vtterlie to remooue Eadmer, as not worthie of that roome. Howbeit, within a moneth after (to ſatiſfie the minds of his Nobles) he called for the ſaid Eadmer, and with much adoo got him to receiue the ſtaffe of that biſhoprike, taking it from an altar whereon it laie (as if he ſhuld haue that dignitie at the Lords hands) whereby he was inueſted, & went ſtreight to S. Andrews church, where he was receiued by the quier, the ſchollers, and all the people, for true and lawfull biſhop.

Eadmer receiueth his ſtaffe from an altar.

In this meane while Thurſtan nothing ſlacking his ſute in the popes court, obteined ſuch fauour (wherein the king of England alſo was greatlie laboured vnto) that he wrote letters thrice vnto the king of Scotland, and once vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie, that neither the king ſhould permit Eadmer to be conſecrated, nor the archbiſhop of Canturburie in any wiſe conſecrate him if he were therevnto required. Herevpon it came to paſſe, that finallie Eadmer, after he had remained in Scotland twelue moneths or thereabouts, and perceiued that things went not as he would haue wiſhed (for that he could not get the kings conſent that he ſhuld be conſecrated of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, as it was firſt meant both by the archbiſhop and Eadmer) he departed out of Scotland, and returned againe to Canturburie, there to take further aduice in all things as cauſe ſhould mooue him. In like maner king Henrie, hauing quieted his buſineſſe in France, returned into England, where he was receiued and welcomed home with great ioy and triumph; but ſuch publike reioiſing laſted not long with him. For indéed, this pleaſantneſſe and mirth was changed into mourning, by aduertiſement giuen of the death of the kings ſons, William duke of Normandie, and Richard his brother, who togither with their ſiſter the ladie Marie counteſſe of Perch, Richard earle of Cheſter, with his brother Otwell gouernour to duke William, and the ſaid earle of Cheſter his wife the kings néece, the archdeacon of Hereford, Geffrey Riddle, Robert Manduit, William Bigot, and diuerſe other, to the number of an hundreth and fourtie perſons, beſides fiftie mariners, tooke ſhip at Harflew, thinking to follow the king, and ſailing forth with a ſouth wind, their ſhip thorough negligence of the mariners (who had drunke out their wits & reaſon) were throwne vpon a rocke, and vtterlie periſhed on the coaſt of England, vpon the 25. of Nouember, ſo that of all the companie none eſcaped but one butcher, who catching hold of the maſt, was driuen with the ſame to the ſhore which was at hand, and ſo ſaued from that dangerous ſhipwracke. Duke William might alſo haue eſcaped verie well, if pitie had not mooued him more than the regard of his owne preſeruation. For being gotten into the ſhipboat, and lanching toward the land, he heard the ſkréeking of his ſiſter in dreadfull danger of drowning, and crieng out for ſuccour; wherevpon he commanded them that rowed the boat to turne backe to the ſhip, and to take hir in. But ſuch was the preaſe of the companie that ſtroue to leape in with hir, that it ſtreightwaies ſanke, ſo that all thoſe which were alreadie in the boat were caſt awaie.

¶ Here (by the way) would be noted the vnaduiſed ſpeech of William Rufus to the ſhipmaiſter, whome he emboldened with a vaine and deſperat perſuaſion in tempeſtuous weather and high ſeas to hoiſe vp ſailes; adding (for further encouragement) that he neuer heard of any king that was drowned. In which words (no doubt) he ſinned preſumptuouſlie againſt God, who in due time puniſhed that offenſe of his in his poſteritie and kinred, euen by the ſame element, whoſe fearſenes he himſelfe ſéemed ſo little to regard, as if he would haue commanded the ſtormes to ceaſe; as we read Chriſt did in the goſpell by the vertue and power of his word. Here is alſo to be noted the variablenes of fortune (as we commonlie call it) or rather the vncerteine and changeable euent of things, which oftentimes doth raiſe vp (euen in the minds of princes) trobleſome thoughts, and gréeuous paſſions, to the great empairing of their quietneſſe: as here we ſée exemplified in king Henrie, whoſe mirth was turned into mone, and his pleaſures relliſhed with pangs of penſifenes, contrarie to his expectation when he was in the midſt of his triumph at his returne out of France into England. So that we ſée the old adage verified, Miſcentur triſtia lætis; and that ſaieng of an old poet iuſtified;

The archbiſhop Thurſtan (after the manner of obteining ſuites in the court of Rome) found ſuch fauour at the hands of pope Calixt, that he directed his letters as well to king Henrie, as to Raſe archbiſhop of Canturburie, by vertue whereof he accurſed them both, and interdicted as well the prouince of Yorke as Canturburie from the vſe of all maner of ſacraments; from baptiſme of infants, the penance of them that died onelie excepted: if archbiſhop Thurſtan were not ſuffered (within one moneth next after the receipt of thoſe letters) to inioy his ſee, without compelling him to make any promiſe of ſubiection at all. Whileſt theſe things were thus a dooing, king Henrie was aduertiſed, that the Welſhmen breaking the peace, did much hurt on the marſhes, & ſpeciallie in Cheſhire where they had burned two caſtels. Meaning therefore to be reuenged on them to the vttermoſt, he aſſembled an armie out of all parts of his realme, and entred with the ſame into Wales. The Welſhmen, hearing that the king was come with ſuch puiſſance to inuade them, were afraid, and forthwith ſent ambaſſadours, beſeeching him to grant them pardon and peace. The king mooued with their humble petitions, tooke hoſtages of them, & remitted them for that time, conſidering that in mainteining of warre againſt ſuch maner of people, there was more feare of loſſe than hope of gaine. But yet to prouide for the quietnes of his ſubiects which inhabited neere the marſhes, that they ſhuld not be ouerrun and harried dailie by them (as oftentimes before they had beene) he appointed Warren earle of Shreweſburie to haue the charge of the marſhes, that peace might be the better kept and mainteined in the countrie.

In the yeare next enſuing, the twentith of October, Raſe archbiſhop of Canturburie departed this life, after he had ruled that ſee the ſpace of 8. yeares, in whoſe roome ſucceeded one William archbiſhop, who was in number the eight and twentith from Auguſtine. Moreouer, Henrie the ſonne of earle Blois, who before was abbat of Glaſtenburie, was now made biſhop of Wincheſter, a man for his ſingular bountie, gentleneſſe and modeſtie greatlie beloued of the Engliſh.

But to returne to the affaires of the king. It chanced about this time, that the parts beyond the ſea (being now void of a gouernour (as they ſuppoſe) by meanes of the death of the kings ſonne) began to make commotions. Soone after it came alſo to paſſe that Robert earle of Mellent rebelled againſt the king, who being ſpeedilie aduertiſed thereof, ſailed forthwith into thoſe quarters, and beſieged the caſtell of Ponteaudemer perteining to the ſaid earle, and tooke it. About the ſame time alſo the king fortified the caſtell of Roan, cauſing a mightie thick wall with turrets therabout as a fortification to be made. Likewiſe, he repaired the caſtell of Caen, the caſtels of Arches, Giſors, Falaiſe, Argentone, Damfront, Vernon, Ambres, with others, & made them ſtrong. In the meane ſeaſon, the earle of Mellent (deſirous to be reuenged of king Henrie) procured aid where he could, and ſo with Hugh earle of Mountfert entred into Normandie, waſting and deſtroieng the countrie with fire and ſword, thinking per long to bring the ſame to obedience. But the kings chamberlaine and lieutenant in thoſe parts, named William de Tankeruile, being thereof aduertiſed, laid an ambuſh for them, and training them within the danger thereof, ſet vpon them, and after long fight, tooke them twaine priſoners, with diuers other, and preſented them both vnto the king, whereby the warres ceaſſed in that countrie for a time.

After this alſo, in the yeare 1125. a cardinall named Iohannes Cremenſis was ſent into England from pope Honorius the ſecond, to ſee reformation in certeine points touching the church: but his cheefe errand was to correct preeſts that ſtill kept their wiues with them. At his firſt comming ouer, he ſoiourned in colledges of cathedrall churches, and in abbeies, addicting himſelfe to lucre & wantonneſſe, reaping where he had not ſowen. At length, about the feaſt of the natiuitie of our ladie, he called a conuocation of the cleargie at London, where making an oration, he inueihed ſore againſt thoſe of the ſpiritualtie that were ſpotted with any note of incontinencie. Manie thought themſelues touched with his words, who hauing ſmelled ſomewhat of his ſecret tricks, that whereas he was a moſt licentious liuer, and an vnchaſt perſon of bodie and mind, yet he was ſo blinded, that he could not perceiue the beame in his own eies, whileſt he eſpied a mote in another mans. Herevpon they grudged, that he ſhould in ſuch wiſe call other men to accompts for their honeſt demeanor of life, which could not render any good reckoning of his owne: inſomuch that they watched him ſo narrowlie, that in the euening (after he had blown his horne ſo lowd againſt other men; in declaring that it was a ſhamefull vice to riſe from the ſide of a ſtrumpet, and preſume to ſacrifice the bodie of Chriſt) he was taken in bed with a ſtrumpet, to his owne ſhame and reproch. But being reproued thereof, he alledged this excuſe (as ſome write) that he was no preeſt, but a reformer of preeſts. Howbeit to conclude, being thus defamed, he got him backe to Rome againe from whence he came, without any performance of that whereabout he was ſent.

empreſſe to come ouer vnto him into Normandie, and hauing ſet his buſineſſe in order on that ſide the ſea, and taken hir with him, he returned into England before the feaſt of S. Michaell, where calling a parlement, he cauſed hir by authoritie of the ſame to be eſtabliſhed as his lawfull heire and ſucceſſor, with an article of intaile vpon hir iſſue, if it ſhould pleaſe God to ſend hir any at all. At this parlement was Dauid K. of Scotland, who ſuccéeded Alexander the fierce. Stephan earle of Morton and Bullongne, and ſon of Stephan earle of Blois, nephue to K. Henrie by his ſiſter Adela; theſe two princes chéefelie tooke their oth amongſt other, to obey the foreſaid empreſſe, as touching hir right and lawfull claime to the crowne of England. But although Stephan was now the firſt that was to ſweare, he became ſhortlie after the firſt that brake that oth for his owne preferment. ¶ Thus it commeth often to paſſe, that thoſe which receiue the greateſt benefits, doo oftentimes ſooneſt forget to be thankefull.

Stephan erle of Bullongne the firſt that offered to receiue the oth.

This Stephan latelie before by his vncle K. Henries meanes, had purchaſed & got in marriage the onelie daughter and heire of Euſtace earle of Bullongne, and ſo after the deceaſe of his father in lawe, became earle there: and further, had goodlie poſſeſſions in England giuen him by the king, and yet (as farther ſhall appeare) he kept not his oth made with K. Henrie. Some write that there roſe no ſmall ſtrife betwixt this earle Stephan, & Robert erle of Glouceſter, in contending which of them ſhould firſt receiue this oth: the one alledging that he was a kings ſon, the other affirming that he was a kings nephue.

Wil. Malm.

Shortlie after this parlement was ended, K. Henrie held his Chriſtmas at Windſor, where Thurſtan archbiſhop of Yorke (in preiudice of the right of William archbiſhop of Canturburie) would haue ſet the crowne vpon the kings head, at his going to the church: but he was put backe with no ſmall reproch; and his chapleine (whom he appointed to beare his croſſe before him at his entrance into the kings chappell) was contemptuouſlie and violentlie thruſt out of the doores with croſſe and all by the fréends of the archbiſhop of Canturburie. In ſhort time, this vnſéemlie contention betwixt Thurſtan and William the two archbiſhops grew ſo hot, that not onelie both of them, but alſo the biſhop of Lincolne went to Rome about the deciding of their ſtrife.

Strife betwixt the prelates for preheminence.

In this yeare Charles earle of Flanders, the ſucceſſor of earle Baldwin, was traitorouſlie murthered of his owne people: & bicauſe he left no iſſue behind him to ſucceed as his heire, Lewes the French king made William the ſonne of duke Robert Curthoſe earle of Flanders, as the next couſine in bloud to the ſame Charles. ¶ Truth it is, that by his fathers ſide, this William was deſcended from erle Baldwin ſurnamed Pius, whoſe daughter Maud being maried vnto William Conqueror, bare by him the foreſaid Robert Curthoſe, father to this William, now aduanced to the gouernment of Flanders, but he wanted not aduerſaries that were competitors and malignant ſutors for that earledome, who ſought to preferre themſelues, and to diſplace him.

Polydor.

William ſonne to Robert Curthoſe made erle of Flanders.

King Henrie miſliking the promotion of the ſaid William, although he was his nephue, for that he ſuppoſed he would ſéeke to reuenge old diſpleaſures if he might compaſſe to haue the French kings aſſiſtance, thought good with the aduice of his councell to withſtand the worſt. Wherevpon he tooke order for the maintenance of the warre abroad, and the ſupplie of ſouldiers, and other things neceſſarie to be conſidered of for the ſuertie of his realme.

After this, bicauſe he was in deſpaire to haue iſſue by his ſecond wife, about Whitſuntide he ſent ouer his daughter Maud the empreſſe into Normandie, that ſhe might be married vnto Geffrey Plantagenet earle of Aniou, and in Auguſt after he followed himſelfe. Now the matter went ſo forward, that the mariage was celebrated betwixt the ſaid earle and empreſſe vpon the firſt ſundaie in Aprill, which fell vpon the third of the moneth, and in the 27. of his reigne.

Who at length contending with other that claimed the earledome, chanced this yeare to be wounded, as he purſued his enimies vnto the walles of a towne called Aluſt, and ſoone after died of the hurt the 16. of Auguſt.

Which was knowen well inough to king Henrie, who mainteined thoſe that made him warre at home, both with men and monie; namelie, William of Ypres, who tooke vpon him as regent in the name of Stephan earle of Bullongne, whome king Henrie procured to make claime to Flanders alſo, in the title of his grandmother quéene Maud, wife to William Conqueror. After this parlement ended, the king kept his Chriſtmaſſe at Worceſter, and his Eaſtermaſſe following at Woodſtocke, where a certeine Noble man named Geffrey Clinton was accuſed to him of high treaſon. In this 31. yeare of king Henries reigne, great death and murren of cattell began in this land ſo vniuerſallie in all places, that no towne nor village eſcaped frée: and long it was before the ſame diſcontinued or ceaſed. King Henrie paſſing ouer into Normandie, was troubled with certeine ſtrange dréames or viſions in his ſléepe. For as he thought, he ſaw a multitude of ploughmen with ſuch tooles as belong to their trade and occupation; after whom came a ſort of ſouldiers with warlike weapons: and laſt of all, biſhops approching towards him with their croſier ſtaues readie to fall vpon him, as if they meant to kill him. Now when he awaked, he lept forth of his bed, got his ſword in his hand, & called his ſeruants to come & helpe him. Neuertheleſſe, repreſſing thoſe perturbations, and ſomewhat better aduiſing himſelfe, partlie by his owne reaſon, and partlie by the counſell of learned gentlemen, was perſuaded to put ſuch fantaſies awaie, and was admoniſhed withall, that whileſt he had time and ſpace here on earth, he ſhould redeeme his paſſed offenſes and ſinnes committed againſt God, with repentance, almeſdeeds, and abſtinence. Wherefore being moued herewith, he began to practiſe an amendment of his former lewd life.

¶ Here it ſhall not be amiſſe to compare the two ſonnes of William the Conquerour; namelie William Rufus, and Henrie Beauclerke togither; and to conſider among other euents the ſupernaturall dreames wherewith they were admoniſhed, to excellent good purpoſe (no doubt) if they could haue applied them to the end whereto they were directed. For William Rufus (as you ſhall read in pag. 26. col. 2.) neglecting to be admoniſhed by a dreadfull dreame wherewith he was troubled, ſhortlie after receiued his deaths wound by caſualtie or chancemedlie, euen in the prime of his paſtime and diſport. This other brother H. Beauclerke had the like warnings by the ſame meanes, and (to a good effect) as the learned doo gather. Their raſh opinion therefore is much to be checked, which contemne dreames as meere deluſorie, alledging by waie of diſprofe an old erronious verſe:

Somnia ne cures, nam fallunt plurima plures,

Speaking indefinitelie of dreames without diſtinction: whereas in truth great valure is in them in reſpect of their kind and nature. For though ſome ſort of dreames (as thoſe that be phyſicall) are not greatlie to be relied vpon; yet thoſe of the metaphyſicall ſort, hauing a ſpeciall influence from aboue natures reach, are not lightlie to be ouerſlipped. To determine this matter I remit the ſtudious readers to that excellent chapter of Peter Martyr, in the firſt part of his common places, pag. 32. columne 2. where dreames In genere are copiouſlie handled.

About the ſame time, Maud daughter of this Henrie, being forſaken of hir huſband Geffrey earle of Aniou, came to hir father then being in Normandie. What the cauſe was why hir huſband put hir from him, is not certeinlie knowen: but the matter (belike) was not verie great, ſith ſhortlie after he receiued hir againe, and that of his owne accord. During the time alſo that king Henrie remained in Normandie, pope Innocent the 2. came into France, to auoid the danger of his enimies: and holding a councell at Cleremont, he accurſed one Peter Fitz Leo, who had vſurped as pope, and named himſelfe Anacletus. Afterward at breaking vp of the ſame counſell at Cleremont, he came to Orleance, and then to Charters, meeting king Henrie by the waie, who offered vnto the pope to mainteine his cauſe againſt his enimies to the vttermoſt of his power, for the which the pope gaue the king great thankes: and ſeeming as though he had beene more carefull for the defenſe of the common cauſe of the chriſtian common-wealth than for his owne, he exhorted king Henrie to make a iournie into the holie land, againſt the Saracens and enimies of the chriſtian religion.

In this enteruiew betwixt the pope and the king, the Romans were mooued to maruell greatlie at the wiſedome and ſharpneſſe of wit which they perceiued in the Normans. For king Henrie, to ſhew what learning remained amongſt the people of the weſt parts of Europe, cauſed the ſonnes of Robert earle of Melent to argue and diſpute in the points and ſubtill ſophiſmes of Logike, with the cardinals and other learned chapleins of the pope there preſent, who were not aſhamed to confeſſe, that there was more learning amongſt them here in the weſt parts, than euer they heard or knew of in their owne countrie of Italie.

King Henrie after this returned into England, and vpon the ſea was in danger to haue beene drowned by tempeſt: ſo that iudging the ſame to be as a warning for him to amend his life, he made manie vowes, and after his landing went to S. Anno Reg. 35.

In the 34. yeare of his reigne, his brother Robert Curthoſe departed this life in the caſtell of Cardiff. It is ſaid that on a feſtiuall daie king Henrie put on a robe of ſcarlet, the cape wherof being ſtreict, he rent it in ſtriuing to put it ouer his head: and perceiuing it would not ſerue him, he laid it aſide, and ſaid; Let my brother Robert haue this robe, who hath a ſharper head than I haue. Which when it was brought to duke Robert, and the rent place not ſowed vp, he perceiued it, and aſked whether any man had worne it before. The meſſenger told the whole matter, how it happened. Wherewith duke Robert tooke ſuch a greefe for the ſcornefull mocke of his brother, that he wared wearie of his life, and ſaid; Now I perceiue I haue liued too long, that my brother ſhall cloth me like his almes man with his caſt and rent garments. Thus curſing the time of his natiuitie, he refuſed from thenceforth to eat or drinke, and ſo pined awaie, and was buried at Glocester.

The deceaſſe of Robert Curthoſe.

King Henrie remaining ſtill in Normandie, rode round about a great part of the countrie, ſhewing no ſmall loue and curteſie to the people, ſtudieng by all meanes poſſible to win their fauours, and being merie amongſt them. Howbeit nothing reioiſed him more, than that his daughter Maud the empreſſe at the ſame time was deliuered of hir ſecond ſonne named Geffrey, ſo that he ſaw himſelfe prouided of an aſſured ſucceſſour.

But whileſt he thus paſſed the time in mirth and ſolace, he began ſoone after to be ſomewhat diſeaſed, and neuer could perceiue any euident cauſe thereof. Wherefore to driue his greefe away, he went abrode to hunt, and being ſomewhat amended thereby (as he thought) at his comming home he would néeds eat of a lamprey, though his phyſician counſelled him to the contrarie: but he delighting moſt in that meat (though it be in qualitie verie hurtfull to health) would not be diſſuaded from it, ſo that his ſtomach being annoied therewith, he fell immediatlie into an ague, and ſo died ſhortlie after, on the firſt day of December, being as then about 67. yeares of age, after he had reigned 35. yeres, & foure moneths lacking foure daies. His bodie was conueied into England, and buried at Reading within the abbey church which he had founded, and endowed in his life time with great and large poſſeſſions. It is written, that his bodie, to auoid the ſtench which had infected manie men, was cloſed in a buls hide, and how he that clenſed the head died of the ſauour which iſſued out of the braine.

¶ Thus we ſée that euen princes come to the like end by as baſe meanes as other inferiour perſons; according to that of the poet:

Dant alios furiæ toruo ſpectacula Marti,
Exitio eſt auidis mare nautis:
Miſta ſenum ac iuuenum denſantur funera, nullum
Sæua caput Proſerpina fugit.

Horat.lib.car. 1.ode 28.

And here we haue to note the neglect of the phyſicians counſell, and that ſame ill diſpoſition in diet which the king choſe rather to ſatiſfie, than by reſtraining it to auoid the danger whereinto he fell. But this is the prepoſterous election of vntoward patients, according to that:

Nitimur in vetitum ſemper, cupimúſq; negata.

The iſſue of king Henrie the firſt.

Touching his iſſue, he had by his firſt wife a ſonne named William, drowned (as ye haue heard) in the ſea; alſo a daughter named Maud, whome with hir ſonnes he appointed to inherit his crowne and other dominions. He had iſſue alſo by one of his concubins, euen a ſonne named Richard, and a daughter named Marie, who were both drowned with their brother William. By an other concubine he had a ſonne named Robert, who was created duke of Gloceſter.

His ſtature.

He was ſtrong of bodie, fleſhie, and of an indifferent ſtature, blacke of haire, and in maner bald before, with great and large eies, of face comelie, well countenanced, and pleaſant to the beholders, ſpeciallie when he was diſpoſed to mirth.

His vertues.

His vices.

He excelled in thrée vertues, wiſedome, eloquence, and valiancie, which notwithſtanding were ſomewhat blemiſhed with the like number of vices that reigned in him; as couetouſneſſe, crueltie, and fleſhlie luſt of bodie. His couetouſneſſe appeared, in that he ſore oppreſſed his ſubiects with tributes and impoſitions. His crueltie, in that he kept his brother Robert Curtehoſe in perpetuall priſon, and likewiſe in the hard vſing of his coſine Robert earle of Mortaigne, whome he not onelie deteined in priſon, but alſo cauſed his eies to be put out; which act was kept ſecret till the kings death reuealed it. And his fleſhlie luſt was manifeſt, by kéeping of ſundrie women.

His wiſdome.

But in his other affaires he was circumſpect, in defending his owne verie earneſt and diligent. Such wars as might be auoided, with honourable peace he euer ſought to appeaſe; but when ſuch iniuries were offered as he thought not méet to ſuffer, he was an impatient reuenger of the ſame, ouercomming all perils with the force of vertue and manlie courage, ſhewing himſelfe either a moſt louing fréend, or an extreame enimie: for he would ſubdue his foes to the vttermoſt, and aduance his fréends aboue meaſure.

His manlie courage.

His zeale to iuſtice.

With iuſtice he ruled the commons quietlie, and enterteined the nobles honorablie. Théeues, counterfeiters of monie, and other tranſgreſſors he cauſed to be ſought out with great diligence, and when they were found, to be puniſhed with great ſeueritie. Neither did he neglect reformations of certeine naughtie abuſes. And (as one author hath written) he ordeined that théeues ſhould ſuffer death by hanging. When he heard that ſuch péeces of monie as were cracked would not be receiued amongeſt the people, although the ſame were good and fine ſiluer, he cauſed all the coine in the realme to be either broken or ſlit. He was ſober of diet, vſing to eat rather for the quailing of hunger, than to pamper himſelfe with manie daintie ſorts of banketting diſhes. He neuer dranke but when thirſt moued him, he would ſléepe ſoundlie and ſnore oftentimes till he awaked therewith. He purſued his warres rather by policie than by the ſword, and ouercame his enimies ſo néere as he could without bloudſhed, which if it might not be, yet with as little ſlaughter as was poſſible. To conclude, he was not inferiour to any of the kings that reigned in thoſe daies, in wiſedome and policie, and ſo behaued himſelfe, that he was honoured of the Nobles, and beloued of the commons. He builded diuerſe abbeies both in England and Normandie, but Reading was the chéefe. He builded the manour of Woodſtocke, with the parke there, wherein (beſide the great ſtore of déere) he appointed diuerſe ſtrange beaſts to be kept and nouriſhed, which were brought and ſent vnto him from forren countries, farre diſtant, as lions, leopards, lynxes, and porcupines. His eſtimation was ſuch among outlandiſh princes, that few would willinglie offend him.

Murcherdach K. of Ireland.

Murcherdach king of Ireland & his ſucceſſors had him in ſuch reuerence, that they durſt doo nothing but what he commanded, nor write any thing but what might ſtand with his pleaſure, though at the firſt the ſame Morchad attempted ſomething againſt the Engliſhmen more than held with reaſon, but afterward (vpon reſtraint of the entercourſe of merchandize) he was glad to ſhew himſelfe more fréendlie.

The earle of Orkney.

Moreouer the earle of Orkney, although he was the king of Norwaies ſubiect, yet did he what he could to procure king Henries fréendſhip, ſending ſuch ſtrange beaſts and other things to him oftentimes as preſents, wherein he knew the king tooke great delight and pleaſure. He had in ſingular fauour aboue all other of his councell, Roger the biſhop of Saliſburie, a politike prelate, and one that knew how to order matters of great importance, vnto whome he committed the gouernement of the realme moſt commonlie whileſt he remained in Normandie.

The abuſe of wearing long haire.

As well in this kings daies, as in the time of his brother William Rufus, men forgetting their owne ſex and ſtate, transformed themſelues into the habit and forme of women, by ſuffering their haire to grow in length, the which they curled and trimmed verie curiouſlie, after the maner of damoſels and yong gentlewomen: inſomuch that they made ſuch account of their long buſhing perukes, that thoſe which would be taken for courtiers, contended with women who ſhould haue the longeſt treſſes, and ſuch as wanted, ſought to amend it with art, and by knitting wreathes about their heads of thoſe their long and ſide locks for a brauerie. Yet we read that king Henrie gaue commandement to all his people to cut their haire, about the 28. yeare of his reigne. Preachers indeed inueied againſt ſuch vnſeemlie maners in men, as a thing more agreeable and ſeemelie for the contrarie ſex.

Wil. Malm. reciteth a tale of a knight in thoſe daies that tooke no ſmall liking of himſelfe for his faire and long haire, who chanced to haue a verie terrible dreame. For it ſeemed to him in his ſleepe that one was about to ſtrangle him with his owne haire, which he wrapped about his throte and necke) the impreſſion whereof ſanke ſo deepelie into his mind, that when he awaked out of his ſleepe, he ſtreightwaies cauſed ſo much of his haire to be cut as might ſeeme ſuperfluous. A great number of other in the realme followed his commendable example, but the remorſe of conſcience herein that thus cauſed them to cut their haire, continued not long, for they fell to the like abuſe againe, ſo as within a twelue moneths ſpace they exceeded therein as farre beyond all the bounds of ſeemelie order as before.

¶ In this Henrie ended the line of the Normans as touching the heires male, and then came in the Frenchmen by the title of the heires generall, after that the Normans had reigned about 69. yeares: for ſo manie are accounted from the comming of William Conquerour, vnto the beginning of the reigne of king Stephan, who ſucceeded the ſaid Henrie.

Stephan earle of Bullongne.

Anno Reg. 1.

STephan earle of Bullongne, the ſonne of Stephan erle of Blois, by his wife Adela, daughter to William Conquerour, came ouer with all ſpeed after the death of his vncle, and tooke vpon him the gouernement of the realme of England, partlie through confidence which he had in the puiſſance and ſtrength of his brother Theobald earle of Blois, and partlie by the aid of his brother Henrie biſhop of Wincheſter and abbat of Glaſtenburie, although that he with other of the Nobles had ſworne afore to be true vnto the empreſſe and hir iſſue as lawfull heires of king Henrie latelie deceaſſed.

A tempeſt.
Matth. Weſt.

The ſame day that he arriued in England, there chanced a mightie great tempeſt of thunder horrible to heare, and lightning dreadfull to behold. Now bicauſe this happened in the winter time, it ſeemed againſt nature, and therefore it was the more noted as a foreſhewing of ſome trouble and calamitie to come.

This Stephan began his reigne ouer the realme of England the ſecond day of December, in the yere of our Lord 1135. in the eleuenth yeare of the emperour Lothair, the ſixt of pope Innocentius the ſecond, and about the xxvij. of Lewes the ſeuenth, ſurnamed Craſſus king of France, Dauid the firſt of that name then reigning in Scotland, & entring into the twelfe of his regiment. He was crowned at Weſtminſter vpon S. Stephans day, by William archbiſhop of Canturburie, the moſt part of the Nobles of the realme being preſent, and ſwearing fealtie vnto him, as to their true and lawfull ſoueraigne.

Howbeit, there were diuerſe of the wiſer ſort of all eſtates, which regarding their former oth, could haue beene contented that the empreſſe ſhould haue gouerned till hir ſonne had come to lawfull age; notwithſtanding they held their peace as yet, and conſented vnto Stephan. But this breach of their othes was worthilie puniſhed afterward, inſomuch that as well the biſhops as the other Nobles either died an euill death, or were afflicted with diuerſe kinds of calamities and miſchances, and that euen here in this life, of which ſome of them as occaſion ſerueth ſhall be remembred hereafter. Yet there were of them (and namelie the biſhop of Saliſburie) which proteſted that they were free from their oth of allegiance made to the ſaid empreſſe, bicauſe that without the conſent of the lords of the land ſhe was maried out of the realme, whereas they tooke their oth to receiue hir for queene, vpon that condition, that without their aſſent ſhe ſhould not marrie with any perſon out of the realme.

Periurie puniſhed.

Wil. Malm.
The biſhop of Saliſburies proteſtation.

Moreouer (as ſome writers thinke) the biſhops tooke it, that they ſhould doo God good ſeruice in prouiding for the wealth of the realme, and the aduancement of the church by their periurie. For whereas the late deceaſſed king vſed himſelfe not altogither for their purpoſe, they thought that if they might ſet vp and creat a king cheeflie by their eſpeciall meanes and authoritie, he would follow their counſell better, and reforme ſuch things as they iudged to be amiſſe. But a great cauſe that mooued manie of the lords vnto the violating thus of their oth, was (as ſome authors rehearſe) for that Hugh Bigot, ſometime ſteward to king Henrie the firſt, immediatlie after the deceaſe of king Henrie, came into England, and as well before the archbiſhop of Canturburie, as diuers other lords of the land, tooke a voluntarie oth (although moſt men thinke that he was hired ſo to doo bicauſe of great promotion) declaring vpon the ſame that he was preſent a little before king Henries death, when the ſame king adopted and choſe his nephue Stephan to be his heire and ſucceſſour, bicauſe his daughter the empreſſe had greeuouſlie diſpleaſed him. But vnto this mans oth the archbiſhop and the other

But to our purpoſe. King Stephan (by what title ſoeuer he obteined the crowne) immediatlie after his coronation, went firſt to Reading to the buriall of the bodie of his vncle Henrie, the ſame being now brought ouer from Normandie, from whence after the buriall he repaired to Oxenford, and there calling a councell of the lords & other eſtates of his realme; amongſt other things he promiſed before the whole aſſemblie (to win the harts of the people) that he would put downe and quite aboliſh that tribute which oftentimes was accuſtomed to be gathered after the rate of their acres of hides of land, commonlie called Danegilt, which was two ſhillings of euerie hide of land. Alſo, that he would ſo prouide, that no biſhops ſees nor other benefices ſhould remaine void, but immediatlie after vpon their firſt vacation, they ſhould be againe beſtowed vpon ſome conuenient perſon meet to ſupplie the roome. Further he promiſed not to ſeize vpon any mans woods as forfeit, though any priuate man had hunted and killed his deere in the ſame woods, as the maner of his predeceſſour was. ¶ For a kind of forfeiture was deuiſed by king Henrie, that thoſe ſhould loſe their right inheritance in their woods, that chanced to kill any of the kings deere within the ſame.

Licence to build caſtels.

Moreouer, he granted licence to all men, to build either caſtell, tower, or other hold for defenſe of themſelues vpon their owne grounds. All this did he chieflie in hope that the ſame might be a ſafegard for him in time to come, if the empreſſe ſhould inuade the land, as he doubted ſhe ſhortlie would. Moreouer he aduanced manie yoong & luſtie gentlemen to great liuings. For ſuch as were of any noble familie, and thereto through a certeine ſtoutneſſe of ſtomach ſought preferment, eaſilie obteined of him the poſſeſſion of caſtels and great lordſhips, diuerſe of whom he honored with titles of dignitie, creating ſome of them earles and ſome lords. Now, ſuch was their importunate ſute in demanding, that when he had little more to beſtow amongſt them, hauing alreadie giuen ſundrie portions that belonged to the crowne, they ceaſſed not to be in hand with him for more, and being denied with reaſonable excuſes on his behalfe, they thought themſelues ill dealt withall, and ſo turning from him, fortified their caſtels and holds, making open warre againſt him: as hereafter ſhall appeare.

The reſort of ſtrangers to ſerue king Stephan.

There came ouer vnto him alſo a great number of Flemings and Britons to ſerue him as ſouldiers, whom he reteined, to be the ſtronger and better able to defend himſelfe againſt the malice of the empreſſe, by whom he looked to be moleſted he wiſt not how ſoone. Wherefore he ſhewed himſelfe verie liberall, courteous, and gentle towards all maner of perſons at the firſt, and (to ſaie truth) more liberall, familiar, and free harted than ſtood with the maieſtie of a king: which was afterward a cauſe that he grew into contempt. ¶ But to ſuch meanes are princes driuen, that atteine to their eſtates more through fauour and ſupport of others, than by any good right or title which they may pretend of themſelues. Thus the gouernement of this prince at the beginning was nothing bitter or heauie to his ſubiects, but full of gentleneſſe, lenitie, courteſie, and mildnes.

Polydor.

Howbeit whileſt theſe things were a dooing, certeine of the Engliſh Nobilitie, abhorring both the king and the preſent ſtate of his gouernment, went priuilie out of the realme into Scotland to king Dauid, declaring vnto him what a deteſtable act was committed by the lords of England, in that (contrarie to their oth made vnto the empreſſe Maud, and hir iſſue) they had now crowned Stephan. Wherefore they beſought the ſaid king to take in hand to reuenge ſuch a vile iniurie practiſed againſt hir, and to reſtore the kingdome vnto the ſaid empreſſe, which if he did, it ſhould be a thing moſt acceptable both to God and man.

King Dauid hauing heard and well weied the effect of their requeſt, forthwith was ſo moued at their words, that in all poſſible haſt he aſſembled an armie, and entring into England, firſt tooke the citie and caſtell of Carleil: afterward comming into Northumberland, he tooke Newcaſtell, and manie other places vpon the borders there. Whereof king Stephan being aduertiſed, ſtreightwaies aſſembled a power, and forthwith haſted into Cumberland, meaning to recouer that againe by force of armes, which the enimie had ſtolen from him by craft and ſubtiltie. At his approch neere to Carleil, he pitched downe his field in the euening, thinking there to ſtaie till the morning, that he might vnderſtand of what power the enimie was, whome he knew to be at hand.

K. Stephan encamped neere to his enimie the K. of Scots.

King Dauid alſo was of a fierce courage, and redie inough to haue giuen him battell, but yet when he beheld the Engliſh ſtandards in the field, and diligentlie viewed their order and behauiour, he was at the laſt contented to giue eare to ſuch as intreated for peace on both ſides. Wherevpon comming to king Stephan, he entred a freendlie peace with him, wherein he made a ſurrender of Newcaſtell, with condition that he ſhould reteine Cumberland by the free grant of king Stephan, who hoped thereby to find king Dauid the more faithfull vnto him in time of need: but yet he was deceiued, as afterwards manifeſtlie appeered. For when king Stephan required of him an oth of allegiance, he anſwered that he was once ſworne alreadie vnto Maud the empreſſe. Howbeit to gratifie him, he commanded his ſon Henrie to receiue that oth, for the which the king gaue him the earledome of Huntington to hold of him for euer.

Hec. Boetius.

¶ The Scottiſh chronicles ſet out the matter in other order, but yet all agree that Henrie ſware fealtie to king Stephan, as in the ſaid hiſtorie of Scotland you may ſee more at large. Now after that king Stephan had concluded a peace with king Dauid, he returned to London, and there kept his Eaſter with great ioy and triumphes: who whileſt he was yet in the middeſt of all his paſtime, about Rogation weeke, he chanced to fall ſicke of a litargie, by reaſon whereof a rumor was ſpred ouer all the realme that he was dead. Which though it was but a vaine tale, and of no importance at the firſt, yet was it after the occaſion of much euill. For vpon that report great ſedition was raiſed by the kings enimies amongſt the people, the minds of his freends were alienated from him, & manie of the Normans (which were well practiſed in periuries & treaſons) thought they might boldlie attempt all miſcheefes that came to hand, and herevpon ſome of them vndertooke to defend one place, and ſome another. Hugh Bigot erle of Norfolke a valiant chieftein entred into Norwich, Baldwin Reduers tooke Exceſter, & Robert Muiſquere got certeine caſtels alſo into his hands.

yet could he not recouer the places (without much adoo) that they had gotten, as Exceſter, and others: which when he had obteined, he contented himſelfe for a time, and followed not the victorie any further in purſuing of his enimies. Wherevpon they became more, bold afterward than before; in ſomuch that ſoone after they practiſed diuerſe things againſt him, whereof (God willing) ſome in places conuenient ſhall appeare: howbeit they permitted him to remaine in quiet for a time. But whileſt he ſtudied to take order in things at home (perceiuing how no ſmall number of his ſubiects did dailie ſhew themſelues to beare him no hartie good will) he began by little and little to take awaie thoſe liberties from the people, which in the beginning of his reigne he had granted vnto them, and to denie thoſe promiſes which he had made, according to the ſaieng, That which I haue giuen, I would I had not giuen, and that which remaineth I will kéepe ſtill. This ſudden alteration and new kind of rough dealing purchaſed him great enuie amongſt all men in the end. About the ſame time great commotions were raiſed in Normandie by meanes of the lord Geffrey earle of Aniou, husband to Maud the empreſſe, ſetting the whole countrie in trouble: but yer any newes thereof came into England, king Stephan went againſt Baldwin Reduers, who being latelie (though not without great and long ſiege expelled out of Exceſter) got him into the Ile of Wight, and there began to deuiſe a new conſpiracie. King Dauid hearing thoſe newes, and being alreadie in armour in the field, entred into Northumberland, and licenſed his men of warre to ſpoile and rob the countrie thereabout at their pleaſure. Herevpon followed ſuch crueltie, that their rage ſtretched vnto old and yoong, vnto préeſt and clearke, yea women with child eſcaped not their hands, they hanged, headed, and ſlue all that came in their waie: houſes were burnt, cattell driuen awaie, and all put to fire and ſword that ſerued to any vſe for reléefe, either of man or beaſt.

Such earneſt trauell was made by this earle of Gloceſter, that manie of his fréends which fauoured his cauſe, now that king Stephan was occupied in the north parts, ioined with him in conſpiracie againſt their ſoueraigne. Firſt the ſaid earle himſelfe tooke Briſtowe: and after this diuerſe other townes and caſtels there in that countrie were taken by him and others, with full purpoſe to kéepe the ſame to the behoofe of the empreſſe and hir ſonne. Amongſt other William Talbot tooke vpon him to defend Hereford in Wales: William Louell held the caſtell of Cary: Paganell or Painell kept the caſtell of Ludlow: William de Moun the caſtell of Duneſtor: Robert de Nicholl, the caſtle of Warram: Euſtace Fitz-John, the caſtle of Walton; and William Fitz-Alain, the caſtle of Shreweſburie.

When word hereof came to king Stephan, he was maruellouſlie vexed: for being determined to haue purſued the Scots euen to the vttermoſt limits of their countrie, he was now driuen to change his mind, and thought it good at the firſt to ſtop the proceedings of his enimies at home, leaſt in giuing them ſpace to increaſe their force, they might in proceſſe of time growe ſo ſtrong, that it would be an hard matter to reſiſt them at the laſt. Herevpon therfore he returned ſouthward, and comming vpon his enimies, recouered out of their hands diuers of thoſe places which they held, as Hereford, and the caſtle of Shreweſourie. About the ſame time one Walkeline yeelded the caſtle of Douer vnto the queene, who had beſieged him within the ſame.

Now king Stephan knowing that the Scots were not like long to continue in quiet, returned northwards againe; and comming to Thurſtan the archbiſhop of Yorke, he committed the keeping of the countrie vnto his charge, commanding him to be in a redineſſe to defend the borders vpon any ſudden inuaſion. Which thing the couragious archbiſhop willinglie vndertooke. By this meanes king Stephan being eaſed of a great part of his care, fell in hand to beſiege the reſidue of thoſe places which the rebels kept: but they fearing to abide the danger of an aſſault, fled away, ſome into one part, and ſome into an other; whom the kings power of horſſemen ſtill purſuing and ouertaking by the way, ſlue, and tooke no ſmall number of them priſoners in the chaſe. Thus was the victorie in maner wholie atchiued, and all thoſe places recouered, which the enimies had fortified.

Thurſtan archbiſhop of Yorke made lieutenant of ẏ north parts.

In like maner when king Dauid heard that the king was thus vexed with ciuill warre at home, he entred England againe in moſt forceable wiſe: and ſending his horſſemen abroad into the countrie, commanded them to waſte and ſpoile the ſame after their accuſtomed maner. But in the meane time he purpoſed with himſelfe to beſiege Yorke: which citie if he might haue wonne, he determined to haue made it the frontier hold againſt king Stephan, and the reſt that tooke part with him. Herevpon calling in his horſſemen from ſtraieng further abroad, he marched thitherwards, and comming neere to the citie, pitched downe his tents.

In this meane while the archbiſhop Thurſtan, to whom the charge of defending the countrie cheefelie in the kings abſence apperteined, called togither the Nobles and gentlemen of the ſhire and parties adioining, whom with ſo pithie and effectuall words he exhorted to reſiſt the attempts of the Scots (whoſe cruell doings could keepe no meaſure) that incontinentlie all the power of the northparts was raiſed, and (vnder the leading of William earle of Albemarle, Walter Eſpeke, William Peuerell of Notingham, and two of the Lacies, Walter and Gilbert) offered euen with perill of life and limme to trie the matter againſt the Scots in a pight field, and either to driue them out of the countrie, or elſe to looſe their liues in the quarell of their prince.

It chanced at this time, that archbiſhop Thurſtan was ſicke, and therefore could not come into the field himſelfe, but yet he ſent Rafe biſhop of Durham to ſupplie his roome, who though he ſaw and perceiued that euerie man was readie enough to encounter with their enimies; yet he thought good to vſe ſome exhortation vnto them, the better to encourage them, in maner as here enſueth.

Moſt noble Engliſhmen, and ye right valiant Normans, of whoſe courage the Frenchman is afraid, by you England is kept vnder, by you Apulia dooth floriſh, and vnto you Ieruſalem and Antioch haue yeelded their ſubiection. We haue at this preſent the rebellious nation of Scotland (which of right ought to be ſubiect to the crowne of England) come into the field againſt vs, thinking for euermore to rid themſelues of their ſubmiſſion, and to bring both vs and our countrie into their bondage and thraldome. Now albeit I ſee in you courage ſufficient, to beat them backe from any further attempt; yet leaſt when you ſhall come to the triall, by any manner of chance, you ſhould looſe any peece thereof, I lamenting the ſtate of my countrie (whoſe greeuances I wiſh you ſhould redreſſe) doo meane to vſe a few words vnto you, not for that I would exhort you to doo any man wrong, but rather to beat them backe which offer to doo you iniurie. Conſider therefore that you ſhall here fight with that enimie, whom you haue oftentimes vanquiſhed, and oftentimes offending in periurie, haue oftentimes moſt worthilie puniſhed: whome alſo (to be breefe) raging after the maner of cruell robbers, wickedlie ſpoiling churches, and taking away our goods, you did latelie conſtreine to lurke in deſert places and corners out of ſight. Againſt this enimie (I ſay) therefore worthie of reuengement for his ſo manifold outrages, ſhew your ſelues valiant, and with manlie ſtomaches driue him out of our confines. For as far as I can perceiue, the victorie is yours, God ſurelie will aid you, who cannot longer abide the ſinnes of this people. Therefore he that loſeth his life in ſo iuſt a quarell (according to the ſaieng of our ſauiour) ſhall find it. Let not their raſh and preſumptuous boldneſſe make you afraid, ſith ſo manie tokens of your approoued valiancie cannot cauſe them to ſtand in doubt of you. You are clad in armour, and ſo appointed with helmet, curaſe, greiues, and target, that the enimie knoweth not where to ſtrike and hurt you. Then ſith you ſhall haue to doo with naked men, and ſuch as vſe not to weare any armour at all, but more meet for brablers and ale-houſe quarrellers than men of war vſed to the field: what ſhould you ſtand in doubt of? Their huge number is not able to ſtand againſt your ſkilfull order and practiſed knowledge in all warlike feats and martiall diſcipline. A rude multitude is but a let, rather than a furtherance to atchiue the victorie. A ſmall number of your worthie elders haue oftentimes vanquiſhed great multitudes of enimies. As the biſhop was thus ſpeaking to the Engliſh armie, and before he grew to an end of his exhortation, the Scots approched with their battels, & firſt certeine of their bands of horſſemen were ſent afore, to take the higher ground: which when the Engliſhmen perceiued, they ſtaied not till the enimies ſhould begin the battell, but ſtraightwaies cauſed their trumpets to ſound, and ſo gaue the onſet.

The Engliſhmen ſet vpon the Scots.

The Scots were as readie to encounter with them, ſo that the battell began to be verie hot, and euen at the firſt out flew the arrowes, and then the footmen ioined, who fought moſt fiercelie on both ſides. Herewith a wing of them of Lodian, which were in the Scotiſh vauntgard, brake in vpon the vauntgard of the Engliſh: but yet cloſing togither againe, they kept out the enimies, and caſting about with a wing, compaſſed the Scotiſh horſſemen round about, and panching their horſſes, they ſlue a great number, and conſtreined the reſidue to retire. Which thing when their felowes in the other wing ſaw, their hearts began to faint, and by and by betooke them to their heeles.

yet could he not recouer the places (without much adoo) that they had gotten, as Exceſter, and others: which when he had obteined, he contented himſelfe for a time, and allowed not the victorie any further in purſuing of his enimies. Wherevpon they became more bold afterward than before; in ſomuch that ſoone after they practiſed diuerſe things againſt him, whereof (God willing) ſome in places conuenient ſhall appeare: howbeit they permitted him to remaine in quiet for a time. But whileſt he ſtudied to take order in things at home (perceiuing how no ſmall number of his ſubiects did dailie ſhew themſelues to beare him no hartie good will) he began by little and little to take awaie thoſe liberties from the people, which in the beginning of his reigne he had granted vnto them, and to denie thoſe promiſes which he had made, according to the ſaieng, That which I haue giuen, I would I had not giuen, and that which remaineth I will keepe ſtill. This ſudden alteration and new kind of rough dealing purchaſed him great enuie amongſt all men in the end. About the ſame time great commotions were raiſed in Normandie by meanes of the lord Geffrey earle of Aniou, husband to Maud the empreſſe, ſetting the whole countrie in trouble: but yer any newes thereof came into England, king Stephan went againſt Baldwin Reduers, who being latelie (though not without great and long ſiege expelled out of Exceſter) got him into the Ile of Wight, and there began to deuiſe a new conſpiracie. Howbeit the king comming ſuddenlie into the Ile, tooke it at the firſt aſſault, and exiled Baldwin out of the realme.

Hauing thus with good ſucceſſe finiſhed this enterpriſe, and being now aduertiſed of the buſineſſe in Normandie, he ſailed thither with a great armie: and being come within two daies iournie of his enimie the earle of Aniou, he ſent foorth his whole power of horſſemen, diuided into three parts, which were not gone paſt a daies iournie forward, but they encountred the earle, finding him with no great force about him. Wherevpon giuing the charge vpon him, they put him to flight, and ſlue manie of his people. Now whereas his elder brother Theobald earle of Blois at that time in Normandie, found himſelfe greeued, that Stephan the yoonger brother had vſurped the lands that belonged to their vncle king Henrie, rather than himſelfe, Stephan to ſtop this iuſt complaint of his brother, and to allaie his mood, agreed with him, couenanting to paie him yearelie two thouſand marks of ſuch currant monie as was then in vſe. Furthermore, wheras Geffrey the earle of Aniou demanded in right of his wife the empreſſe the whole kingdome of England, to be at an end with him, king Stephan was contented to ſatiſfie him with a yearelie penſion of fiue thouſand marks, which compoſition he willinglie receiued.

Thus when he had prouided for the ſuertie of Normandie, he returned againe into England, where he was no ſooner arriued, but aduertiſement was giuen him of a warre newlie begon with the Scots, whoſe king vnder a colour of obſeruing the oth to the empreſſe, made dailie inſurrections and inuaſions into England, to the great diſturbance of king Stephan and the annoiance of his people. Wherwith being ſomewhat mooued, he went ſtreightwaies toward the north parts, and determined firſt to beſiege Bedford by the waie, which apperteined to the earledome of Huntington, by gift made vnto Henrie the ſonne of king Dauid, and therevpon at that preſent kept with a gariſon of Scotiſh men.

King Dauid hearing thoſe newes, and being alreadie in armour in the field, entred into Northumberland, and licenſed his men of warre to ſpoile and rob the countrie thereabout at their pleaſure. Herevpon followed ſuch crueltie, that their rage ſtretched vnto old and yoong, vnto preeſt and clearke, yea women with child eſcaped not their hands, they hanged, headed, and ſlue all that came in their waie: houſes were burnt, cattell driuen awaie, and all put to fire and ſword that ſerued to any vſe for releefe, either of man or beaſt.

¶ Here we ſee what a band of calamities doo accompanie and waite vpon warre, wherein alſo we haue to conſider what a traine of felicities doo attend vpon peace, by an equall comparing of which twaine togither, we may eaſilie perceiue in how heauenlie an eſtate thoſe people be that liue vnder the ſcepter of tranquillitie, and contrariwiſe what a helliſh courſe of life they lead that haue ſworne their ſeruice to the ſword. We may conſider alſo the inordinat outrages of princes, & their frantike fierſenes, who eſteeme not the loſſe of their ſubiects liues, the effuſion of innocent bloud, the population of countries, the ruinating of ample regions, &c: ſo their will may be ſatiſfied, there deſire ſerued. But to our ſtorie. King Stephan hearing of this pitifull ſpoile, haſted forward with great iournies to the reſcue of the countrie. The Scots put in feare of ſpeedie comming to encounter them, drew backe into Scotland: but he purſued them, and entring into their countrie, burned and deſtroied the ſouth parts of that realme in moſt miſerable maner. Whileſt king Stephan was thus about to beat backe the forren enimies, and reuenge himſelfe on them, he was aſſailed by other at home, & not without the iuſt vengeance of almightie God, who meant to puniſh him for his periurie committed in taking vpon him the crowne, contrarie to his oth made vnto the empreſſe and hir children. For Robert earle of Gloceſter, baſe brother vnto the empreſſe, and of hir priuie councell, ſought by all meanes how to bring king Stephan into hatred, both of the Nobles and commons, that by their helpe he might be expelled the realme, and the gouernment reſtored to the empreſſe and hir ſonne.

K. Stephan inuadeth Scotland.

A peace concluded betwéene the two kings of England and Scotland.

The king hauing now accompliſhed his purpoſe, taken the caſtell of Leides, and brought the ſtate of the realme to a méetlie good ſtaie, thought it expedient after the late ouerthrow giuen to the Scots, to purſue the victorie, and vtterlie to ſubdue them with all expedition. He brought his armie therefore into Scotland, firſt waſting and ſpoiling the countrie, and afterward preparing to fight with ſuch Scots as came forth to defend their goods and houſes. K. Dauid perceiuing himſelfe to be too weake, made ſute to the king for peace, which with much difficultie he obteined at length, by deliuering his ſonne Henrie vnto king Stephan in pledge for the ſure performance of couenants concluded vpon betwixt them. Herevpon king Stephan hauing thus ended his buſineſſe in Scotland, returned into England: and after directing his iornie towards Wales, he came to Ludlow: which towne (being held by his aduerſaries) he wan yer long out of their hands.

After this he went to Oxenford, where whileſt he remained, a great brute was ſpred abroad, that the empreſſe was comming with hir brother the earle of Gloceſter: which cauſed him to put the leſſe truſt in his people from thenceforth, in ſo much that he began to repent himſelfe (although too late) for that he had granted licence to ſo manie of his ſubiects to build caſtels within their owne grounds. For he had them all in ſuſpicion: and amongſt other, he vehementlie ſuſpected Roger biſhop of Saliſburie (who had doone verie much for him) and Alexander biſhop of Lincolne nephue to the ſaid biſhop of Saliſburie, or (as ſome thought) more néere to him in kindred than his nephue, I meane, his ſonne. For the ſaid Roger had builded diuerſe caſtels, as at Shierborne, at the Vies, and at Malmeſburie. Earle Robert commeth to Gloceſter.

Some write that the empreſſe brought with hir a great armie, to the intent that ioining with Ranulph earle of Cheſter (who tooke part with Robert erle of Gloceſter, bicauſe the ſame Rob. had maried his daughter) ſhe might fight with king Stephan, and trie the battell with him. Other declare that ſhe came to England now at the firſt, but with a ſmall power (as ſeuen ſcore horſſemen or men of armes as we may call them) in hope of Gods aſſurance (who ſeldome faileth thoſe that fight in a rightfull cauſe) and againe vpon truſt of aid of freends, who for the benefits receiued at hir fathers hands, would be readie to go againſt king Stephan. Wherevpon hir brother earle Robert leauing his ſiſter in the caſtle of Arundell, rode with all ſpeed vnto Gloceſter thorough his enimies countrie, not taking with him paſt 12. men of armes, and as manie archers on horſſebacke, that vpon his comming thither he might leuie an armie with ſo much ſpeed as was poſſible. Now when he came to Gloceſter, though the citie was kept with a gariſon of ſoldiours placed there by king Stephan, yet the towneſmen, after they heard that their earle was approched to the gates, they droue out the gariſon, & receiued him into the towne, where he remained a time, partlie to aſſemble an armie, and partlie to practiſe with other townes and caſtels thereabouts, to reuolt vnto his ſiſter. Amongſt all other, the earles ſonne Brian, and Miles of Gloceſter were right ioifull of the news of the empreſſes arriuall, and gladlie prepared themſelues to fight in defenſe of hir cauſe.

The empreſſe goeth to Briſtow.

In the meane time king Stephan, hauing knowledge of the landing of the empreſſe, and other his enimies, came ſtrait to Arundell, where he beſieged hir in the caſtle, and ſpent his labour certeine daies in vaine about the winning of it. Howbeit at that preſent he did not preuaile, for there were certeine with him, who in fauour of the empreſſe bare him in hand, that it was not poſſible to win that fortreſſe, and therefore aduiſed him to raiſe his ſiege, and ſuffer the empreſſe to be at libertie to go to ſome other place, where he might with more eaſe and leſſe damage get hir into his hands. The king not perceiuing the drift of thoſe ſecret practiſers, followed their counſell. Wherevpon the empreſſe being now at libertie, went from place to place to trie and ſolicit hir freends: and as a riuer increaſeth in the paſſage, ſo the further the ladie went, the more hir power increaſed. About the midſt of the next night after the ſiege was raiſed, ſhe departed out of the caſtle, and with great iournies ſped hir towards Briſtow, which was alreadie reuolted to hir ſide.

Theſe things being thus bruted abroad, the Peeres of the realme reſorted to hir, as they that well remembred how in time paſt by oth of allegiance they were ſuerlie bound to hir and hir iſſue. The king in the meane time beſieged the caſtle of Wallingford, but after he vnderſtood that the empreſſe was gotten to Briſtow, repenting himſelfe for his light credit giuen to euill counſell, he left off the ſiege of Wallingford, and drew towards Briſtow, that he might (if it were poſſible) incloſe his aduerſaries within that walled citie. But the empreſſe, being aduertiſed of his determination (by ſuch of hir freends as were reſident about him) firſt went to Gloceſter, and after to Lincolne, where ſhe prouided vittailes and all other things neceſſarie for hir armie and defenſe: purpoſing to remaine in that citie, till the matter were either tried by chance of warre betwixt hir and king Stephan, or that by the peoples helpe reuolting to hir ſide, he might be driuen out of the realme, and ſhe reſtored to the whole gouernement. The king followed hir verie earneſtlie, and comming vnto Lincolne beſieged it, aſſaieng on euerie ſide which waie he might beſt find meanes to win it, & enter into the ſame. At length the empreſſe found ſhift to eſcape from thence, and within a little while the king got poſſeſſion of the citie. But ſhortlie after, Robert earle of Gloceſter, and Ranulph earle of Cheſter, Hugh Bigot, and Robert of Morley aſſembling their power, aſwell of Welſhmen as others, to come to the ſuccour of thoſe that were thus beſieged, came to Lincolne, & pitching downe their tents neere to the enimies, they reſted the firſt night without making any great attempt.

The ordering of the kings armie readie to giue battell.

The earles of Norfolke, Hampton, Mellent, & Waren.

In the morning being the ſecond daie of Februarie, ſo ſoone as it was daie, they ſet their men in order of battell, and brought them foorth in ſight of the king and his hoſt: who on the other ſide, not meaning to refuſe the conflict, ordered his men readie to encounter them, whome he diuided into 3. ſeuerall battels. The chiefeſt part of his armed men he appointed to remaine on foot, amongſt whom he placed himſelfe, with certeine noble men, as earle Baldwin, and others. The reſidue being horſſemen, he diſpoſed into two ſeuerall wings, in one of which were Alaine duke of Britaine, Hugh Bigot earle of Norfolke, Simon earle of Hampton, and two other earles, Mellent and Waren: howbeit they were not furniſhed with ſuch number of men as had béene requiſit; for as it fell out, they brought no great retinues with them. The other wing was gouerned by the earle of Albemarle, and William de Ypres.

The ordering of the battels on the kings aduerſaries part.

Now on the aduerſaries ſide, the earle of Cheſter led the fore ward, and thoſe whome king Stephan had diſherited, were placed in the middle ward. In the rere ward the earle of Gloceſter with his companie had the rule. And beſides thoſe thrée battels, the Welſhmen were ſet as a wing at one of the ſides.

The oration of the earle of Cheſter. Ran. Higd.

Here the earle of Cheſter (to vtter the good will which he had to fight) appointed in faire armour as he was, ſpake theſe words in effect as followeth, directing the ſame to the earle of Gloceſter, and other the capteines, ſaieng: I giue you hartie thanks, moſt inuincible chiefteine, and you my fellow ſoldiers, which declare your hartie good wils towards me, euen to the ieoparding of your liues at this my requeſt and inſtance. Sith then I am the occaſion of your perill, it is conuenient that I make the firſt entrance, and giue the onſet of the battell vpon that moſt diſloiall king, who granting a truce, hath broken the peace; and ſwearing to be a ſubiect, is now proued a moſt wicked vſurper: I therefore truſting both vpon reuenge of the vniuſt dealings of this king, and alſo vpon mine owne force and courage, ſhall ſtraitwaies breake in ſunder the arraie of his armie, and make waie through the middeſt of the enimies with ſword in hand. It ſhall be your parts then to follow me, who will lead you the waie: for euen now my mind giueth me, that I ſhall paſſe thorough the battels, tread the capteines vnder foot, and run the king through with this my ſharpe ſword.

The earle of Gloceſters anſwer to the earle of Cheſters oration.

When he had thus ended, the earle of Gloceſter anſwered in this wiſe: It is not againſt reaſon that you ſhould require the honor of the firſt onſet, both for the nobilitie of your houſe, and alſo in reſpect of the proweſſe wherein you excell: but yet if you ſtand vpon nobilitie, for my part, being the ſonne and nephue of a king, ought not I to be preferred? If vpon valiancie, here are manie verie worthie men, afore whom there is not one aliue that may chalenge any prerogatiue. But another reaſon moueth me moſt chieflie to be the formoſt. The king, who contrarie to his oth made to my ſiſter, hath cruellie vſurped the kingdome, and ſetting all in trouble, hath béene the cauſe of manie thouſand mens deaths, and diſtributed lands and liuings to ſuch as haue no right to the ſame, which he hath violentlie taken from the rightfull owners, who are quite diſherited. This king (I ſaie) is firſt to be aſſailed with the aſſiſtance of the righteous iudge, who prepareth puniſhment for wicked dooers. For almightie God, who iudgeth his people with equitie, will looke downe from his heauenlie habitation, and will not leaue vs comfortleſſe in this ſo great a neceſſitie. One thing there is, moſt valiant capteines, and all you right hardie ſouldiers, which I would haue you to conſider, that through the fennes, which with much adoo you haue paſſed, there is no waie to eſcape by flight. Here muſt we either vanquiſh the enimies, or elſe die in the field: for no hope of ſafegard remaineth in fléeing awaie. This onelie reſteth (I ſaie) that you make waie for you to enter the citie with force of your weapons. If I be not deceiued in that which my mind giueth me to coniecture, the lacke of meanes to eſcape, otherwiſe than by ſhewing your ſelues valiant men, by Gods helpe will bring vs the victorie. For he muſt néeds plaie the man, who hath not other ſuccor to auoid the danger of deſtruction. The citizens of Lincolne, who ſhall fight ſo néere their houſes as you ſhall ſée, will not ſtaie long to get them thither for their refuge. And herewith conſider and weie (I beſéech you) againſt whom you ſhall match in this battell. There is Alane duke of Britaine, who commeth armed againſt you, yea rather againſt God, a wicked perſon, and ſpotted with all kind of filthineſſe; who in malice hath no péere, as one that neuer wanted deſire to doo miſchéefe: and who to be comparable in crueltie, would iudge it a great reproch. There commeth alſo the earle of Mellent, a man full of all guile and deceit, in whoſe hart iniquitie is rooted, and nothing ſounding in his mouth but vnthankfulneſſe; beſides this, he is ſlothfull in déeds, preſumptuous in words, not haſtie to fight, but ſwift to run awaie. Then commeth earle Hugh, who hath not thought it ſufficient to breake his oth to my ſiſter the empreſſe, but he muſt commit periurie the ſecond time, in auouching (vpon a new oth) that king Henrie granted the kingdome to Stephan, and diſabled his daughter. After him marcheth the earle of Albemarle, a man of ſingular conſtancie in euill, verie readie to attempt and loth to giue ouer a miſchéefe: whoſe wife, through irkeſomnes of his filthie behauiour is gone from him; & he that kéepeth hir, cõmeth with him alſo againſt vs, an open adulterer, & one well eſtéemed of Bacchus, but nothing acquainted with Mars. Then ſetteth foorth Simon earle of Hampton, whoſe déeds conſiſt in words, & whoſe gifts reſt in promiſes. For when he hath ſaid, he hath doone; & when he hath promiſed, ye get no more. Finallie there come togither a knot of Péeres & Noble men, like to their king and maiſter, accuſtomed to robberies, enriched with rapines, embrued with manſlaughters, & defamed with periurie. You therefore (moſt valiant capteins & hardie ſouldiers) whom king Henrie hath aduanced, and this man hath brought vnder foot; whom he made wealthie, and this man hath impoueriſhed; vpon truſt of your worthy valiancie, yea rather vpon truſt of Gods iuſtice ſéeke your reuenge thus offered by God vpon theſe wicked wretches, & with manlie ſtomachs vow to go forward, & forſwere ſtepping back. When the earle had made an end, all the armie (lifting vp their hands to God) abiured all intention to flée, and ſo made themſelues readie to ſet forward.

King Stephan hauing no pleaſant voice of himſelfe, appointed earle Baldwin to giue an exhortation to his armie, wherevpon getting himſelfe to an high place where he might be ſéene & heard of them, he thus began. All ſuch as ſhall giue battell, ought to foreſée thrée things: firſt, that their cauſe be righteous: ſecondlie, the number of their men to be equall at the leaſt: and thirdlie, the goodneſſe and ſufficiencie of them. The righteouſnes of their cauſe ought to be regarded, leaſt men runne in danger of the ſoule; the number of men is to be reſpected, leaſt they ſhould be oppreſſed with multitude of enimies; and the goodneſſe of the ſoldiers is to be conſidered, leaſt truſting in the multitude, they ſhould preſume vpon the aid of féeble perſons, & ſuch as are of ſmall valure. In all theſe points we ſée our ſelues ſufficientlie furniſhed. The iuſtice of our cauſe is this: that obſeruing the thing which we vowed to our king before God, we ſtand to the ſame againſt thoſe that haue falſified their faith, euen to the perill of death. Our number is not much leſſe in horſſemen, and in footmen we excéed them. As for the goodneſſe or ſufficiencie of our men, who is able to expreſſe the noble proweſſe of ſo manie earles, of ſo manie lords and ſoldiers, trained vp euer in warres? The paſſing valiancie of our king may ſtand in place of innumerable ſouldiers. Sith then he being the lords annointed, is here amongſt you, vnto whom ye haue vowed allegiance, performe your vow. For the more earneſtly and faithfully ye ſerue your prince in this battell, which you are readie to fight againſt periured perſons, the more ſhall your reward be at the hands of God and him. Therefore be of good comfort, & haue in remembrance againſt whom you doo darraine the battell. The force of erle Robert is well knowne, his maner is to threaten much, & to worke little, furious in words, eloquent of ſpeach, but cold or rather dead harted in déeds. The earle of Cheſter what is he? A man of vnreaſonable boldneſſe, bent to conſpiracie, inconſtant to performe that which he raſhlie taketh in hand, readie to run into batell, vncircumſpect in danger, practiſing things of great importance, séeking after things vnpoſſible, bringing with him few good ſoldiers, but gathering a vagarant rout of raſcals. There is nothing in him that we ought to be afraid of, for looke whatſoeuer he attempteth manfullie, the ſame he giueth ouer womanlie, in all his doings vnfortunate, in all encounters either he is ouercome and fléeth awaie, or if he get the vpper hand (which ſeldome times chanceth) he ſuſteineth greater loſſe than they whom he dooth vanquiſh.

Continuall ood ſucceſſe prouocation f boldneſſe.

The Welſhmen, whom he bringeth with him are little eſtéemed of vs, who pretend a naked raſhneſſe without any vſe of armor, ſo that as men without any knowledge of martiall policie, they fall as brute beaſts vpon the hunters iaueline. The other, as well the nobles as the common ſouldiers are but runnagates and vagabounds; of whom I would wiſh the number greater than it is: for the more they be, the worſſe in effect their ſeruice ſhall prooue in time of néed. You therefore (moſt worthie chéefetaines) you men of honor, it ſtandeth you vpon to haue in regard your vertue and dignities. This day aduance your renowme, and follow the foreſteps of your famous anceſtors, leaue to your ſonnes an euerlaſting commendation. The continuall ſucceſſe of victorie ought to be a prouocation vnto you to doo manfullie: the continuance of euill ſpéed may be to yonder ſide an occaſion to run away. For euen alreadie (I dare ſay) they repent them of their comming hither, and could be contented to be gone, if the nature of the place would ſuffer them to depart. Then ſith it is not poſſible for them either to fight or to flée, what other thing can they doo, but (as appointed by Gods ordinance) offer themſelues and all they haue about them preſentlie vnto vs. Yée ſée then their horſſes, their armour, and their bodies readie here at your pleaſure, lift vp your hearts therefore, and reach your hands to take that with great chearefulneſſe of mind, which the Lord hath thus offered and fréelie preſented vnto you.

Now yer he had all made an end of his words, the batels were readie to ioine, they met with great noiſe of trumpets and other inſtruments, and the fight began with a verie ſore and cruell ſlaughter. Hard it was in the beginning to geſſe who ſhould haue the better. The wing of the diſherited men ouerthrew and bare downe their aduerſaries, which were led by the duke of Britaine, and the forenamed earles. On the contrarie part, the earle of Albemarle and William de Ypres put the Welſhmen to flight, but by the earle of Cheſter and his retinue, the ſame earle and William de Ypres were fiercelie aſſailed afreſh, and put out of order. Thus was the kings ſide put to the worſe, namelie his horſſemen, who being placed in the forefront, and there ouermatched, fell to galoping. Which thing when the king beheld, he was not yet any whit therewith abaſhed, but like an hardie captein (as he was no leſſe indéed) comforted his footmen whom he had about him, and ruſhing vpon his enimies, bare them downe, and ouerthrew ſo manie as ſtood before him, ſo that with the point of his weapon he made himſelfe waie. His footmen, who were but a few in number to the multitude of his enimies, counteruailed in all points the prowes and manlike doings of their king and capteine, inſomuch that few battels had béene better fought, nor with greater ſlaughter on both ſides, if the kings foreward (which in maner at the firſt ſhranke backe and was diſordered, not without ſome ſupicion of treaſon) had ſtaied the brunt of the enimies a while, as it had béene requiſite. At length the king encountring with the earle of Cheſter, being ouercharged with multitude, was taken priſoner by one William de Cahames.

But hir ſuit was ſo farre off from being granted, that ſhe was reiected and caſt off with reprochfull words. Whereupon ſhe conceiued a moſt high diſpleaſure, and vnderſtood well inough; that peace was to be purchaſed by force of armes onelie, and not by any other meanes: inſomuch that with all diligence ſhe ſent to hir ſonne Euſtace (then being in Kent) & willed him to prepare an armie, which he did moſt ſpéedilie.

It chanced at the ſame time that the citizens of London made great and laborious ſuit vnto the ſaid empreſſe, that they might haue the lawes of king Edward the Confeſſour reſtored, and the ſtraight lawes of hir father king Henrie aboliſhed. But for ſo much as they could get no grant of their petition, and perceiued the empreſſe to be diſpleaſed with them about that importunat requeſt, wherein onelie ſhe ouerſhot hir ſelfe, they deuiſed how and by what meanes they might take hir priſoner, knowing that all the Kentiſhmen would helpe to ſtrengthen them in their enterpriſe. The kingdome being thus diuided into two ſeuerall factions, was by all ſimilitudes like to come to vtter ruine: for the people kindled in hatred one againſt another, ſought nothing elſe but reuenge on both ſides, and ſtill the land was ſpoiled and waſted by the men of warre which lodged within the caſtels and fortreſſes, and would often iſſue out to harrie and ſpoile the countries. A parlement called.

King Stephan being deliuered in ſuch wiſe as you haue heard, comming to London, and there being accompanied with his brother Henrie biſhop of Wincheſter (then the popes legat) Theobald archbiſhop of Canturburie, and others, he called a parlement, wherein the king declared the preſent ſtate, how the enimie was brought to this point, that if it would pleaſe the Nobles of the realme to mainteine him with men & monie, he truſted now ſo to worke, as they ſhould not need to feare ſubmiſſion to the yoke of a womans gouernment: which at the firſt they ſeemed much to miſlike, and now ſithens (to their great greefe) had prooued to be intollerable. The ſumme of his talke tended to this end, that thoſe which were able of themſelues to aid him with their owne perſons, ſhould prepare them out of hand ſo to doo; and the reſidue that were not meet (as biſhops, and ſuch like maner of men) ſhould be contributors to aid him with hired ſouldiers, armour, and monie.

bliſhed in fa-
uour of preeſts

This was gladlie agreed vpon, with the generall conſent of all the aſſemblie. And bicauſe the biſhops ſhewed themſelues verie liberall towards the aduancing of the kings purpoſe, there was a ſtatute made at the ſame parlement, that who ſo euer did laie any violent hands on a ſacred perſon, or elſe tooke vpon him to apprehend any of them, for what fault ſoeuer, without the biſhops licence, he ſhould be accurſed, and not be aſſoiled of any maner of perſon, except of the pope, as by a canon it was alreadie decreed, but not obeied among the Engliſhmen till that daie. ¶ The cauſe of making this ſtatute was cheeflie, for that preeſts during the time of the ciuill wars, were dailie either ſlaine, or taken priſoners, and ſo put to their ranſoms, or charged with great penalties and greeuous fines.

The biſhop of Wincheſter at this councell alſo began an other brall among the cleargie, for being brother to king Stephan, & armed with the popes authoritie as his legat in England, by reaſon of exerciſing his authoritie, fell at variance with the biſhop of Canturburie, who tooke himſelfe for his ſuperior, bicauſe he was his primat. This quarell grew ſo far in queſtion, that they went both to Rome to haue the controuerſie decided, and ſo bringing their ſutes thither, contented well the eares of them that had the hearing of the ſame; for the more weightie the cauſe ſeemed, the better it liked them.

Paul. Lang. in Chron. citizen. pag. 760.

¶ A late writer, noting in clergiemen of his age & countrie not onelie the aſpiring vice of ambition, but other diſorders alſo, and monſtrous outrages, after a complaint made that gold (by which title he calleth thoſe of the eccleſiaſticall order) is turned into to droſſe, and ſwéet wine become tart vineger, concludeth with the illation of the cauſe hereof compriſed in this metricall accouplement, ſaieng:

Dum factor rerum priuaret flamine clerum,
Ad ſatanæ votum ſucceſsit turba nepotum.

Which he inferred vpon occaſion againſt the prepoſterous elections of vnméet men into epiſcopall ſées, for that they were not ſo qualified as the dignitie of the place required; otherwiſe peraduenture enabled with competent knowledge and learning. And ſuerlie, we may note theſe inordinate affections from the beginning of this our chronicle in the beſt (I meane in reſpect of their eſtates) of this liuerie, and may iuſtlie impute it to the defection of Gods ſpirit in them, whoſe nature is to plant peace and méekeneſſe in the harts of his tenants, not diſcord, not ambition, not the works of darkneſſe, which beſéeme not the children of light. The empreſſe hir ſonne lord Henrie.

After hir departure from Oxford, the towneſmen yéelded vnto the king, who hauing taken order for the kéeping of them in obedience, marched toward Walingford, minding to beſiege the caſtell there: but being encountred in the way by his enimies, he was driuen backe, and ſo conſtreined to turne another waie. Earle Robert hearing that his ſiſter was eſcaped and gotten to Wallingford, haſted thither with all ſpéed to viſit hir: & (as ſome write) brought with him hir ſonne the lord Henrie that was come with him from beyond the ſeas, to ſée his mother: ſo that the empreſſe now beholding both hir ſonne and brother, receiued them with all the ioy and honour that ſhe could or might preſentlie make them. Hir ſon remaining vnder the gouernement of earle Robert, was then appointed by him to abide within the citie of Briſtow, & there continued for the ſpace of 4. yéeres, being committed to one Matthew his ſchoolemaiſter, to be inſtructed in knowledge, and trained vp in ciuill behauiour.

him. The earles ſouldiers egerlie aſſailed the kings people, killed and ſpoiled them at their pleaſure, rifled the kings treaſurie without reſiſtance, and ſatiſfied themſelues with greedines. In this broile was William Marcell or Martell taken priſoner by earle Roberts men, & led to the caſtell of Wallingford, where Brian the earle of Gloceſters ſonne hauing charge of that caſtell, kept him in cloſe priſon, and vſed him hardlie, who by reaſon of the opinion which men had conceiued of his valiancie, could not be deliuered, till he had paid 300. marks for his ranſome, and deliuered the caſtell of Shirborne into the earles hands. Within a few daies after, Miles earle of Hereford departed this life, whoſe death was verie greeuouſlie taken of the empreſſe, for he was one of hir cheefe freends and councellers. His eldeſt ſonne Roger ſucceeded him, a gentleman though yoong in yeares, yet valiant and forward in feats of armes. William Mandeuile earle of Eſſex, an ancient capteine, & an expert warriour (who had ſerued the empreſſe, was taken alſo at S. Albons) but not without great ſlaughter of the kings ſouldiers: in ſo much that among other, the erle of Arundell mounted on a couragious palfrie & a verie valiant man was ouerthrowen in the middeſt of a water called Haliwell, by a knight named Walkeline de Oxcaie, ſo that the ſame earle was ſore bruiſed in his bodie, and almoſt drowned. The king was preſent himſelfe at the taking of the ſaid Mandeuile, whom he ſpoiled of all his goods, and conſtreined by way of redemption of his libertie, to deliuer into the kings hands the Tower of London, the caſtell of Walden, and Pleſhey. Herevpon the ſame earle being releaſed was driuen through pouertie to ſeeke ſome recouerie of his loſſes by ſundrie ſpoiles and roberies. Firſt of all therefore he ſpoiled the abbeie of S. Albons, and then the abbeie of Ramſey, which he fortified and defended as a fortreſſe, caſting the moonks out of doores, and in euerie place where ſoeuer he came, he robbed the countrie before him, till at length in the midſt of his reuenge and malicious dooings, he was ſhot thorough with an arrow amongſt his men by a ſillie footman, and ſo ended his life with confuſion, receiuing worthie puniſhment for his vngodlie behauiour. For he was a man of high ſtomach & loftie courage, but verie obſtinate againſt God, of great induſtrie in worldlie buſineſſe, but paſſing negligent towards his maker, as writers report of him.

Likewiſe Robert Marmion, who had attempted the ſemblable robberie & ſpoile in the abbeie church of Couentrie, was ſlaine before the ſame abbeie by a like miſchance. For going foorth to encounter with the earle of Cheſter (his mortall enimie, and being approched as then towards the citie) he fell with his horſſe into a ditch, which he cauſed to be couertlie made for the deſtruction of his enimies: and before he could be relieued, a ſouldier of the earles part ſtept to him, and ſtroke his head from his ſhoulders in ſight of both armies. Ernulfus the ſonne of earle Geffrey Mandeuile that kept the church of Ramſey as a fortreſſe, after his fathers death, was taken at length and baniſhed.

The king abode not the giuing of the charge, bicauſe he was but weake and therefore fled; neither could the earle follow the chace conuenientlie, for the like cauſe; but ſetting vpon thoſe that were about to make the trench, he ſlue 80. of the workemen, and then retired into the caſtell.

The earle of Gloceſter departeth this life.

Thither alſo came the earle of Cheſter with a great traine of knights and gentlemen vnto the king, and ſo at length they were not vnfeignedlie accorded and made freends, but in apperance on the kings behalfe. For ſhortlie after, the earle was craftilie taken at a parlement holden at Northampton, by the practiſe of K. Stephan, and could not be deliuered, till he had ſurrendred the citie and caſtell of Lincolne, with other fortreſſes perteining to the crowne into the kings hands. About that time did the Welſhmen deſtroie the prouince of Cheſter, but at laſt they were diſtreſſed. This yeare alſo the lord Geffrey earle of Aniou ſent three Noble men into England, accompanied with certeine men of warre, vnto earle Robert, requeſting him to ſend ouer his ſonne Henrie into France, that he might ſee him, and if need required, he promiſed to ſend him backe againe with all conuenient ſpeed. Earle Robert was contented to ſatiſfie his requeſt: and ſo with a good power of armed men brought the lord Henrie vnto Warham, where he tooke leaue of him, neuer after to ſee him in this world. For when the child was tranſported, earle Robert returned ſpeedilie to the parties from whence he came, and there falling into an ague, departed this life about the beginning of Nouember, and was buried at Briſtow. The lord Henrie comming to his father, was ioifully receiued, and remained in thoſe parties for the ſpace of two yeares and foure moneths.

K. Stephan entreth into Lincolne with his crowne on his head.

In the meane ſeaſon, the vniuſt proceedings of K. Stephan againſt the earle of Cheſter, purchaſed him new hatred of his old aduerſaries, and like ſupicion of ſuch as were his freends, for it ſounded not a little to his diſhonor. Euerie man therefore was in doubt of his dealing, and iudged that it ſtood them vpon to take heed to themſelues. But he (as one that thought he had atchiued ſome high exploit) in triumphant wiſe ſhortlie after entred into Lincolne in his roiall robes, and his crowne on his head, whereas it had not beene heard that any king had doone the like manie yeares before.

¶ It is reported by ſome writers, that he did this, to root out of mens minds a fooliſh ſuperſtitious conceit, which beleeued that no king with his crowne vpon his head might enter that citie, but ſome miſchance ſhould light vpon him: wherevpon he ſeemed by this meanes to mocke their ſuperſtitious imagination.

About the ſame time manie of the Nobles of the realme (perceiuing the kings authoritie to repreſſe violent wrongs committed by euill dooers to be defectiue) builded ſundrie ſtrong caſtels and fortreſſes vpon their owne grounds, either to defend themſelues, or to make force vpon their enimies neere adioining. After the departing of the king from Lincolne, the earle of Cheſter came thither with an armie, to aſſaie if he might recouer that citie. But his lieutenant that had the leading of his men, was ſlaine at the entring of the northgate, and ſo the erle was beaten backe with the loſſe of manie of his men: and the citizens hauing got the vpper hand, reioiſed not a little for the victorie.

Simon Dun.

But here (to ſtay a litle with temporall affaires) it ſhall not be amiſſe to rehearſe the effect of a contention, which fell about this time betweene that king and the archbiſhop of Canturburie. For ſo it happened (as Geruaſius Dorobernenſis writeth) that pope Eugenius came this yeare into France, about the middeſt of Lent, and afterward held a ſynod or councell at Rhemes: wherevnto Theobald archbiſhop of Canturburie, with others of the Engliſh biſhops were ſummoned. The archbiſhop therevpon aſking licence of the king, & not obteining it, found meanes to ſteale awaie in a ſmall bote, not without danger of his perſon.

Ger.Dor.

Now therefore the caſe of this Theobald ſtood verie hard: for Henrie biſhop of Wincheſter the kings brother through enuie had ſo wrought, that if the archbiſhop paſſed ouer without licence, he ſhould be confined of the king. Againe, he was ſure, if he came not to the councell, that he ſhould be ſuſpended by the pope. Herevpon the archbiſhop meaning rather to offend the king than the pope, got ouer, as it were ſwimming, rather than ſailing; the veſſell wherein he paſſed ouer being ſtarke naught: for all the ports were kept by the kings ſeruants, ſo that he was glad to take ſuch a bote as came next to hand. In conſideration whereof he was highlie commended by the pope.

In this councell the prebendaries of Yorke, togither with Henrie Mordach then abbat of Fountney, preſented themſelues, exhibiting their complaint againſt William archbiſhop of Yorke, for that (as they alledged) he was neither canonicallie choſen, nor lawfullie conſecrated, but intruded by the kings authoritie. At length archbiſhop William was conuicted and depoſed, Albert biſhop of Hoſtia “ pronouncing ſentence in this wiſe: We doo decree
“ by the apoſtolike authoritie, that William archbiſhop
“ of Yorke is to be depoſed from his ſee, bicauſe
“ Stephan king of England, before any canonicall election,

Then, for that pope Eugenius had thus depoſed archbiſhop William, although not with the conſent of the more part of the cardinals, the chapiter of the church of Yorke, by his commandement comming togither, part of them choſe Hilarie biſhop of Chicheſter, and the other part elected Henrie Mordach abbat of Fountney. Now pope Eugenius, when both elections were ſhewed him at Auxerre, confirmed the election of Henrie Mordach, and diſanulled the other, and then conſecrated the foreſaid Henrie with his owne hands. The late nominated archbiſhop William being thus depoſed, returned into England, and remained at Wincheſter with king Henrie till the death of pope Eugenius, following the counſell of the ſame biſhop in all things.

Now when the councell at Rhemes was ended, archbiſhop Theobald returned into England, and comming to Canturburie, was receiued with great honor of the couent and citizens there. But the king remaining then at London, when he heard of it, was ſore diſpleaſed, and came with great ſpeed vnto Canturburie, where much conference being had betwixt him and the archbiſhop (although to ſmall purpoſe) for the bringing of them to an agreement, at length the king compelled the archbiſhop to depart the realme. Wherevpon, after a few daies reſpit, he went to Douer, where he tooke ſhip and ſailed into France. But within a while he was called backe by the queene and William of Ypres, vnto S. Omers, that they might the ſooner aduertiſe him of the kings mind and pleaſure. Here he conſecrated Gilbert the elect biſhop of Hereford, the fift daie of September, Theodoric biſhop of Amiens and Nicholas biſhop of Cambre aſſiſting him.

After this, when by ſending of meſſengers to and fro, aſwell biſhops, abbats, and other, both ſpirituall perſons and temporall, there could no agreement be made, he directed his letter to certeine churches here in England, pronouncing by a certeine day, namelie the twelfe day of September, a ſentence of interdiction to be obſerued through the relme. The monks of Canturburie ſore offended herewith, before the prefixed day of this ſentence to be put in vre, ſent two moonkes of their owne houſe, Nigell and Abſolon, vnto the pope: whoſe errand when the pope had vnderſtood, he commanded them to returne home, and to obeie their archbiſhops ſentence in all things.

In the meane time the archbiſhops men and tenants were ſore oppreſſed, and his rents and reuenues ſeized to the kings vſe, yea euen before the daies of paiment. Which maner of proceeding ſore greeued the archbiſhop: in ſo much that departing from S. Omers, he came to Graueling, and there taking the ſea, croſſed ouer to a towne called Goſeford that belonged vnto Hugh Bigot erle of Northfolke: which earle receiued him with great honour, and ſent him all neceſſarie prouiſion, ſo long as he remained in his countrie. At the terme appointed, he interdicted all the kings dominions, and would not reuoke the ſentence, till Robert biſhop of London, Hilarie biſhop of Chicheſter, and William biſhop of Norwich, with manie other Noblemen, came to him vnto Franclingham in Northfolke, a caſtell apperteining to the ſaid earle, where at length an attonement was concluded betwixt him and the king: wherevpon he was brought home vnto Canturburie with great ioy and honor.

He accuſed the moonks of Canturburie, for diſobeieng the interdiction, truſting that the pope would not heare thoſe two moonkes whom they had ſent, as he did not indeed. He excommunicated alſo all thoſe that had receiued the ſacraments amongſt them, during the time of the interdiction. Now theſe moonkes being at their wits end, diſpatched with all ſpeed other two moonkes to the pope, to obteine an abſolution, before the archbiſhop ſhould vnderſtand it: but they were ſent backe againe with checks, and commanded to obeie their archbiſhop in all things, as the other were, which had beene there with him before.

The moonks of Canturburie that were ſent to Rome, returning, came from thence to Bullongne, where they found thoſe that were firſt ſent thither: and ſo they all foure came to Canturburie. The pope alſo had ſent a priuie commandement to the archbiſhop, that he ſhould duelie puniſh as well them as the other. Wherevpon the archbiſhop taking counſell with his freends, depoſed Sylueſter the prior, and ſuſpended William the ſecretarie of the houſe from entring the queere. It was decreed alſo, that the reſidue ſhould ceaſe ſo long a time from ſaieng ſeruice, as they had ſaid it before vnlawfullie, againſt the archbiſhops commandement. For it was thought reaſon, that whileſt other ſang and were merrie, they ſhould keepe ſilence, which wilfullie tooke vpon them to ſing, whileſt other held their peace and were ſtill. They began therefore to ceaſe from ſaieng diuine ſeruice, and from ringing their bels in the ſecond weeke of Lent: & ſo kept ſilence from the twelfe day of March, vntill the firſt day of Auguſt.

The queene wife to king Stephan in this meane while lay much at S. Auguſtines in Canturburie, bicauſe of haſtening forward the building of Feuerſham abbeie, which ſhe and hir huſband had begonne from the verie foundation. And bicauſe the monkes of S. Auguſtine might not celebrate diuine ſeruice, ſhe called thither commonlie the monks of Chriſtes church to ſay ſeruice before hir. Thus much for that purpoſe: and now to other matters.

But now incouraged with the preſence of the lord Henrie, they declared themſelues freends to him, and enimies to the king. Immediatlie after his arriuall, he tooke with him the earles of Cheſter and Hereford, Ranulfe and Roger, and diuers other Noble men and knights of great fame, beſide thoſe whom he had brought with him out of Normandie, and went vnto Carleil, where he found his coſin Dauid king of Scotland, of whome he was moſt ioifullie receiued: and vpon Whitſunday with great ſolemnitie, being not paſt ſixteene yeares of age, was by the ſame king made knight, with diuerſe other yoong gentlemen that were much about the ſame age.

In the meane while Henrie Duke of Normandie, after he had returned from the king of the Scots, ſailed backe into Normandie, about the beginning of Auguſt, leauing England full of all thoſe calamities, which ciuill warre is accuſtomed to bring with it, as burning of houſes, killing, robbing, and ſpoiling of people, ſo that the land was in danger of vtter deſtruction, by reaſon of that peſtilent diſcord.

This yeare the 23. of Februarie, Galfridus Monumetenſis, otherwiſe called Galfridus Arthurius, who turned the Britiſh hiſtorie into Latine, was conſecrated biſhop of S. Aſaph, by Theobald archbiſhop of Canturburie, at Lambeth, William biſhop of Norwich and Walter biſhop of Rocheſter aſſiſting him.

The earle of Aniou father to Henry Fitz empreſſe departeth this life.

Moreouer, this yeare (as ſome writers haue recorded) Geffrey earle of Aniou, huſband to the empreſſe Maud, departed this life, on the ſeuenth day of September, leauing his ſonne Henrie onelie heire and ſucceſſor in the eſtates of the duchie of Normandie and countie of Aniou. The bodie of the ſaid earle was buried at Mans, with a great funerall pompe: his three ſonnes Henrie, Geffrey, and William being preſent.

Worceſter aſſaulted.

But king Stephan aſſaulting the faire citie of Worceſter with a great power of men of warre, tooke it, and conſumed it with fire, but the caſtell he could not win. This citie belonged to earle Walcran de Mellent, at that ſeaſon: for king Stephan to his owne hinderance had giuen it vnto him. Now after the men of warre had diuided the ſpoile amongſt them, they came backe, and paſſing through the lands of their enimies, got great booties, which they alſo tooke away with them, finding none to reſiſt them in their iournie.

A ſynod at London.

In the yeare following Theobald archbiſhop of Canturburie, and legat to the ſee apoſtolike, held a generall ſynod or councell at London in the Lent ſeaſon, where king Stephan himſelfe with his ſonne Euſtachius, and other the peeres of the realme were preſent. This councell was full of appeales, contrarie to that had beene vſed in this land, till the time that Henrie biſhop of Wincheſter vnto his owne harme (whileſt he was likewiſe the popes legat) had by vniuſt intruſion brought them in, and now at this councell he was himſelfe thriſe appealed to the hearing of the popes owne conſiſtorie. After this king Stephan in the ſame yeare brake into the citie of Worceſter, and whereas he could not the laſt time win the caſtell, he now endeuoured with all his force to take it. But when thoſe within made valiant reſiſtance, he raiſed two caſtels againſt it, and leauing in the ſame certeine of his Nobles to continue the ſiege, he himſelfe returned home. ¶ Thus (as yee ſee) the kings propertie was to attempt manie things valiantlie, but he proceeded in them oftentimes verie ſlowlie: howbeit, now by the policie of the earle of Leiceſter, thoſe two caſtels which the king had raiſed to beſiege the other caſtell, were ſhortlie after deſtroied: and ſo the beſieged were deliuered from danger. This earle of Leiceſter was brother to the earle of Mellent. Thus the kings purpoſed intention and painefull trauell on that behalfe came to none effect.

The duke of Normandie Fitzempreſſe marieth the ducheſſe of Aquitaine.

In the meane while Henrie duke of Normandie maried Elianor duches of Guien or Aquitaine, latelie diuorſed from the French king, and ſo in right of hir he became duke of Aquitaine, and earle of Poictou; for ſhe was the onelie daughter to William duke of Guien, and earle of Poictou, and by hir father created his ſole and lawfull heire.

The French king maketh warre againſt the duke of Normandie.

The French king was nothing pleaſed with this mariage, inſomuch that he made ſore warre vpon duke Henrie, ioining himſelfe in league with king Stephan, with his ſonne Euſtace, and with the lord

Geffrey brother to duke Henrie, ſo that the ſaid Henrie was conſtreined to defer his iournie into England, and applie his power to defend his countries and ſubiects on that ſide of the ſea. For whereas he was readie at the mouth of the riuer of Barbe to paſſe ouer into England, not long after midſummer, the French king, with Euſtace king Stephans ſonne, Robert earle of Perch, Henrie erle of Champaigne, and Geffrey brother to duke Henrie, hauing aſſembled a mightie armie, came and beſieged the caſtell of Newmarch, and ſent forth the lord Geffrey with a ſtrong power to win the caſtell of Angers. Duke Henrie aduertiſed hereof, departing from the place where he ſoiourned, haſted forth to ſuccour his people that were beſieged, but the caſtell of Newmarch was deliuered to the French king, through treaſon of thoſe that had it in keeping, before the duke could come to their reſcue.

Wherevpon the ſaid duke hauing knowledge by the waie that he ſhould come too late thither, he encamped firſt vpon the ſide of the riuer of Andell, and waſted a great part of the countrie of Veuxin or Veulqueſine, ſurnamed Le Normant, which lieth betwixt the riuer of Epte and Andell. This countrie belonged ſomtime to Normandie, but Geffrey earle of Aniou the dukes father had reſigned it to the French king, to the end he ſhould not aid king Stephan. The duke alſo burned the caſtels of Baſcheruille, Chitrey, Stirpiney, and the caſtell of Fort, that belonged to Hugh de Gourney, with diuerſe other. About the end of Auguſt he left his townes in Normandie ſufficientlie furniſhed with gariſons of ſouldiers, and went into Aniou, where he beſieged the caſtell de mount Sotelli, till he had taken it, and all thoſe that were within it, amongſt whome was the lord thereof named William. The French king on the other ſide entring into Normandie, burnt part of the borough of Rieule, and either then or ſhortlie after that duke Henrie was gone ouer into England, he tooke the towne and caſtell of Vernon.

Whileſt theſe things were thus a dooing in France, K. But the archbiſhops and biſhops refuſed ſo to doo, bicauſe the pope by his letters ſent to the archbiſhop, had commanded to the contrarie; namelie, that he ſhould in no wiſe crowne the kings ſon, bicauſe his father king Stephan had got the poſſeſſion of the land againſt his oth receiued in behalfe of the empreſſe. The father and ſonne being not a litle offended herewith, committed moſt of his biſhops to ward, ſeeking by threats and menacings to bring them to his purpoſe. The biſhops alſo were in no ſmall perplexitie: for according to the truth, the king neuer ſeemed greatlie to fauor churchmen, bicauſe of their ſtrength (as in former times by his rigor vſed againſt the biſhops of Saliſburie and Lincolne it plainelie appeared) and yet would not theſe men yeeld to his pleaſure: wherevpon although they were ſet at libertie, they were neuertheleſſe depriued of their temporall poſſeſſions, which notwithſtanding afterwards vpon the kings owne motion were reſtored vnto them.

The ſame yeare alſo king Stephan by ſiege and force of aſſault did win the caſtell of Newberie not far from Winchester. This doone he went to Wallingford, and beſieging the caſtell, he builded at the entring of the bridge a fortreſſe to ſtop them within from iſſuing out, and likewiſe from receiuing any reliefe or ſuccour by their freends abroad. The defendants perceiuing themſelues ſo hardlie laid at, ſent to the duke of Normandie (in whoſe name they kept that caſtell) deſiring him either to ſuccour them, or elſe giue them licence to yeeld vp the caſtell to the king. Herevpon duke Henrie hauing diſpatched his buſineſſe on the further ſide of the ſea, began to be kindled with a feruent deſire once againe to attempt his fortune here in England for recouerie of that kingdome, and ſo with three thouſand footmen, & 7. ſcore horſſemen, with all ſpeed poſſible ſailed ouer into England, where he landed about the 12. daie in Chriſtmaſſe. He was no ſooner arriued, but a great number of ſuch as tooke part with his mother came flocking in vnto him: wherevpon being now furniſhed with a great and puiſſant armie, he marched forth to Malmeſburie, where in the caſtell was a great gariſon of ſoldiers placed by king Stephan. of that caſtell. For as (Simon of Durham writeth) he had won by aſſault the other parts and lims of the caſtell before king Stephan came to remoue him.

A ſore ſtorme.

This tower that thus held out, was in the keeping of one capteine Iordan, who eſcaping forth came to the king, informing him in what ſtate he had left his men within the tower: wherevpon the king (making all the power that he was able) ſet forward, and comming to Circiter, lodged there one night, and in the morning purpoſing to raiſe the ſiege, or to fight with his enimies (if they would abide battell) marched forth towards Malmeſburie. But vpon his approch to the dukes campe, the daie following his comming thither, there roſe ſuch a hideous tempeſt of wind and raine, beating full in the faces of king Stephans people, that God ſeemed to fight for the duke, who in reſpect of the number of people was thought too weake to deale with the ſtrong and puiſſant armie of the king: howbeit the ſtorme being on his backe, and beating extremelie in king Stephans mens faces, they were not able to hold their weapons in their hands, inſomuch that he perceiued he could not paſſe the riuer that ran betwixt the armies: wherevpon conſtreined in that ſort through the violent rage of that cold and wet weather, he returned to London full euill appaied, in that he could not ſatiſfie his expectation at that preſent.

The caſtell of Wallingford.

The tower that duke Henrie had hardlie beſieged immediatlie herewith was ſurrendred vnto him, & then making prouiſion for vittels and other things, to the reliefe of them that kept the caſtell of Wallingford, he haſted thither, and finding no reſiſtance by the way, eaſily accompliſhed his enterpriſe. There were diuerſe caſtels thereabouts in the countrie furniſhed with gariſons of the kings ſouldiers, but they kept themſelues cloſe, and durſt not come abroad to ſtop his paſſage. Shortlie after he beſieged the caſtell of Cranemers, and caſt a trench about it, ſo as his people within Wallingford caſtell might haue free libertie to come forth at their pleaſure: but as for thoſe within the caſtell of Cranemers, they were ſo hardlie holden in, that there was no waie for them to ſtart out.

The caſtell of Cranemers.

The king aduertiſed hereof, got all his hoſt togither, and marched forward verie terriblie toward duke Henries campe. But ſhewing no token of feare, he cauſed the trench wherewith he had incloſed his campe forthwith to be caſt downe, and leauing the ſiege, came into the fields with his armie ſet in order of battell, meaning to trie the matter by dint of ſword, although he had not the like number of men as the king had: whoſe armie perceiuing their enimies to come in the face of them, were ſtricken with a ſudden feare: neuertheleſſe, he himſelfe being of a good courage, commanded his people to march forward. But herewith certeine Noble men, that loued not the aduancement of either part, vnder a colour of good meaning ſought to treat an agréement betwixt them, ſo that an intermiſſion or ceſing from war was granted, and by compoſition the caſtell which the king had built, and the duke beſieged, was razed to the ground. The king and the duke alſo came to an enterview and communication togither, a riuer running betwixt them. Some write that they fell to agreement, king Stephan vndertaking to raze the caſtell of Cranemers himſelfe, and ſo laieng armour aſide for that time, they parted aſunder.

Laurence daie cauſed all the corne in the countrie about, and namelie that which belonged to the ſaid abbeie, to be ſpoiled and brought into a caſtell which he had in keeping not far from thence. But as he ſat downe to meat the ſame daie vpon receiuing the firſt morſell he fell mad (as writers haue reported) and miſerablie ended his life. The ſame weeke Simon earle of Northampton departed this world of a like diſeaſe, and ſo two of the chiefeſt aduerſaries which duke Henrie had, were rid out of the waie. About the ſame time alſo that noble and valiant earle of Cheſter called Ranulfe departed this life, a man of ſuch ſtoutneſſe of ſtomach, that death could ſcarſelie make him to yeeld, or ſhew any token of feare: he was poiſoned (as was thought) by William Peuerell. After him ſucceeded his ſonne Hugh, a man likewiſe of paſſing ſtrength and vertue. Now although earle Ranulfe fauoured the part of duke Henrie, yet in theſe later yeares he did but little for him: wherefore it was thought that the death of this earle was not ſo great a loſſe to the duke, as the deaths of Euſtace, earle Simon, and other the kings freends deceaſing about the ſame time ſeemed to further him: ſo that his part became dailie ſtronger, and the kings weaker.

About the ſame time the caſtels of Reading and Beertwell were deliuered to duke Henrie, and the ladie Gundreda counteſſe of Warwike draue out the ſouldiers that held it for king Stephan, and deliuered the towne to duke Henrie. Now they that had it in keeping ſent meſſengers to king Stephan, requiring reſcue, but the ſame time he had laid ſiege to the caſtell of Gipſwich, which Hugh Bigot kept againſt him: and bicauſe he wold not depart from that ſiege till he had the caſtell giuen vp into his hands (which came at laſt to paſſe) in the meane time the caſtell of Stamford was yeelded vp to duke Henrie, who immediatlie therevpon departed from Stamford eaſtward, meaning to come to the ſuccour of his freends beſieged at Gipſwich or Ipſwich (as it is commonlie called) not vnderſtanding as yet that they had ſurrendred the hold: but hauing knowledge by the way what was happened, he returned and marched ſtreight to Notingham, and got the towne eaſilie; for they within the caſtell had ſet it on fire, therfore he beſieged the caſtell ſtanding vpon the point of a ſteepe craggie rocke, and was furniſhed with a ſtrong gariſon of men, and all things neceſſarie for defenſe, ſo that it could not eaſilie be woone.

Wherein (beſides millians of extremities) honeſt matrones and mens wiues were violated, maids and virgins rauiſhed, churches ſpoiled, townes and villages robbed, whole flocks and heards of ſheepe and beaſts deſtroied (wherein the ſubſtance of the realme cheeflie conſiſted) and men without number ſlaine and murthered, it pleaſed the goodneſſe of almightie God at length to deliuer the land of theſe miſeries, which were notified to all countries round about that ſore lamented the ſame.

Now whereas king Stephan was the cauſe of all the troubles, in hauing vſurped an other mans rightfull inheritance, it pleaſed God to moue his hart at length to deſire peace which he had euer before abhorred. The cauſe that moued him cheefelie to change his former purpoſe, was for that his ſonne Euſtace by ſpeedie death was taken out of this world (as before you haue heard) which loſſe ſeemed great not onelie to the father, but alſo to all thoſe lords and others which had alwaies taken his part, bicauſe he was a yoong man ſo well liked of all men, that he was iudged to be borne to much honour. Which alteration being perceiued, thoſe Nobles that were glad to ſee the ſtate of their countrie quieted, did their beſt to further it; & cheeflie Theobald archbiſhop of Canturburie trauelled earneſtlie to bring the princes to ſome agreement, now talking with the king, now ſending to the duke, and vſing all means poſſible to ſet them at vnitie. The biſhop of Wincheſter alſo, who had cauſed all the trouble, vpon conſideration of the great calamities wherewith the land was moſt miſerablie afflicted, began to wiſh an end thereof. Thus was a publike aſſemblie made in the citie of Wincheſter, whither alſo duke Henrie came, who being ioifullie receiued of the king in the biſhops palace, they were made freends, the king admitting the duke for his ſonne, and the duke the king for his father, inſomuch that the agreement, which (through the carefull ſute of the archbiſhop of Canturburie) had beene laboured with ſuch diligence to good effect, was now confirmed: the cheefe articles whereof were theſe.

A peace concluded betwixt the king and the duke.

Some writers haue recorded that duke Henrie ſhould preſentlie by this agreement enioy halfe the realme of England.

1 That king Stephan, during his naturall life, ſhould remaine king of England, and Henrie the empreſſes ſonne ſhould enioy the dukedome of Normandie, and be proclaimed heire apparant to ſucceed in and haue the regiment of England, after the deceaſſe of Stephan.

2 That ſuch noble men, and other, which had held either with the one partie or the other, during the time of the ciuill warres, ſhould be in no danger for the ſame, but enioy their lands, poſſeſſions and liuings, according to their ancient rights and titles.

3 That the king ſhould reſume and take into his hands againe, all ſuch portions and parcels of inheritance belonging to the crowne, as he had giuen away, or were otherwiſe vſurped by any maner of perſon, and that all thoſe poſſeſſions which by any intruſion had beene violentlie taken from the right owners, ſince the daies of king Henrie, ſhould be reſtored to them that were rightlie poſſeſſed in the ſame by the daies of the ſaid king.

Matth. Paris. Caſtels to be razed in number. 1115.

4 That all thoſe caſtels, which contrarie to all reaſon and good order had beene made and builded by any maner of perſon in the daies of king Stephan, ſhould be ouerthrowne and caſt downe, which were found to be eleuen hundred and fifteene.

5 That the king ſhould reforme all ſuch diſorders as warre had brought in; to reſtore farmers to their holdings, to repaire decaied buildings, to ſtore paſtures and leaſſues with cattell, hils with ſheepe, &c.

6 That by his meanes the cleargie might enioy their due quietneſſe, and not be oppreſſed with any vniuſt exactions.

7 That he ſhould place ſhirifes where they had beene accuſtomed to beare rule, with inſtructions giuen them to deale vprightlie in cauſes, ſo as offenders might not eſcape through bribes, or any other reſpect of freendſhip; but that euerie man might receiue according to right and equitie.

8 That ſoldiours ſhould conuert their ſwords (as Eſaie ſaith) into culters & plough ſhares, their ſpeares into mattocks, and ſo returne from the campe to the plough: and that ſuch as were woont to keepe watch in the night ſeaſon, might now ſleepe and take their reſt without any danger.

9 That the huſbandman might be ſet free from all trouble and vexation, by meanes wherof he might follow his tilth, and plie his culture.

10 That merchant men and occupiers might enioy their trades and occupations to their aduancement.

11 That one kind and manner of ſiluer coine ſhould run through the land, &c.

12 There was alſo conſideration had of a ſonne which king Stephan had, named William, who though he were verie yoong, was yet appointed to ſweare fealtie vnto duke Henrie as lawfull heire to the crowne. The ſame William had the citie of Norwich, and diuerſe other lands aſſigned him for the maintenance of his eſtate, and that by the conſent and agreement of duke Henrie his adopted brother.

Theſe things being thus concluded at Wincheſter, and the warre that had continued for the ſpace of 17. yeares now ended and fullie pacified: the king tooke the duke with him to London, dooing to him all the honour he could deuiſe. The newes whereof being ſpred abrode, euerie good man reioiſed thereat. Thus through the great mercie of God, peace was reſtored vnto the decaied ſtate of this relme of England. Which things being thus accompliſhed with great ioy and tokens of loue, king Stephan and his new adopted ſonne duke Henrie tooke leaue either of other, appointing ſhortlie after to meet againe at Oxenford, there to perfect euerie article of their agreement, which was thus accorded a little before Chriſtmas.

¶ But by the way, for the better vnderſtanding of the ſaid agreement, I haue thought good to ſet downe the verie tenor of the charter made by king Stephan, as I haue copied it out, and tranſlated it into Engliſh out of an autentike booke conteining the old lawes of the Saxon and Daniſh kings, in the end whereof the ſame charter is exemplified, which booke is remaining with the right worſhipfull William Fleetwood eſquire, now recorder of London, and ſargeant at law.

Earle warren.

And William my ſonne hath doone his lawfull homage, and aſſured his fealtie vnto the ſaid duke of Normandie, and the duke hath granted to him to hold of him all thoſe tenements and holdings which I held before I atteined to the poſſeſſion of the realme of England, whereſoeuer the ſame be in England, Normandie, or elſewhere, and whatſoeuer he receiued with the daughter of earle Warren, either in England or Normandie, & likewiſe whatſoeuer apperteineth to thoſe honoures. And the duke ſhall put my ſonne William and his men that are of that honour in full poſſeſſion and ſeizine of all the lands, boroughs and rents, which the duke thereof now hath in his demaine, and namelie of thoſe that belong to the honour of the earle Warren, and namelie of the caſtels of Bellencumber and Mortimer, ſo that Reginald de Warren ſhall haue the keeping of the ſame caſtels of Bellencumber, and of Mortimer, if he will; and therevpon ſhall giue pledges to the duke: and if he will not haue the keeping of thoſe caſtels, then other liege men of the ſaid erle Warren, whome it ſhall pleaſe the duke to appoint, ſhall by ſure pledges and good ſuertie keepe the ſaid caſtels.

The caſtels of Bellencumber and Mortimer.

The earldome of Mortaigne.

Moreouer, the duke ſhall deliuer vnto him according to my will and pleaſure the other caſtels, which belong vnto the earledome of Mortaigne by ſafe cuſtodie and pledges, ſo ſoone as he conuenientlie may, ſo as all the pledges are to be reſtored vnto my ſonne free, ſo ſoone as the duke ſhall haue the realme of England in poſſeſſion. The augmentation alſo which I haue giuen vnto my ſonne William, he hath likewiſe granted the ſame to him; to wit, the caſtell and towne of Norwich, with ſeauen hundred pounds in lands, ſo as the rents of Norwich be accounted as parcell of the ſame ſeauen hundred pounds in lands, and all the countie of Norfolke; the profits and rents which belong to churches, biſhops, abbats & earles excepted; and the third pennie whereof Hugh Bigot is earle, alſo excepted: ſauing alſo and reſeruing the kings roiall iuriſdiction for adminiſtration of iuſtice. Alſo the more to ſtrengthen my fauour and loue to himwards, the duke hath giuen and granted vnto my ſaid ſonne whatſoeuer Richer de Aquila hath of the honour of Peuenſey. And moreouer the caſtell and towne of Peuenſey, and the ſeruice of Faremouth, beſide the caſtell and towne of Douer, and whatſoeuer apperteineth to the honour of Douer.

The church of Feuerſham.

The duke hath alſo confirmed the church of Feuerſham with the appurtenances; and all other things giuen or reſtored by me vnto other churches, he ſhall confirme by the counſell and aduice of holie church and of me. The earles and barons that belong to the duke, which were neuer my leeges, for the honour which I haue doone to their maiſter, they haue now doone homage and ſworne fealtie to me, the couenants betwixt me & the ſaid duke alwaies ſaued. The other which had before doone homage to me, haue ſworne fealtie to me as to their ſoureigne lord. And if the duke ſhould breake and go from the premiſſes, then are they altogither to ceaſſe from dooing him any ſeruice, till he reforme his miſdooings. And my ſonne alſo is to conſtreine him thereto, according to the aduice of holie church, if the duke ſhall chance to go from the couenants afore mentioned. My earles and barons alſo haue doone their leege and homage vnto the duke, ſauing their faith to me ſo long as I liue, and ſhall hold the kingdome with like condition, that if I doo breake and go from the premitted couenants, that then they may ceaſſe from dooing me any ſeruice, till the time I haue reformed that which I haue doone amiſſe.

The citizens alſo of cities, and thoſe perſons that dwell in caſtels, which I haue in my demaine, by my commandement haue doone homage, and made aſſurance to the duke, ſauing the fealtie which they owe to me during my life time, and ſo long as I ſhall hold the kingdome. They which keep the caſtle of Wallingford haue doone their homage to me, and haue giuen to me pledges for the obſeruing of their fealtie. And I haue made vnto the duke ſuch aſſurance of the caſtels and ſtrengths which I hold by the counſell and aduice of holie church, that when I ſhall depart this life, the duke thereby may not run into any loſſe or impeachment, wherby to be debarred from the kingdome. Likewiſe by the counſell and aduiſe of holie church, Roger de Buſſey keepeth the caſtell of Oxford, and Iordaine de Buſſey the caſtell of Lincolne, which Roger & Iordaine haue ſworne, and thereof haue deliuered pledges into the hands of the archbiſhop, that if I ſhall chance to leaue this life, they ſhal render the ſame caſtels to the duke without impeachment. The biſhop of Wincheſter hath alſo giuen his faith in the hands of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, that if I chance to depart this life, he ſhall render vp vnto the duke the caſtels of Wincheſter, and the fortreſſe of Hampton.

And if any of them, vnto whom the cuſtodie of theſe fortreſſes ſhall be committed, fortune to die, or otherwiſe to depart from his charge, an other ſhall be appointed to the keeping of the ſame fortreſſe, before he ſhall depart foorth thereof, by the counſell and aduice of holie church. And if any of thoſe perſons that haue any caſtels or fortreſſes belonging to me in their cuſtodie ſhall be found diſobedient and rebell, I and the duke ſhall conſtreine him to ſatiſfie our will & pleaſure, not leauing him in reſt till he be ſo conſtreined. The archbiſhops alſo and biſhops on either part, haue vndertaken, that if either of vs ſhall go from the foreſaid couenants, they ſhall ſo long chaſtiſe the partie offending with the eccleſiaſticall cenſures, till he reforme his fault, and returne to fulfill and obſerue the ſaid couenants. The mother alſo of the duke, and his wife, and his brethren, & ſubiects whom he may procure, ſhall likewiſe aſſure the premiſſes.

Anno Reg.19.

Thus far the Charter: and now to proceed with the hiſtorie. Immediatlie after Chriſtmaſſe, euen in the Octaues of the Epiphanie, the king and duke Henrie met againe at Oxenford, where all the earls and barons of the land being aſſembled, ſware fealtie vnto duke Henrie, their allegiance due vnto king Stephan, as to their ſoueraigne lord and ſupreme gouernour ſo long as he liued, alwaies reſerued. The forme of the peace was now alſo ingroſſed and regiſtred for a perpetuall witneſſe of the thing, in this yeare 1154. after their account that begin the yeare at Chriſtmaſſe, as about the feaſt of S. Hilarie in Ianuarie commonlie called the twentith daie. Thus was Henrie the ſonne of the empreſſe made the adopted ſonne of king Stephan, and therevpon the ſaid Henrie ſaluted him as king, and named him father. After concluſion of this peace, by the power of almightie God, all debate ceaſſed, in ſuch wiſe, that the ſtate of the realme of England did maruelouſlie for a time flouriſh, concord being mainteined on ech hand. ¶ There be which affirme, that an other cauſe bound king Stephan to agree to this attonement chiefelie, namelie for that the empreſſe (as they ſaie) was rather king Stephans paramour than his enimie: and therefore (when ſhe ſaw the matter growne to this point, that they were readie to trie battell with their armies readie ranged on a plaine in the weſterne parts called Egelaw heath) ſhe came ſecretlie vnto king Stephan, & ſpake vnto him on this wiſe: What a miſchieuous and vnnaturall thing go ye about? Is it meet that the father ſhould deſtroie the ſonne? Is it lawfull for the ſonne to kill the father? For the loue of God (man) refraine thy diſpleaſure, and caſt thy weapons out of thy hand, ſith that (as thou thy ſelfe knoweſt full well) Henrie is thine owne ſonne. With theſe and the like words ſhe put him in mind, and couertlie told him, that he had to doo with hir a little before ſhe was maried vnto earle Geffrey.

The words of the empreſſe to king Stephan.

The empreſſe confeſſeth hir ſelfe to be naught of hir bodie.

The king by ſuch tokens as the empreſſe gaue him, tooke hir words to be true, and therevpon all his malice was ſtreightwaies quenched: ſo that calling foorth the archbiſhop of Canturburie, he vttered to him the whole matter, and tooke therewith ſuch direction, in ſending to his aduerſaries for auoiding battell at that preſent, that immediatlie the armies on both ſides wrapped vp their enſignes, and euery man was commanded to keepe the peace, that a communication might be had about the concluſion of ſome pacification, which afterwards enſued in maner aboue mentioned.

Slanders deuiſed by malicious heads.

¶ But whether this or ſome other cauſe moued the king to this peace, it is to be thought that God was the worker of it. And ſurelie a man may thinke it good reaſon, that the report of ſuch ſecret companie-keeping betwixt the king and the empreſſe, was but a tale made among the common people vpon no ground of truth, but vpon ſome ſlanderous deuice of a malicious head. And admit that king Stephan had to doo with hir; yet is it like that both of them would doo for beſt to keepe it ſecret, that no ſuch reproch might be imputed either to Henrie, who was taken to be legitimate; or to his mother, whoſe honour therby ſhould not a little be ſtained.

But now to the purpoſe. Shortlie after that the king and duke Henrie had béene togither at Oxenford, where they ended all things touching the peace & concord betwixt them concluded, they met againe at Dunſtable, where ſome cloud of diſpleaſure ſéemed to darken the bright ſunſhine of the late begun loue and amitie betwixt thoſe two mightie princes the king and the duke. For where it was accorded (among other articles) that all the caſtels which had béene built ſince the daies of the late king Henrie for euill intents and purpoſes, ſhould be razed and throwne downe: contrarie therevnto (notwithſtanding manie of them were ouerthrowne and deſtroied to the accompliſhment of that article) diuers through the kings permiſſion were ſuffered to ſtand. And when the duke complained to the king thereof, he could not get at that time any redreſſe, which ſomewhat troubled him: but yet bicauſe he would not giue occaſion of any new trouble, nor offend the king, to whom (as to his reputed father) he would ſéeme to yéeld all honour and due reuerence, he paſſed it ouer.

Within a while after, the king and he came to Canturburie, where they were ſolemnlie receiued of the couent of Chriſtes church with proceſſion. After this, in the Lent ſeaſon they went to Douer, where they talked with Theodorike earle of Flanders, and with the counteſſe his wife who was aunt to duke Henrie. At their comming towards Canturburie (as it was bruted) the duke ſhould haue béene murthered, through treaſon of the Flemings that enuied both the dukes perſon, and alſo that peace which he had concluded with the king. But ſée the hap. As this feat ſhould haue béene wrought on Berhamdowne, William earle of Northfolke king Stephan his ſonne, who was one of the chéefe conſpirators, fell beſide his horſſe, and brake his leg, ſo that euerie man by that ſudden chance was in a maze, & came wondering about him. ¶ This no doubt came to paſſe by the prouidence of God, though ſuch accidents are commonlie imputed to caſualtie or chance medlie. For it is the worke of God either to preuent, or to intercept, or to recompenſe the vnnaturall conſpiracies of traitors and rebels with ſome notable plague: according to that of the poet;

When duke Henrie was departed (as ye haue heard) and gone ouer into Normandie, now that he had concluded a peace with king Stephan, his puiſſance was thought to be ſuch, that he was able to mainteine warres with the mightieſt prince that then reigned. For in right of his wife, he had gotten poſſeſſion of the duchie of Aquitaine, and the earledome of Poictou; and further by his mother, he enioied the duchie of Normandie, and looked to ſuccéed in the kingdome of England: and in right of his father he was earle of Aniou, Thouraigne, and Maine. A peace concluded betwixt the French king and duke Henrie.
Math. Weſt.

About the ſame time a peace was concluded betwixt the French king, and this duke Henrie: the king reſtoring vnto the duke the townes of Newmarch and Vernon, which he had before taken from him, and the duke giuing to the king 20000. markes of ſiluer, for the harmes doone by him, within the realme of France.

But now to returne vnto king Stephan. Ye ſhall vnderſtand, that within a while after he had made his foreſaid progreſſe almoſt about the whole realme, he returned vnto London, where he called a parlement as well to conſult of matters touching the ſtate of the commonwealth, as to furniſh the ſée of Yorke with a ſufficient archbiſhop. Wherevpon one Roger that was before archdeacon of Canturburie, was choſen to that dignitie, and conſecrated the tenth day of October, by archbiſhop Theobald, as legat to the pope, and not as archbiſhop of Canturburie. Then alſo was Thomas Becket made archdeacon of Canturburie by the ſaid Theobald. The new archbiſhop Roger firſt went to his ſée at Yorke, where after he had receiued his inthronization, and ſet his buſineſſe there in order, he tooke his iournie towards Rome to fetch his pall in his owne perſon.

King Stephan alſo after the end of the parlement went to Douer, there to méet the earle of Flanders, who came thither to talke with him of certeine buſineſſe. The earle was no ſooner returned backe, but the king fell ſicke, and was ſo gréeuouſlie tormented with a paine in his bellie, and with an old diſeaſe alſo, therewith (as ſhould appeare) he had béene often troubled, namelie, the emrods, that finallie he died in the abbey on the fiue and twentith day of October, in the nine and fortith yeare of his age, and after he had reigned eightéene yeares, ten moneths, and od daies, in the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour 1154. His bodie was interred in the abbeie of Feuerſham in Kent, which he had builded, where his wife alſo, and his ſonne Euſtace were buried before. ¶ Thus farre of the acts and déeds of Stephan; now a little of other bréefe remembrances, and firſt touching the proſopographie or deſcription of his perſon.

His ſtature.

He was comelie of ſtature, of a verie good complexion and diſpoſition, of great ſtrength, in qualities of mind verie excellent, expert in warre, gentle, curteous, and verie liberall. For though he continued all his time in a maner in the maintenance of wars, yet he leuied but few tributs, or almoſt none at all. Indéed he put diuers biſhops to gréeuous fines, and that not without the iuſt iudgement of Almightie God, that they might ſo be puniſhed duelie for their periurie committed in helping him to the crowne. Vices wherewith he ſhould be noted I find none, but that vpon an ambitious deſire to reigne, he brake his oth which he made vnto the empreſſe Maud.

Abbeies founded. Coggeſhall he founded himſelfe, and Fontneis in Lancaſhire, & Feuerſham in Kent.

In his daies, the abbeies of Tiltey, Fontneis, Rieualle, Coggeſhall in Eſſex, Newbourgh and Béeland, Meriuale in Warwikeſhire, Garedon in Leiceſterſhire, Kirkſtéed in Yorkeſhire, with diuerſe other in other parts of the realme, were founded, in ſo much that more abbeis were erected in his daies, than had béene within the ſpace of an hundred yeares before, as William Paruus writeth.

A great number of caſtels alſo were builded in his daies (as before ye haue heard) by the Nobles of the realme, either to defend the confines of their countries from inuaſions of forrenners, and violence of homelings; or as fortifications to themſelues when they ment or intended any inrode or breaking vpon their neighbours.

Diuerſe learned men namelie hiſtoriographers liued in theſe daies, as William Malmesburie, Henrie Huntington, Simon Dunelmenſis, Galfridus Arturius, otherwiſe called Monumetenſis, Caradoc Lancarnauenſis, William Reuellenſis, among whom Thurſtan archbiſhop of Yorke is not to be forgotten, beſides many more, who in diuerſe ſciences were verie expert and ſkilfull, as by treatiſes of their ſetting forth to the world hath ſufficientlie appeared.

Thus far Stephan of Bullongne.

Henrie the ſecond, the ſecond ſonne of Geffrey Plantagenet.

HEnrie the ſecond of that name, a French man borne, the ſecond ſonne of Geffrey Plantagenet earle of Anіou, begotten of Maud the empreſſe, daughter to Henrie the firſt, began his reigne ouer England the fiue and twentith of October, in the yeare after the creation of the world 5121. and in the yeare after the incarnation of our ſauiour 1154. about the beginning of the third yeare of the emperour Frederike the firſt, the ſecond of pope Anaſtaſius the fourth, the ſeuenteenth yeare of Lewes the ſeuenth king of France, and ſecond of Malcolme then king of Scotland. Immediatlie after he was aduertiſed of the death of king Stephan, he came ouer into England, landing at Oſtreham about the ſeuenth day of December. After he had got his companies togither, which by tempeſt were ſcattered in his paſſage, he came firſt to Winchester, where he receiued homage and fealtie of the Nobles of the realme reſorting vnto him. This doone he ſet forth towards London, where he was crowned king by Theobald archbiſhop of Canturburie the twentith daie of December.

The archbiſhop of Rouen, with thrée of his ſuffragans, the archbiſhop of Yorke, and manie other biſhops of England: Theodorus the earle of Flanders, with a great number of other earles, lords and barons were preſent there at his coronation. He was at that time about the age of thrée and twentie yeares, and to win the peoples loue, he ſpake manie comfortable words vnto them, to put them in hope (as the manner is) that they ſhould find him a louing prince. He vſed the lords alſo verie courteouſlie. And firſt of all, after his atteining to the crowne, he choſe to him councellers of the graueſt perſonages, and beſt learned in the lawes of the realme, with whoſe prudent aduice he peruſed thoſe lawes, and amended them where he thought neceſſarie, commanding chieflie, that the lawes eſtabliſhed by his grandfather Henrie the firſt ſhould be obſerued: and in manie things he relied vpon the aduice of Theobald archbiſhop of Canturburie, at whoſe ſute he admitted Thomas Becket to be his chancellour, which Becket the ſaid archbiſhop had made archdeacon of Canturburie the yeare before.

Diuerſe caſtels were throwne downe and made plaine with the ground at the kings commandement, which priuate men by king Stephans permiſſion had builded, or elſe for that they ſtood not in ſuch places as was thought méet and expedient; yet ſome he cauſed to be fortified: and furthermore, tooke into his hands againe ſuch lands and poſſeſſions as apperteined to the crowne, and were alienated vnto any manner of perſon, of what degrée ſo euer he was. In the ſecond yeare of his reigne, king Henrie went to Yorke, and in that countrie tooke into his hands diuers caſtels which had béene long in poſſeſſion of priuate men; namelie, the caſtell of Scarborough, which William earle of Albemarle held, and now was conſtreined to reſigne it vp, full ſore againſt his will. This yeare William the kings eldeſt ſonne departed this life, and was buried at Reading. The realme of England was brought on all ſides into verie good quiet; but yer long, word came to K. Henrie, that his brother Geffrey had begun a rebellion on the other ſide of the ſea. For their father Geffrey (when he died) left thrée ſonnes behind him, Henrie, Geffrey, and William, ordeining by his teſtament, when Henrie ſhould haue gotten poſſeſſion of England and Normandie, that then the countrie of Anion ſhould remaine vnto Geffrey, and in the meane time, he to haue theſe thrée townes, Chinon, Lodun, and Mirabell, to mainteine his eſtate; and when the time came that the whole heritage ſhould fall vnto him, he might by poſſeſſion of theſe thrée haue a readier meane to come by all the reſt. Furthermore, fearing leaſt his eldeſt ſonne Henrie (who as then was abſent) would not conſent to the performance of this his will, he cauſed certeine biſhops and other of the Nobles to ſweare, that they ſhould not ſuffer his bodie to be committed to buriall, till his ſonnes had ſworne to fulfill his laſt will and teſtament in all other things, but eſpeciallie in this behalfe, wherin he iudged not amiſſe. For though Henrie was loth to take his oth, yet bicauſe his fathers bodie ſhould not remaine vnburied, he was contented to ſweare.

But after he had obteined the kingdome of England, his couetous deſire, increaſing ſtill with abundance alreadie obteined, found meanes to procure of pope Adrian the fourth (who was an Engliſhman borne) a diſpenſation for that oth: wherevpon (hauing got licence to depart from the office both of right, law and equitie) neglecting his fathers ordinance, he paſſed ouer into Normandie, and making war againſt his brother the ſaid Geffrey, eaſilie expelled him out of thoſe places, which were aſſigned him by bequeſt in his fathers teſtament, and ſo tooke the earledome of Anion into his owne poſſeſſion. Howbeit, he gaue vnto his ſaid brother a penſion of a thouſand pounds Engliſh, ⁊ two thouſand pounds of the monie of Anion, with the towne of Lodun, and certeine other lands to liue vpon; who neuertheleſſe thinking himſelfe euill vſed at the kings hands, rebelled and died.

¶ Here we haue to note the lacke of conſcience and religion, not onlie in the pretended ſucceſſor of Peter in giuing a diſpenſation for an oth, but alſo in his good ghoſtlie ſonne, who was no leſſe forward in reuolting from his oth, than the other was willing to acquite him from the force thereof. But if theſe men had beene profiting ſcholers in the vniuerſitie of the pagans, as they were arrand truants and ranke dullards in the ſchoole of chriſtians, they might haue learned by profane examples, that as oths are not to be raſhlie taken, ſo they are not to be vnaduiſedlie broken. Ouid. Met. lib. 3. fab. 8, 9, 10.

To ſignifie vnto vs, that as water is a verie ancient and excellent element, and ſo neceſſarie that without it the life of man cannot conſiſt; euen ſo we ought to eſtéeme of an oth, than the which we ſhould thinke nothing more religious, nothing more holie, nothing more chriſtian. Herevnto alſo tendeth the fable of the tranſmutation of mariners into dolphins for periurie: importing thus much for our inſtruction, that the breaking of an oth, in a caſe that may preiudice, procureth gréeuous puniſhments from God againſt them that ſo lewdlie doo offend. But ſuch is the impudencie of the pope, that he will not grant diſpenſations onlie for oths, but for inceſt, for treaſon, and for any other ſinne: which he may doo (as he boaſteth) by vertue of his abſolute and vniuerſall iuriſdiction: as we haue latelie in moſt lamentable ſort ſéene exemplified. But to the courſe of our ſtorie.

King Henrie goeth againſt the Scots.

He wan Carleil and Newcaſtell and others.

Shortlie after, when king Henrie had diſpatched his buſineſſe in Normandie, and made an end of troubles there betwixt him and his brother Geffrey, he returned into England, bicauſe he receiued aduertiſement, that Malcolme king of Scotland began to make war againſt his ſubiects that bordered next vnto him, wherevpon he haſted northwards: and comming firſt into Cumberland, he tooke the citie of Carleil, ſeizing all that countrie into his hands; and going after into Northumberland, he wan the towne of Newcaſtell, with the caſtell of Bamburg, and tooke into his poſſeſſion all that countrie which his mother the empreſſe had ſometimes granted vnto king Dauid, as before ye haue heard: howbeit, bicauſe he would not ſéeme to offer too much wrong, and be eſtéemed vnmindfull of former benefites receiued, he ſuffered king Malcolme to enioy the earledome of Huntington, which king Stephan had giuen vnto his father earle Henrie, ſonne to king Dauid, as before is partlie touched.

Theoderike earle of Flanders.

About this time Theodorike earle of Flanders (going with his wife vnto Ieruſalem) committed his ſonne Philip with all his lands, to the cuſtodie of the king of England. Hugh Bigot alſo reſigned his caſtels into the kings hands.

Rebellion of welſhmen.

The king inuadeth them.

But whileſt king Henrie was about (as before ye haue heard) to recouer and get backe the portions of his kingdome made away and diſmembred by his predeceſſors, he was informed that the Welſhmen raiſed a rebellion againſt him; to repreſſe whoſe attempts, he haſted forth with all diligence. Now at his firſt approch to their countrie, his ſouldiers being ſet vpon in the ſtraits, were verie fiercelie put back by the enimies, in ſomuch that a rumor ran how king Henrie was ſlaine, which puffed vp the Welſhmen men with no ſmall hope, and dawnted the Engliſhmen with great feare. In déed, diuerſe of the Engliſh nobilitie were ſlaine, and (amongſt others) Euſtace Fitz John, and Robert de Curcy, men of great honor and reputation.

Euſtace Fitz John, & Robert de Curcy ſlaine.

Thoſe which eſcaped in returning backe, not knowing that the king paſſed through the ſtraits without danger, declared to their fellowes that followed and were approching to the ſaid ſtraits, that (ſo farre as they knew) the king and all the reſidue were loſt. Theſe newes ſo diſcomforted the companies, that Henrie of Eſſex, which bare the kings ſtandard by right of inheritance, threw downe the ſame, and fled: which diſhonorable déed was afterward laid to his charge by one Robert de Mountfort, with whom (by order taken of the king) he fought a combat in triall of the quarrell, and was ouercome: but yet the king qualifieng the rigor of the iudgement by mercie pardoned his life, and appointed him to be a ſhorne moonke, and put into the abbey of Reading, taking his lands and poſſeſſions into his hands as forfeited: howbeit this combat was not tried till about the 9. yeare of this kings reigne.

Now the king, hearing that his armie was diſcomfited, came to his men, and ſhewing himſelfe to them with open viſage, greatlie reuiued the whole multitude, and then procéeding againſt the enimies, his people were afterwards more warie in looking to themſelues, inſomuch that at length (when the K. prepared to inuade the Welſhmen both by water & land) they ſought to him for peace, and wholie ſubmitted themſelues vnto his grace and mercie.

The welſhmen ſubmit themſelues.

About the ſame time, king Henrie builded the caſtell of Rutland, the caſtell of Baſingwerke, and one houſe alſo of Templers. In the moneth of September alſo this yeare, the kings third ſonne was borne at Oxenford, & named Richard. This yeare was Thomas Becket preferred to be the kings Chancellor. The king holding his Chriſtmas at Worceſter in great royaltie, ſat in the church at ſeruice, with his crowne on his head, as the kings vſed in thoſe daies to doo on ſolemne feaſts: but as ſoone as maſſe was ended, he tooke his crowne from his head, and ſet it downe vpon the altar in ſigne of humblenes, ſo that he neuer after paſſed for the wearing of a crowne. The ſame yeare alſo the king altered his coine, abrogating certeine péeces called baſels.

In the moneth of Auguſt he went ouer into Normandie, and came to an enteruiew with the French king néere to the riuer of Eata, where they intreated of a league, and of a marriage, which was after agréed vpon, betwixt Henrie the ſonne of king Henrie; and the ladie Margaret, daughter to the French king: at which time Thomas Becket (then being the kings chancellor) was ſent to Paris in great araie to fetch hir: who among other furnitures had nine long charrets (as Matthew Paris writeth.) Now when this ladie was deliuered to Thomas Becket the lord chancellor, and brought from Paris, ſhe was appointed from thenceforth to remaine in the houſe of Robert de Newburge, a Noble man of great honor, vntill ſuch time as the mariage ſhould be ſolemnized.

After the two kings were departed in ſunder, K. Henrie prepared an armie againſt Conan duke of Britaine, who had ſeized the citie of Naunts into his hands, after the deceaſe of Geffrey the kings brother, who was earle of Naunts. At length, the ſame Conan perceiuing himſelfe not able to reſiſt the king of England, vpon the daie of the feaſt of ſaint Michaell the archangell came to king Henrie, and ſurrendred the citie of Naunts into his hands, with all the whole countrie therevnto belonging. Soone after which reſignation, and vpon the 24. of Auguſt, Geffrey the kings fourth ſonne was borne of his wife quéene Elianor.

In December following, Theobald earle of Blois was accorded with king Henrie, to deliuer to him two of his caſtels. Likewiſe Petroke earle of Perch ſurrendred two caſtels vnto king Henrie, which he had vſurped of the demeanes of Normandie in the daies of king Stephan: one of which caſtels the king gaue him againe, receiuing homage of him for the ſame.

Moreouer king Henrie and Raimond earle of Barzelone met togither at Blaime, where they concluded a league by waie of allegiance, ſo that Richard the ſonne of king Henrie ſhould take to wife the daughter of the ſaid Raimond in time conuenient; and that the king of England ſhould giue vnto the ſaid Richard the duchie of Aquitane, & the countie of Poictow. This earle Raimond had married the daughter and heire of the king of Aragon.

In the meane time, a ſecret grudge that had long depended betwéene king Henrie and king Lewes of France did ſtill continue, and though there was a friendſhip agréed betwéene them (as ye haue heard) to haue extinguiſhed the ſame; yet was it but a fained friendſhip: for vpon euerie new occaſion they were readie to breake againe, as it came to paſſe ſhortlie after.

A fained friendſhip. William duke of Aquitane.

William duke of Aquitane, grandfather to quéene Elianor, married the daughter and heire of the earle of Tholouze, and going vnto the warres of the holie land, he engaged that earledome vnto Raimond the earle of ſaint Giles, and died before he could returne. His ſonne William, father to quéene Elianor, ſuffered his earledome to remaine ſtill vnredéemed, either for want of ſufficiencie, or through negligence and careleſneſſe: ſo that the earle of ſaint Giles kéeping poſſeſſion thereof vnto his dieng daie, left it to his ſonne Raimond, who inioyed it likewiſe. Now when king Lewes (hauing married the foreſaid Elianor) demanded reſtitution as in the right of his wife, earle Raimond flatlie at the firſt denied to reſtore it, but after conſidering his lacke of power to reſiſt the kings puiſſance, he plied the K. with humble petitions, and ſo preuailed by faire words, that in the end king Lewes granted him his ſiſter Conſtance in marriage (which Conſtance, as ye haue heard, was married before vnto Euſtace the ſonne of king Stephan) & with hir granted him libertie to reteine the earldome of Tholouze as it were by waie of endowment: whereto the other accorded. Howbeit king Henrie hauing maried the foreſaid quéene Elianor, after the diuorſe had betwixt hir and king Lewes, made claime to the ſaid countie of Tholouze in the right of his wife. Herevpon earle Raimond, truſting now to the aid of his brother in law king Lewes, denied to reſtore it; ſo that king Henrie determined to recouer it by force, and entring by and by into Gaſcoine with an armie, he drew towards the countrie of Tholouze, & began to inuade the ſame with great force and courage.

The earle hearing of king Henries comming with an armie, was put in great feare, and therevpon wrote letters to his brother in law king Lewes, requiring him with all ſpéed poſſible to come vnto his aid. King Lewes vpon receipt of the letters, & vnderſtanding the preſent danger of the earle, made ſuch haſt in continuing his iournie both daie and night, that he came to Tholouze, before king Henrie could arriue there. Which when king Henrie vnderſtood, and perceiued how he was preuented, he changed his purpoſe of beſieging the citie, and fell to ſpoiling of the countrie thereabouts: at which time he recouered certaine places that latelie before had reuolted from his gouernment, & (amongſt the reſt) the citie of Cahors, which he furniſhed with men, munition and vittels, appointing his chancellor Thomas Becket to the cuſtodie and kéeping thereof: he fortified other places alſo which he had gotten, placing capteines and men of warre to looke vnto the defenſe of the ſame. Whileſt the king was thus abrode on his iournie in the parties of Aquitaine, William earle of Bullongne and Mortaine the ſonne of king Stephan, and Haimon earle of Gloceſter departed this life, which two earles went thither with him.

Finallie, when he had ſet things at a ſtaie in thoſe parties, he returned towards Normandie, and comming to the citie of Toures, he gáue the order of knighthood vnto Malcolme king of Scotland, and ſo in the moneth of October he came backe into Normandie, and there augmenting his armie with new ſupplies, entred into the countie of Beauuoiſin, burned manie villages in the ſame, and deſtroied the ſtrong caſtell of Gerberie, except one turret, which his ſouldiers could not take, by reaſon of the fire and ſmoke which ſtaied and kept them from it. Moreouer, Simon earle of Auranches deliuered vnto king Henrie ſuch fortreſſes as he held in France, as Rochfort, Montfort, and ſuch like, which was no ſmall diſcommoditie and inconuenience to the French king, bicauſe the gariſons placed in thoſe fortreſſes impeached the paſſage betwixt Paris and Orleance. About the ſame time came certeine Dutchmen of the ſort called Valdoies ouer into this realme, to the number of thirtie or more, who held opinions in religion contrarie to the faith of the Romane church, for (as one author affirmeth) they which firſt ſpred the opinions which theſe men held, came from Gaſcoigne, and preuailed ſo greatlie in ſetting foorth their doctrine, that they mightilie increaſed through the large regions of Spaine, France, Italie, and Germanie: ſimple men (God wote) they were for the moſt part, as is written of them, and of no quicke capacitie. Howbeit, thoſe which at this time came ouer into England, were indifferentlie well learned, and their principall or ringleader was named Gerard. Now alſo was a councell aſſembled at Oxford, whereat theſe dogmatiſts were examined vpon certeine points of their profeſſion. The forſaid Gerard vndertaking to anſwere for them all, proteſted that they were good chriſtians, and had the doctrine of the apoſtles in all reuerence. Moreouer, being examined what they thought of the ſubſtance of the godhead and the merits of Chriſt, they anſwered rightlie, and to the point; but being further examined vpon other articles of the religion then receiued, they ſwarued from the church, and namelie, in the vſe of the diuine ſacraments, derogating ſuch grace from the ſame, as the church by hir authoritie had then aſcribed thereto. To conclude, they would in no wiſe renounce their opinions, in ſomuch that they were condemned, burned in the forhead with an hot iron, and in the cold ſeaſon of winter ſtripped naked from the girdle ſtéed vpward, and ſo whipped out of the towne; with proclamation made, that no man ſhould be ſo hardie as to receiue them into any houſe, relieue them with meat, drinke, or any other kind of meanes: wherevpon it fell out in fine that they were ſtarued to death through cold and hunger: howbeit in this their affliction they ſéemed to reioiſe, in that they ſuffered for Gods cauſe, as they made account.

King Henrie, ſhortlie after the marriage was conſummate betwixt his ſonne & the French kings daughter, got into his hands the caſtell of Giſors, with two other caſtels, ſituate vpon the riuer of Eata in the confines of Normandie and France. For it was accorded betwixt the two kings, that when the marriage ſhould be finiſhed, king Henrie ſhould haue thoſe thrée caſtels, bicauſe they apperteined to Normandie; in the meane time, the ſame caſtels were deliuered into the hands of Robert de Poiron, Toſtes de Saint Omer, and Robert Haſtings, thrée knights templers, who vpon the conſummation of the marriages before ſaid, and according to the truſt committed to them, ſurrendred the poſſeſſion of the ſaid caſtels into the hands of king Henrie.

But the French king was not a little moued, for that king Henrie had ſeized vpon them without his licence, in ſo much that he raiſed a power of armed men, and ſent them into Normandie, where they had one cruell conflict aboue the reſt with the Normans, till the night parted them in ſunder, by meane whereof the Frenchmen withdrew to Chaumount, and the Romans to Giſors. The next daie, as the Frenchmen came foorth againe, purpoſing to haue won Giſors, they were beaten backe by the Normans, who iſſued out of the towne to ſkirmiſh with them. Thus was the warre renewed betwixt theſe two princes; and by ſetting on of Theobald earle of Blois, the matter grew to that point, that the Engliſh and French powers comming foorthwith into the field, and marching one againſt an other, they approched ſo néere togither, that battell was preſentlie looked for, firſt in Veulgeſſine, and after in the territorie of Dune; but yet in the end ſuch order was taken betwixt them, that their armies brake vp.

Matth. Paris.

About this time the king called a parlement at Weſtminſter, to treat of matters concerning the commonwealth, wherein great diſcord aroſe betwixt the king & archbiſhop Becket, about certeine points touching the liberties of the church. For the king hauing an earneſt zeale vnto iuſtice, and commanding the iudges to puniſh offenders without reſpect, vnderſtood by their information, that manie things by them of the ſpiritualtie (againſt whome their authoritie might not be extended) were committed contrarie to common order: as theft, rapine, murther, and manſlaughter; in ſo much that in his preſence it was made notorious, that ſith the beginning of his reigne, aboue an hundred manſlaughters had beene committed within his realme of England by preeſts and men of religious orders. Herevpon being moued in mind, he ſet forth lawes againſt the ſpiritualtie, wherein he ſhewed his zeale of iuſtice. For as the cauſe proceeded from the biſhops of that age, ſo did the fault alſo, ſith contrarie to their owne canons they permitted preeſts to liue ouer licentiouſlie without due correction, ſtudieng onelie to mainteine the liberties and immunities of the church, and not to reforme the irregularitie of the regulars. Of this crew was one Philip de Broc, a canon of Bedford, who being arreigned before the kings iuſticer for a murther, vttered diſdainefull words againſt the ſame iuſticer: which when he could not denie before the archbiſhop, he was depriued of his prebend, and baniſhed the land for two yeares ſpace.

ning alreadie ſet downe ſuch orders as ſhould bridle the ſpiritualtie from their wicked doings, thought that if he might get them confirmed in parlement by conſent of the biſhops and clergie, then the ſame ſhould take place and be receiued for lawes. Wherefore he earneſtlie required at this parlement, that it might be enacted againſt all ſuch of the ſpiritualtie, as ſhould be taken and conuicted for any heinous offenſe, they ſhould looſe the priuiledge of the church, and be deliuered vnto the ciuill magiſtrate, who ſhould ſee them ſuffer execution for their offenſes, in like maner as he might any of the kings ſubiects being laie men. For otherwiſe the king alledged, that they would boldlie preſume to doo much more miſchiefe, if after eccleſiaſticall diſcipline, no ſecular correction ſhould follow. And likelie it was that they would paſſe but little for their diſgrading and loſſe of their order, who in contempt of their calling would not abſteine from committing moſt miſchieuous abhominations and hainous enormities.

The king offended with the biſhops.

Unto theſe reaſons thus proponed by the king (to haue his purpoſe take effect) the archbiſhop and his ſuffragans, with the reſt of the biſhops, anſwered verie pithilie, labouring to proue that it was more againſt the liberties of the church, than that they might with reaſon well allow. Whervpon the king being moued exceedinglie againſt them, demanded whether they would obſerue his roiall lawes and cuſtomes, which the archbiſhops and biſhops in the time of his grandfather did hold and obeie or not? Whervnto they made anſwere, that they would obſerue them, Saluo ordine ſuo, Their order in all things ſaued. But the king being highlie offended with ſuch exceptions, vrged the matter ſo, that he would haue them to take their oth abſolutely, & without all exceptions, but they would none of that. At length he departed from London in verie great diſpleaſure with the biſhops, hauing firſt taken from the archbiſhop Thomas all the offices and dignities which he enioied ſince his firſt being created chancellor.

Howbeit, after this, manie of the biſhops ſeeing wherevnto this broile would grow, began to ſhrinke from the archbiſhop, and inclined to the king. But the archbiſhop ſtood ſtiflie in his opinion, and would not bend at all, till at length not onelie his ſuffragans the biſhops, but alſo the biſhop of Liſeux (who came ouer to doo ſome good in the matter) and the abbat of Elemoſina (who was ſent from the pope) perſuaded him to agree to the kings will, in ſo much that being ouercome at laſt with the earneſt ſuit of his freends, he came firſt to Woodſtocke, and there promiſed the king to obſerue his lawes, Bona fide, Faithfullie, and without all colluſion or deceit.

A councell at Clarendon.

Ger.Dor.

Shortlie after, in the feaſt of S. Hilarie, a councell was holden at Clarendon, whereto the archbiſhop, and in manner all the lords ſpirituall and temporall of the land made their repaire. Here the archbiſhop would haue willinglie ſtarted from his promiſe, if firſt the biſhops, and after the earles of Leiceſter and Cornewall, Robert and Reignald (which Reignald was vncle to the king) and laſtlie two knights templers, had not moued him to yeeld to the kings will. But (among the reſt) theſe two knights, namelie Richard de Haſtings, and Hoſteus de Bologne were verie earneſt with him, & at length preuailed, though not for conſcience of dutie, wherewith he ſhould haue beene touched; yet with feare of danger, which (by refuſing to ſatiſfie the kings will) he ſhould haue brought not onelie vpon himſelfe, but alſo vpon the the other biſhops there preſent.

These knights ſeemed to lament his caſe, as if alreadie they had ſeene naked ſwords ſhaken about his eares. And indeed, certeine of the kings ſeruants that attended vpon his perſon after the manner of a gard, went to and fro, ruſhing vp and downe the chambers, ſhaking their bright battell axes readie appointed, and looking as if they would forthwith run vpon the biſhops. Whervpon the archbiſhop being touched with remorſe, and ſeeming to ſtriue againſt his determinat purpoſe, conſented to obey the kings pleaſure, and ſo promiſed in the word of a preeſt, ſwering furthermore, that he would obſerue the kings lawes and cuſtomes, without expreſſing theſe words, Saluo ordine meo, Mine order ſaued, which he had vſed before. The like oth did all the biſhops take. But the archbiſhop refuſed at that time to ſeale to the writing that conteined the articles of the oth which he ſhould haue obſerued, requiring as it were a time to conſider of them, ſith in ſo weightie a matter nothing ought to be doone without good and deliberate aduice, wherefore he tooke with him a copie thereof, and ſo did the archbiſhop of Yorke an other, and the third remained with the king.

Matt. Paris.

The archbiſhop Becket receiueth an oth.

He repenteth him in that he had receiued an oth.

Matth. Paris.

Shortlie after, the archbiſhop conſidering further of this oth which he had taken, repented himſelfe greeuouſlie therof, in ſo much that he abſteined from ſaieng of maſſe, till he had by confeſſion and fruits of penance (as ſaith Matth. Paris) obteined abſolution of the pope. For addreſſing and ſending out meſſengers with all ſpeed vnto the pope, with a certificat of the whole matter as it laie, he required to be aſſoiled of the bond which he had vnaduiſedlie entred into. This ſuit was ſoone granted, in ſo much that the pope directed his eſpeciall letters vnto him, conteining the ſame abſolution in verie ample and large manner, as Matth. Paris dooth report it. And thus began a new broile.

The archbiſhop Becket would haue fled out of the realme.

The archbiſhop in the meane time, perceiuing that the liberties of the church were now not onelie embezelled, but in maner extinguiſhed, and being loth to make any further attempt againſt his former dealings, would now (without the kings knowledge) haue departed the realme, wherevpon comming to Romnie, he tooke ſhipping, to haue paſſed ouer into France, and ſo to haue gone to the popes court. But by a contrarie wind he was brought backe into England, and thereby fell further into the kings diſpleaſure than before, in ſo much that, whereas an action was commenſed againſt him of late for a manor, which the archbiſhops of Canturburie had of long time held: now the matter was ſo vſed, that the archbiſhop loſt the manor, and was moreouer condemned to paie the arrerages, and thus his troubles increaſed euen through his owne malapertneſſe and braineſickneſſe; whereas all theſe tumults might haue beene compoſed and laid aſleepe, if he had beene wiſe, peaceable, patient, and obedient. For,

The archbiſhop cited to appeare at Northampton.

R Houed.

Sentence giuen againſt the archbiſhop.

In the end, the archbiſhop was cited to appeere before the king at Northampton, where the king vſed him ſomewhat roughlie, placing his horſſes at his Inne, and laid diſobedience to his charge, for that he did not perſonallie appeare at a certeine place before his highneſſe, vpon ſummons giuen vnto him for the ſame purpoſe. Wherevnto though the archbiſhop alledged that he had ſent thither a ſufficient deputie to make anſwere for him; yet could he not be ſo excuſed, but was found giltie, and his goods confiſcat to the kings pleaſure.

Now when the archbiſhop heard that ſentence was in ſuch wiſe pronounced againſt him; What maner ,, of iudgement (ſaith he) is this? Though I hold my ,, peace, yet the age that ſhall hereafter follow, will not ,, hide it in ſilence; for ſithens the world began, it hath ,, not beene heard, that any archbiſhop of Canturburie ,, hath beene iudged in any of the king of Englands ,, courts for any maner of cauſe; partlie in regard of the dignitie and authoritie of his office, and partlie bicauſe he is ſpiritualllie the father of the king and all his people. This is therefore a new forme and order of iudgement, that the archbiſhop ſhould be iudged by his ſuffragans, or the father by his ſons.

The archbiſh. condemned in fiue hundred markes.

The next daie the king required of him the repaiment of fiue hundred marks, which he had lent him when he was chancellor. Now although he affirmed that he receiued the ſame by waie of gift, and not by waie of lone; yet bicauſe he confeſſed the receit, he was condemned in that debt, forſomuch as he could not proue the title of the gift.

An aſſemblie of biſhops.

The archbiſh. called to an account.

☛ On the morrow after, the archbiſhop with his fellow biſhops being ſet in councell, by commandement of the king (& the dores faſt locked that they ſhould not get out) this was proponed againſt the archbiſhop, that whereas he held certeine biſhops ſées as then vacant, with abbeies, and other reuenues of his ſouereigne lord the king in his hands, and had made none account to him for the ſame of long time; the king required now to be anſwered at his hands, and that with all ſpéed, for he would haue no delaie. The ſumme amounted to thirtie thouſand markes.

When the archbiſhop had heard the variable ſentences of the biſhops in this caſe, he anſwered after this maner: I would (ſaid he) ſpeake with two earles which are about the king, and named them. Who being called, and the dores ſet open, he ſaid vnto them; We haue not héere at this preſent to ſhew whereby the thing may be more manifeſt: therefore we aſke reſpit for anſwer till to morrow. The councell therefore brake vp, and the multitude of people, which came with the archbiſhop thither, being afraid of the kings diſpleaſure, fell from him. Wherefore he cauſed his ſeruants to fetch a great number of poore and impotent people to his lodging, ſaieng that by the ſeruice of ſuch men of warre, a more ſpéedie victorie in ſhort ſpace might be gotten, than by them which in time of temptation ſhamefullie drew backe. Herevpon his houſe was filled full, and the tables ſet with ſuch as his ſeruants had brought in, out of the lanes and ſtreats abroad.

The biſhops perſuade the archbiſhop to ſubmit himſelfe to yͤ kings pleaſure.

Vpon the tueſdaie, the biſhops all amazed and full of care, came vnto him; and bicauſe of the diſpleaſure which the king had conceiued againſt him, counſelled him to ſubmit himſelfe to the kings will, or elſe in fine, they told him plainelie, that he would be iudged a periured perſon; bicauſe he had ſworne vnto the king as to his earthlie ſouereigne, touching all temporall honor in life, lim, and member; and namelie to obſerue all his roiall lawes and cuſtomes, which of late he had eſtabliſhed.

The archbiſh. anſwer to his brethren.

He appealeth to the church of Rome.

Wherevnto he anſwered: My brethren, ye ſée how the world roreth againſt me, and the enimie riſeth vp, but I more lament that the ſonnes of my mother fight againſt me. If I ſhould hold my peace, yet would the world come to declare how ye leaue me alone in the battell, and haue iudged againſt me now theſe two daies paſt, I being your father, though neuer ſo much a ſinner. But I command you by vertue of your obedience, and vpon perill of your order, that you be not preſent in any place of iudgement, where my perſon may fortune to be adiudged: in teſtimonie whereof I appeale to our mother the church of Rome. Furthermore, if it chance that temporall men laie their hands vpon me, I charge you likewiſe by vertue of your obedience, that ye exerciſe the cenſures of the church in the behalfe of your father the archbiſhop as it becommeth you. This one thing know ye well, that the world roreth, the fleſh trembleth and is weake, but I (by Gods grace) will not ſhrinke, nor leaue the flocke committed vnto me.

He goeth to the court.

After this he entred into the church, and celebrated the maſſe of ſaint Stephan (otherwiſe than he was accuſtomed to doo) with his pall: which being ended, he put on his ſacrificing veſtures, with a cope vpon them all, and ſo went to the court. Furthermore, bicauſe he was afraid, he receiued the ſacrament ſecretlie with him, and bearing the croſſe in his right hand, and the reine of his bridell in his left, he came in that order to the court, where he alighted, and entred the place, ſtill bearing the croſſe himſelfe, till he came to the kings chamber doore, the other biſhops following him with great feare and trembling. Now being come thither, the biſhop of Hereford would gladlie haue taken the croſſe, and haue borne it before him, but he would not ſuffer him, ſaieng: It is moſt reaſon that I ſhould beare it my ſelfe, vnder the defenſe whereof I may remaine in ſafetie: and beholding this enſigne, I néed not doubt vnder what prince I ſerue.

He is reputed a traitour.

The biſhops diſallow their archbiſhop.

At length, when the king had exhibited great complaints vnto them all generallie againſt him, they cried that he was a traitor, ſith he had receiued ſo manie benefits at the kings hands, and now refuſed to doo him all earthlie honor as he had ſworne to doo. To be ſhort, when the biſhops came to ſit vpon the matter in councell, they appealed to the ſée of Rome againſt the archbiſhop, accuſing him of periurie: and in the word of truth bound themſelues by promiſe, to doo what they might to depoſe him, if the king would pardon them of that iudgement which now hanged ouer the archbiſhops head. Then comming to the archbiſhop they ſaid: Thou waſt ſometime our archbiſhop, and we were bound to obeie thée: but ſith thou haſt ſworne fealtie to the king, that is, life, member, and earthlie honour, & to obſerue his lawes and cuſtomes, and now goeſt about to deſtroie the ſame, we ſay that thou art guiltie of periurie, and we will not from henceforth obey a periured archbiſhop. Therefore we cite thée by appellation to appeare before the pope, there to anſwer thine accuſors. Then they appointed him a day, in which they ment to proſecute their appeale. I heare you well (ſaid the archbiſhop.)

The princes and péeres of the realme did alſo iudge him a periured perſon and a traitour. Among whome (manie then being preſent) the earle of Leiceſter accompanied with Reignald earle of Cornewall, came vnto him and ſaid; The king commanded thée to come and render an accompt of that which is obiected againſt thée, or elſe heare thy iudgement. Iudgement? ſaid the archbiſhop, [and therewith riſing vp ſaid,] Naie ſonne earle, firſt heare thou: It is not vnknowne to thée how faithfull I haue béene to the king, in conſideration whereof he aduanced me to the archbiſhops ſée againſt my will (as God can be my iudge:) for I knew mine owne infirmitie, and I was contented to take it vpon me rather for his pleaſure, than for Gods cauſe, and therfore doth God both withdraw himſelfe and the king from me. In the time of mine election he made me frée, and diſcharged me of all courtlie bondage. Wherefore as touching thoſe things from which I am frée and deliuered, I am not bound to anſwer, neither will I. So much as the ſoule is more worth than the bodie, ſo much the more art thou bound to obeie God and me, rather than any earthlie creature. Neither will law nor reaſon permit, that the ſonnes ſhould iudge or condemne the father: and therefore I refuſe to ſtand to the iudgement either of the king, or of any other, and appeale to the pope, by whome (vnder God) I ought to be iudged, referring all that I haue vnto Gods protection and his, and vnder the defenſe of his authoritie I depart out of this place. Hauing thus ſpoken, went incontinent to take horſſe.

Now as he paſſed on his waie, the kings ſeruants and others of the court did caſt out manie reprochfull words againſt him, calling him traitor and falſe forſworne caitife. At which words turning himſelfe, and looking backe with a ſterne countenance he ſaid; That if it were not for his order of prieſthood, and that it were lawfull for him, he would ſuerlie cleere himſelfe of periurie and treaſon, in defending and mainteining his cauſe againſt them with weapon in hand.

When he was come to the vtter gate, he found the ſame faſt locked, whereat they began all to be amazed: but one of his ſeruants eſpieng where a bunch of keies tied to a clubs end were hanging on a pin, he tooke them down, ⁊ tried which was the right key, by proofe whereof he found it at the laſt, opened the gate, and let the archbiſhop out, the porters ſtanding ſtill as men amazed, and ſpeaking not one word againſt it.

Now when he was got out, a great number of poore, weake and impotent people met him, ſaieng: Bleſſed be God, which hath deliuered his ſeruant from the face of his enimie. Thus with a great rout or companie, and with the clergie, he was honorablie conueied to the abbeie of S. Andrews: and looking behind and before him, as he paſſed thitherward, he ſaid vnto thoſe that went with him; How glorious a proceſſion doth bring me from the face of the enimie? Suffer all the poore people to come into the place, that we may make merie togither in the Lord. Hauing thus ſpoken the people had entrance, ſo that all the hall, parlours, and chambers being furniſhed with tables and ſtooles, they were conuenientlie placed, and ſerued with vittels to the full.

The verie ſame night before the cockcrowing he iſſued forth by a little poſterne gate, and taking with him onelie two monks of the Ciſteaux order, the one named Robert Canne, and the other S. Cayman, with one of his owne ſeruants called Roger de Broc, he fled awaie diſguiſed in a white veſture and a monks coule, and changing his name, cauſed himſelfe to be called Dereman, ⁊ iourneied ſtill all the night, and by daie laie cloſe in one freends houſe or other; till at laſt he got to Sandwich, and there taking ſhip, he ſailed ouer into Flanders, and ſo went to France, where at the citie of Sens he found pope Alexander, into whoſe boſome he emptied whole cart lodes of complaints and greeuances.

The king vpon knowledge that the archbiſhop was fled the realme, ſent Gilbert Follioth biſhop of London, and William earle of Arundell in ſpeedie ambaſſage to the king of France, to ſignifie vnto him the whole matter and circumſtance of the falling out betwixt him and the archbiſhop, requiring him not to receiue the archbiſhop into his realme, but this requeſt was little regarded of the French king, as appeared: for the archbiſhops cauſe was fauoured of manie, and the blame imputed to king Henrie, ſo that the archbiſhop found great grace with the French king, and no ſmall fauour at the hands of the pope.

Now when king Henrie heard that he was accuſed by the archbiſhop vnto the pope, he appointed Roger archbiſhop of Yorke, the foreſaid Gilbert biſhop of London, Hilarius biſhop of Chicheſter, Roger biſhop of Worceſter, Bartholomew biſhop of Exceſter, with diuerſe biſhops, deanes, archdeacons, ⁊ other learned men of good accompt, to the number of 15. to paſſe in ambaſſage vnto the pope, that they might excuſe his doings, and burden the archbiſhop with the note of rebellion, whereof he had good proofe.

Being admitted to declare their meſſage in the conſiſtorie before the pope, they opened the whole circumſtance of the matter, from the beginning to the end, declaring that betwixt Thomas the archbiſhop of Canturburie and the king there was a controuerſie moued, and by both their conſents a daie appointed for the hearing and determining thereof, as iuſtice ſhould require. At the which daie (by the kings commandement) all the cheefeſt lords of the realme both ſpirituall and temporall were aſſembled, to the end that the more generall the meeting ſhould be, the more manifeſt might the diſcouerie of the fraud and malice of the archbiſhop appeere.

with others, are ſent to the pope.

At the daie appointed (ſaie they) there came before the catholike prince his preſence, the Nobles of his realme: and amongſt other, the archbiſhop the diſquieter both of the kingdome ⁊ church, who (as one not well aſſured of the qualitie of his owne deſeruings) bleſſed himſelfe with the ſigne of the croſſe at his comming into the court, as though he ſhould haue come before ſome tyrant or ſchiſmaticall perſon. Notwithſtanding all which contemptuous and ambitious behauiour, the kings maieſtie was nothing offended, but committed the iudgement of his cauſe to the faithfull order of the biſhops, meaning ſo to deliuer himſelfe of all ſuſpicion of wrong dealing. Then it reſted in the biſhops hands to make an end of the controuerſie, and to ſet a finall vnion and agreement betwixt them. But the archbiſhop would none of that, alleging how it ſhould be a derogation to the ſee apoſtolike and his metropoliticall dignitie, to ſtand before the king in iudgement, or anie other temporall magiſtrate. And albeit (ſaie they) ſome diminution or eclipſe might haue chanced to the dignitie of the church by that iudgement, yet it had beene his part to haue diſſembled the matter for the time, to the end that peace might haue beene reſtored to the church. He further obiected (aſcribing to himſelfe the name of father, which ſeemed to ſauour ſomewhat of arrogancie) that the children ought not to come togither to iudge the fathers cauſe, but it had beene far more neceſſarie that the humbleneſſe of the ſons ſhould mitigate the pride and temper the ambition of the father.

To conclude, the kings ambaſſadors made earneſt ſuit, that two legats might be ſent from the pope, to haue the hearing ⁊ diſcuſſing of all the matter betwixt the king and the archbiſhop without any other appealing. But the kings tale could not be heard in that court, the archbiſhop hauing alreadie perſuaded the pope to the contrarie. For comming to the pope, he vttered his complaint as followeth:

The kings tale could not be heard.

The archbiſhop Becket. Matt.Paris.

Moſt holie father, I doo here come for ſuccour to your audience, lamenting that the ſtate of the church, and the liberties thereof are brought to ruine by the couetous dealing of kings and princes. Wherfore when I thought to reſiſt the diſeaſe approching, I was ſuddenlie called before the king, to render accompts as a laie man about certeine wards, for whom (while I was the kings chancellor) I had notwithſtanding giuen accounts; and alſo, when I was made biſhop, and entred into the dignitie of ruling the archbiſhops ſee, I was releaſed and diſcharged of all reckonings and bonds by the kings eldeſt ſonne, and by the cheefe iuſticer of the realme: ſo that now, where I looked to haue found aid, I was deſtitute thereof, to my great hinderance and vexation. Conſider furthermore (I praie you) how my lords and brethren the biſhops are readie at the pleaſure of the Noble men of the court to giue ſentence againſt me, ſo that all men being about to run vpon me, I was almoſt oppreſſed: and therfore am now come as it were to take breath in the audience of your clemencie, which doth not forſake your children in their extreme neceſſitie, before whom I here ſtand, readie to declare and teſtifie that I am not to be iudged there,

This example therefore once ſprong vp, might giue an occaſion to manie enormities to follow. The biſhops doo ſay, Thoſe things that are Ceſars, ought to be reſtored to Ceſar. But admit that in manie things the king is to be obeied, is he therefore to be obeied in things wherein he is no king? For thoſe belong not to Ceſar, but to a tyrant. Wherein if for my ſake they would not, yet ought the biſhops for their owne ſakes to haue reſiſted him. For what ſhould be the cauſe of ſuch deadlie and vnnaturall hatred, that to deſtroie me, they ſhould deſtroie themſelues? Therefore whileſt for temporall things they neglect ſpirituall, they faile in both. Weigh then moſt holie father, my fléeing awaie, and my perſecution, and how for your ſake I haue béene prouoked with iniuries, vſe your rigour, conſtraine them to amendement, through whoſe motion this hath chanced; let them not be borne out by the king, who is rather the obſtinate miniſter, than the finder out of this practiſe.

The popes anſwer to the archbiſhop.

The pope hauing heard his words, tooke deliberation in the matter, with the aduice of his cardinals, and therevpon anſwered the archbiſhop in effect as followeth: That the lower power may not iudge the higher, and chéefelie him whome he is bound to obeie, all the lawes both of God and man doo witneſſe, and the ordinances of the ancient fathers doo manifeſtlie declare: Herevpon we (to whome it apperteineth to reforme diſorders) doo clearelie reuerſe and make void the iudgement pronounced againſt you by the barons and biſhops, whereby as well againſt the order of law, as againſt the cuſtomes of the church, your goods were adiudged forfeit, whereas the ſame goods were not yours, but the churches of Canturburie, ouer which you haue the onelie cure and charge. But if thoſe that haue violentlie entred vpon the poſſeſſions and goods of your church, and haue thereby wronged either you or yours, will not vpon admonition giuen to them, make reſtitution with ſufficient amends, then may you (if you ſhall thinke conuenient) exerciſe eccleſiaſticall iuſtice vpon them, and we ſhall allow of that which you ſhall reaſonablie doo in that behalfe. Howbeit as touching the king himſelfe we will not giue you any ſpeciall commandement, neither yet doo we take from you any right belonging to your biſhoplike office, which you receiued at your conſecration. But the king onlie we will ſpare, and exempt from your excommunications and cenſures. After theſe and manie by-matters were ouerpaſſed, the archbiſhop reſigned his pall vnto the pope, but the pope gaue it him againe, and appointed him to remaine at Pountney an abbeie of monks Ciſteaux in the dioceſſe of Auxerre, till the variance were brought to ſome good end betwixt the king and him. This was done in the yeare of our Lord 1164.

The archbiſh. reſigneth his pall.

The king hauing knowledge by his ambaſſadors what anſwer the pope had made, became gréeuouſlie offended in his mind, and therevpon confiſcated all the goods that belonged to the archbiſhop and his complices, and ſeized their reuenues into his hands, appointing one Randall de Broc to haue the cuſtodie of all that belonged to the ſée, which Broc was nothing fréendlie to the archbiſhop, being his knowne enimie of old, but fauoured the monkes, and would not ſuffer that they ſhould take wrong or diſpleaſure at any hand.

In the yeare 1165. quéene Elianor was deliuered of a daughter which was named Ioane. Alſo on the 26. day of Ianuarie, there chanced a maruellous earthquake in Northfolke, in the Ile of Elie, and in Suffolke, ſo that men as they ſtood on the ground were ouerthrowne therewith, and buildings ſo ſhaken, that the belles in ſtéeples knolled: the like had alſo chanced in the Aduent ſeaſon then laſt before paſſed.

The welſhmen make war on the Engliſh marſhes.

The Welſhmen this yeare ſpoiled a great part of thoſe countries that bordered vpon them: wherewith the king being ſore moued, leuied an armie with all ſpéed as well of Engliſhmen as ſtrangers, and (without regard of difficulties and dangers) did go againſt the rebels, and finding them withdrawne into their ſtarting holes (I meane the woods and ſtrait paſſages) he compaſſed the ſame about in verie forceable maner. The Welſhmen perceiuing themſelues now to be brought into ſuch ieopardie, as that they could not well deuiſe how to eſcape the ſame, conſulted what was beſt to be doone. After conſultation, caſting awaie their weapons, they came foorth to the king, aſking mercie; which ſomewhat hardlie they obteined. Few of them were executed in compariſon of the numbers that offended: but yet the capteines and chéefe authors of this rebellion were ſo puniſhed, that it was thought they would neuer haue preſumed ſo raſhlie to offend him in like ſort againe. For (as ſome writers affirme) he did iuſtice on the ſonnes of Rice or Rées, & alſo on the ſonnes and daughters of other noble men that were his complices verie rigorouſlie: cauſing the eies of the yoong ſtriplings to be pecked out of their heads, and their noſes to be cut off or ſlit: and the eares of the yoong gentlewomen to be ſtuffed.

The ſeuere puniſhment vſed by king Henry againſt the welſhmen.

But yet I find in other authors, that in this iournie king Henrie did not greatlie preuaile againſt his enimies, but rather loſt manie of his men of warre, both horſſemen and footmen: for by his ſeuere procéeding againſt them, he rather made them more eger to ſéeke reuenge, than quieted them in any tumult. They tooke the caſtell of Cardigan, and in beſieging of Briges, the king was in no ſmall danger of his life: for one of the enimies ſhooting directlie at him, had perſed him through the bodie, if Hubert de Saint Clere coneſtable of Colcheſter, perceiuing the arrow comming, had not thruſt himſelfe betwixt the king and the ſame arrow, and ſo preſeruing his maiſter, receiued the ſtripe himſelfe, whereof he died preſentlie after, beſéeching the king to be good lord to one onelie daughter which he had, whome the king beſtowed in mariage vpon William de Langualée, togither with hir fathers inheritance, which William begat of hir a ſonne that bare both his name and ſurname. ¶ A preſident of gratitude & thankfulnes is here committed to memorie. And ſurelie the king could doo no leſſe, than ſome way requite the venturous courage and hartie zeale of the gentleman, who with the loſſe of his owne life preſerued the king, if not from death, yet from ſome dangerous wound that might haue put him to extreame anguiſh and paine. This may incite men to be mindfull of benefits receiued, a vertue no leſſe rare than the contrarie is common, and as one ſaith,

But to conclude with this iourneie which king Henrie made at this time againſt the Welſhmen, although by reaſon of the cumberſome difficulties of the places, he could not enter within the countrie ſo farre as he wiſhed, yet he ſo impounded and conſtreined them to kéepe within the woods and mountains, that they durſt not come abroad, inſomuch that at the length they were glad to ſue for peace.

William king of Scots doth his homage to king Henrie.

William king of Scots, ſucceſſor of Malcolme (who departed this life in the yeare laſt paſt) after he had receiued the crowne of Scotland, came about this preſent time into England, and finding king Henrie at London, did his homage to him as his predeceſſour Malcolme had doone before. He made ſuit alſo to haue Northumberland reſtored vnto him, which the king of Englands mother the empreſſe had in times paſt giuen vnto king Dauid. But king Henrie gaue diuerſe reaſons to excuſe himſelfe whie he might not deliuer that countrie to him at that preſent, namelie, without conſent of a parlement: wherevpon king William perceiuing how the matter went, gaue ouer his ſuit for that preſent, meaning (when occaſion ſerued) to attempt the getting thereof by force, ſith that by praier and ſuit he ſawe well inough he ſhould not obteine it.

N.Triuet. Matth.Paris. Ger.Dor. An edict againſt the archbiſhop Becket.

Moreouer, the Scottiſh king being required by king Henrie to go ouer with him into Normandie, granted ſo to doo: inſomuch that king Henrie, hauing ſet all things in order within his realme of England, in the Lent following paſſed ouer into Normandie. But before he tooke his iourneie, he ſet foorth a decree conſiſting of theſe points in effect as followeth.

1 That no man ſhould bring any letters or commandement from pope Alexander, or Thomas archbiſhop of Canturburie into England, conteining an interdiction of the realme: vpon perill to be apprehended and puniſhed as a traitour to the king, and an enimie to the realme.

2 That no religious perſon or préeſt ſhould be permitted to paſſe the ſeas, or to come into the relme of England, except he had letters of ſafe conduct from the iuſticers for paſſage ouer, and of the king for his returne from thence.

Appeales forbidden.

3 That no man ſhould appeale to the ſaid pope or archbiſhop, nor by their appointment hold any plée: and if any perſon were found dooing the contrarie herevnto, he ſhould be taken and committed to priſon.

4 That if any maner of perſon, either ſpirituall or temporall, were obedient to the ſentence of the interdiction, the ſame perſon ſhould be baniſhed the realme without delaie, and all his linage with him, ſo as they ſhould not conueie with them any of their goods, the which togither with their poſſeſſions ſhould be ſeized into the kings hands.

5 That all ſpirituall perſons, which had any benefices within England, ſhould haue warning giuen to returne into England within foure moneths after the ſame ſummons pronounced, and that if they failed hereof, then ſhould the king ſeize vpon their goods and poſſeſſions.

6 That the biſhops of London and Norwich, ſhould be (and by vertue hereof were) ſummoned to appeare before the kings iuſticers, to make anſwer for that they had interdicted the lands of erle Hugh, and excommunicated him.

7 That the Peter pence ſhould be gathered and kept.

In the octaues of Eaſter king Henrie came to an enterview with the French king at Giſors, where they had conference togither of ſundrie matters.

Chro.Sigeb. Matth.Paris. King Iohn borne.

This yeare the quéene was deliuered of a ſonne named Iohn, who afterward was king of this realme.

Ger.Dor. A contribution.

Moreouer, king Henrie calling a councell of his biſhops and barons in Normandie, cauſed and ordeined a collection (by their aduiſe) to be made through all his countries and dominions, of two pence in the pound of euerie mans lands and goods, iewels and apparell onelie excepted: to be paid this yeare 1166. and for the ſpace of foure yeares next enſuing, one penie of euerie pound to be paid yearelie: and thoſe that were not worth twentie ſhillings in goods or lands (being houſholders notwithſtanding) or bare any office, ſhould paie a penie to this contribution, which was onelie granted for the releefe of the chriſtians in the eaſt parts, and thoſe that warred againſt the miſcreants there. The paiment thereof was appointed to be made in the feaſt daie of ſaint Remigius, or within fiftéene daies after. It was alſo ordeined, that all ſuch as departed this life, within the terme that this collection was in force (their debts being paid) ſhould giue the tenth part of the reſidue of all their goods vnto this ſo neceſſarie a contribution.

The caſtell of Foulgiers.

King Henrie remaining now in Normandie, and vnderſtanding that diuerſe lords and barons of Maine, and the marſhes of Britaine, would not in his abſence ſhew themſelues obedient vnto his wife quéene Elianor, but were about to practiſe a rebellion, raiſed an armie, and went againſt them, eaſilie ſubduing them whom he found obſtinate: and beſieging the caſtell of Foulgiers, tooke and vtterlie deſtroied it.

Matth.Paris. Vizeley. The archbiſhop Becket accurſed thoſe in England that mainteined the cuſtoms of their elders.

Soone after the archbiſhop of Canturburie came from Pountney to Vizeley, and there (on Aſcenſion daie) when the church was moſt full of people, got him into the pulpit, and with booke, bell, and candell ſolemnelie accurſed all the obſeruers, defenders, and mainteiners, with the promoters of ſuch cuſtoms, as within the realme of England they terme the cuſtome of their elders: amongſt others that were accurſed, was Richard de Lucie, Richard the archdeacon of Poictiers, Iocelin de Bailleuille, Alane de Neuille, and manie other. But they being abſent, & neither called nor conuinced (as they alleged notwithſtanding they were thus excommunicated) ſent their meſſengers vnto the archbiſhop, and appealed from him, and ſo feared not to enter into their churches.

R.Houe.

He had before this alſo written certeine letters vnto his ſuffragans, denouncing ſome of theſe and other perſons by expreſſe name accurſed, not onelie for mainteining the matter againſt him, touching the ancient cuſtome of the realme: but alſo for the ſchiſme raiſed in Almaine by Reignald archbiſhop of Colein, for the which he accurſed one Iohn of Oxford. Moreouer, he accurſed Ranulfe de Broc, Hugh de S.Clere, & Thomas Fitz Bernard, for violentlie ſeizing vpon and deteining the goods and poſſeſſions belonging to his archbiſhoprike, without his conſent or agréement therevnto.

The king on the other part baniſhed out of England, and all parts of his other dominions, all thoſe perſons that were knowen to be of kin vnto the archbiſhop, both yoong and old: and furthermore ſent aduertiſement to the abbat of Pountney and to his monks, with whom the archbiſhop by the popes appointment remained, that if they kept him ſtill in their houſe, he would not faile to baniſh all the monks of their order out of England. Now the archbiſhop, after he had remained there ſcarſe two yeares, departed from thence of his owne accord, and came to the king of France, who courteouſlie receiued him, and ſent him to the abbeie of ſaint Columbes néere to the citie of Sens, where he remained a certeine ſeaſon, as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter.

Matth.Paris. Legats from the pope.

Shortlie after this, two legats named William of Pauia, and Iohn of Naples both cardinals, came from the pope to Montmiriall, whom the archbiſhop ſuſpected rather to fauour the kings cauſe than his: yet he was contented that they ſhould haue the iudgement thereof committed vnto them: ſo that firſt (according to the rules of the church) reſtitution might be made both to him and his, of ſuch goods as had béene taken from them. For being ſpoiled, as he was, he would not ſtand to any iudgement, nor could not be compelled therevnto by any reaſon (as he ſaid.)

Now when the two legats ſaw that they could not bring any thing to paſſe, they departed without any thing concluded.

Matth. Weſt.

Debate betwixt the pope and the emperour.

K. Henrie offereth to aid the emperour.

The variance ſtill depending betwixt the king and the archbiſhop of Canturburie: there was alſo about the ſame time a great debate betwixt the emperour Frederike the firſt and pope Alexander the third: wherevpon king Henrie wrote to the emperor, and ſignified vnto him, that he would aid him if néed ſhould require againſt the pope, who mainteined ſuch a runnagate traitor as the archbiſhop Becket was. Moreouer at the ſame time the king cauſed all his ſubiects within the realme of England, from the child of twelue yeares old vnto the aged perſon, to forſweare all obedience that might be pretended as due to the ſame pope Alexander. The king for the ſpace of two yeares togither, remaining ſtill in Normandie, and in other places beyond the ſeas, ſubdued diuerſe rebels, as the earle of Angouleſme, Aimerike de Lucignie, and his ſonnes Robert and Hugh.

An enterview betwixt the king of England and king of France.

The kings met againe to commen of peace.

Alſo he came to an enterview with the king of France betwixt Pacie and Maunt, where they communed of ſuch iniuries as were thought to be attempted on either part. For the Poictouins had made their reſort to the French king, and were confederate with him againſt their ſupreme lord king Henrie, and had deliuered pledges for aſſurance thereof, which pledges the French king would not reſtore. But yet there was a truce concluded betwixt them, to endure till the feaſt of S. Iohn Baptiſt.

A truce.

Patrike earle of Saliſburie ſlaine.

About the feaſt of Eaſter Patrike the earle of Saliſburie was ſlaine by treaſon of the Poictouins, and was buried at Saint Hilaries: after whome his ſonne William ſuccéeded in the earledome.

The Britons practiſed rebellions dailie: but king Henrie entring their countrie, wan diuerſe ſtrong townes and caſtels, and brought them at length vnder his ſubiection. Moreouer in this ſummer ſeaſon the two kings met againe at Fert Bernard to treat of peace, but they departed without concluding any agréement at all. For there were manie of the Poictouins and Britons, which tooke part with the king of France, and hauing deliuered vnto him hoſtages, had a promiſe made them, that the French king ſhould not conclude an agréement with the king of England without their conſent. Hervpon they made warres either vpon other, till finallie (about the feaſt of the Epiphanie) a peace was accorded betwixt them: and then Henrie the king of Englands ſonne made his homage vnto the French king for the countie of Aniou: and the French king granted him the office of the Seneſchalcie of France, which ancientlie belonged vnto the earles of Aniou. Alſo Geffrey duke of Britaine did homage to his elder brother the aforeſaid Henrie, by commandement of his father, for the duchie of Britaine. And afterwards the ſame Geffrey went into Britaine, and at Rheines receiued the homage and fealtie of the lords and barons of that countrie.

Geffrey duke of Britaine.

King Henrie in the meane while ſubdued certeine rebels in Gaſcoine, and returning into Normandie, built a goodlie towne and fortreſſe néere to Paie de Malafrey, ycleped Beauver.

Haruey de Yuon.

About the ſame time one Haruey de Yuon, who had married the daughter of one William Goleth, (that died in his iournie which he tooke into the holie land) deliuered certeine caſtels into the hands of king Henrie, bicauſe he was in deſpaire to kéepe them againſt Theobald earle of Chartres, who through the French kings aid, ſought to diſpoſſeſſe him of the ſame caſtels: wherevpon the war was renewed betwixt the king of England and the ſaid earle of Chartres.

tres. Neuertheleſſe king Henrie making no great accompt of thoſe wars, went into Britaine with his ſonne Geffrey, where going about the countrie to viſit the cities and townes, he reformed many diſorders, laieng as it were a maner of a new foundation of things there, fortifieng the caſtels, cities and townes, and communing in courteous manner with the lords and péeres of the countrie, ſought to win their good wils: and ſo in ſuch exerciſes he ſpent a great part of the time.

He kept his Chriſtmaſſe at Nauntes, whither all the great lords and barons of Britaine reſorted to him. The ſolemnitie of which feaſt being paſt, he entred into the lands of earle Eudo, and waſted the ſame, till the ſaid earle ſubmitted himſelf. At length, after the king had taken order for the good gouernement of Normandie, and his other countries on that ſide the ſea, he returned into England in the firſt wéeke of March, but not without great danger, by reaſon of a tempeſt that tooke him on the ſeas, beginning about midnight, and not ceaſſing till 9. of the clocke in the morning, about which houre he came on land at Portesmouth, not with many of his ſhips, the reſt being toſſed and driuen to ſéeke ſuccour in ſundrie créeks and hauens of the land, and one of them which was the chéefeſt and neweſt, was loſt in the middle of the flouds, togither with 400. perſons, men & women: among whome was Henrie de Aguell with two of his ſons, Gilbert Sullemuy, and Raſe Beumount the kings phyſician & houſhold ſeruant.

After this the king held his Eaſter at Windſor, whither William the Scottiſh king came with his brother Dauid, to welcome him home, and to congratulat his happie ſucceſſe in his buſineſſe on the further ſide the ſeas. They were honorablie enterteined, and at their departure princelie rewarded. The king thus returned into England, puniſhed the ſhiriffes of the land very gréeuouſlie for their extortion, briberie, and rapine. After this, ſtudieng how to aſſure the eſtate of the realme vnto his ſons, vpon good conſideration remembring that no liuing creature was more ſubiect to the vncerteintie of death than Adams heires, and that there is ingraffed ſuch a feruent deſire in the ambitious nature of man to gouerne, that ſo oft as they once come in hope of a kingdome, they haue no regard either of right or wrong, God or the diuell, till they be in poſſeſſion of their deſired prey: he thought it not the worſt point of wiſedome to foreſée that which might happen. For if he ſhould chance to depart this life, and leaue his ſons yong, and not able to mainteine wars through lacke of knowledge, it might fortune them through the ambition of ſome to be defrauded and diſappointed of their lawfull inheritance. Therefore to preuent the chances of fortune, he determined whileſt he was aliue to crowne his eldeſt ſonne Henrie, being now of the age of 17. yeares, and ſo to inueſt him in the kingdome by his owne act in his life time: which déed turned him to much trouble, as after ſhall appeare.

Being vpon this point reſolued, he called togither a parlement of the lords both ſpirituall and temporall at London, and there (on S. Bartholomews daie) proclaimed his ſaid ſonne Henrie fellow with him in the kingdome, whom after this on the ſundaie following, being the fouretéenth daie of Iune 1170. Roger archbiſhop of Yorke did crowne according to the manner, being commanded ſo to doo by the king. This office aperteined vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie, but bicauſe he was baniſhed the realme, the king appointed the archbiſhop of Yorke to doo it, which he ought not to haue doone without licence of the archbiſhop of Canturburie within the precinct of his prouince (as was alledged by archbiſhop Becket) who complained thereof vnto pope Alexander, and ſo incenſed the pope, that he being highlie moued by his letters, forbad not onelie the archbiſhop of Yorke, but alſo Gilbert biſhop of London, and Jocelin biſhop of Saliſburie (who were preſent at the coronation) the vſe of the ſacraments, which made king Henrie far more diſpleaſed with the archbiſhop Thomas than he was before.

The archb. of Yorke is forbidden the vſe of the ſacraments.

Matt. Paris. Polydor.

The king became ſeruitor to his ſonne.

Vpon the daie of coronation, king Henrie the father ſerued his ſonne at the table as ſewer, bringing vp the bores head with trumpets before it, according to the maner. Wher vpon (according to the old adage, the yong man conceiuing a pride in his heart, beheld the ſtanders-by with a more ſtatly countenance than he had béen woont. The archbiſhop of Yorke, who ſat by him, marking his behauior, turned vnto him, & ſaid; Be glad my good ſonne, there is not an other prince in the world that hath ſuch a ſewer at his table. To this the new king anſwered, as it were diſdainefullie, thus: Why doſt thou maruell at that? My father in dooing it, thinketh it not more than becommeth him, he being borne of princelie bloud onlie on the mothers ſide, ſerueth me that am a king borne hauing both a king to my father, and a quéene to my mother. Thus the yong man of an euill and peruerſe nature, was puffed vp in pride by his fathers vnſéemelie doings.

(Immutant mores homines cùm dantur honores)

Honours change maners.

Yong men ſet vp in dignitie eaſilie forget themſelues.

But the king his father hearing his talke, was verie ſorrowfull in his mind, and ſaid to the archbiſhop ſoftlie in his eare: It repenteth me, it repenteth me my lord, that I haue thus aduanced the boy. For he geſſed hereby what a one he would prooue afterward, that ſhewed himſelfe ſo diſobedient and froward alreadie. But although he was diſpleaſed with himſelfe in that he had doone vndiſcréetlie, yet now when that which was doone could not be vndoone, he cauſed all the Nobles and lords of the realme, togither with the king of Scots and his brother Dauid, to doo homage vnto his ſaid ſonne thus made fellow with him in the kingdome: but he would not releaſe them of their oth of allegiance, wherein they ſtood bound to obeie him the father, ſo long as he liued.

¶ Howbeit ſome write that he renounced his eſtate, firſt before all the lords of the land, and after cauſed his ſonne to be crowned: but in ſuch vncerteine points ſet forth by parciall writers, that is to be receiued as a truth, which is confirmed by the order and ſequele of things after doone and put in practiſe. For true it is, that king Henrie the father (ſo long as his ſonne liued) did ſhew himſelfe ſometime as fellow with his ſonne in gouernment, and ſometime as abſolute king: and after his ſons deceaſe, he continued in the entier gouernment, ſo long as he liued. But to procéed.

The French king offended.

The French king hearing that his ſonne in law was thus crowned, and not his daughter the wife of Henrie the ſonne, was highlie offended therewith, and threatned to make war againſt king Henrie the father, except his daughter Margaret might receiue the crowne alſo as quéene immediatlie.

The cauſe why ſhe was not crowned, was by reaſon of hir yong yeares, and for that ſhe had not as yet accompanied with hir husband. But K. Henrie the father vnderſtanding the French kings threats, ſailed ouer into Normandie, where whileſt they prepared for war on both ſides, by the earneſt diligence of Theobald earle of Blois, both the kings came to an enteruiew at Vendoſme, where at length they were accorded, vpon promiſe made by king Henrie, that he would cauſe his ſonne to be crowned againe, and with him his wife the ſaid Magaret the French kings daughter as quéene.

An enterview of the kings. R. Houed.

The French king contented therewith, departed homewards, and king Henrie returning came to Vernon, where he fell into ſo great a ſickneſſe, that anon it was noiſed ouer all the countrie. Inſomuch that he was in ſuch deſpaire of life, that he made his teſtament: wherein he aſſigned his ſonne Richard the dutchie of Aquitaine, and all thoſe lands which came by quéene Elianor the mother of the ſame Richard. And to his ſonne Geffrey he bequeathed Britaine (with the daughter of earle Conan) which he had purchaſed to his vſe of the French king. And to his ſonne king Henrie he gaue the dutchie of Normandie, and all thoſe lands which came by his father Geffrey earle of Aniou. And to his yongeſt ſonne Iohn he bequeathed the earledome of Mortaine. And finallie appointed where he would haue his bodie to be buried.

He made his teſtament. Rog. Houed.

In the meane time Henrie the ſonne remaining at home in England, fell from all good order of meaſure kéeping, and gaue himſelfe to all exceſſiue riot, ſpending and waſting his reuenues inordinatelie. Of which behauiour his father being aduertiſed, returned into England, where he taried not long, but paſſed ouer againe into Normandie, hauing his ſaid ſonne in his companie, meaning thereby to remoue him from the companie of thoſe that were verie like to corrupt his nature, and frame the ſame to all lewdneſſe: for he knew that

In this meane while Thomas the archbiſhop of Canturburie remained in exile almoſt ſix yeares, and could not be reſtored, till partlie by ſwelling threats of the pope, and partlie at the earneſt ſuit of Lewes the French king, Theobald earle of Blois, and others, king Henrie began ſomewhat to ſhew himſelfe conformable towards an agréement.

Ex Quadrilogio. The king and the arch. Becket met togither in preſence of the French king.

Wherevpon the two kings met diuerſe times, and the archbiſhop Thomas comming with the French king, at one time humbled himſelfe ſo to the king of England, that knéeling downe at his féet, he ſaid: My ſoueraigne liege lord, I commit the whole cauſe of the controuerſie betwixt your grace and me, vnto your maieſties order, Gods honour onelie reſerued.

The king offended with that ambiguous exception, ſaid to the king of France: Whatſoeuer diſpleaſeth this man, is taken (as he interpreteth it) contrarie to Gods honour, and ſo by that ſhift will he challenge to himſelfe all that belongeth vnto me. But bicauſe you ſhall not thinke that I go about to reſiſt Gods honour, or him, in any reaſonable order, looke what the greateſt and moſt holie of all his anceſtors haue doone vnto the meaneſt of mine anceſtours, let him do the ſame vnto me, and I am contented therewith.

All the companie preſent cried, that the king humbled himſelfe enough. My lord archbiſhop (ſaid the French king) will you be greater than ſaints, and better than ſaint Peter? Wherof ſtand you in doubt? Behold, your peace is at hand. The archbiſhop made anſwer in commendation of the preſent ſtate of holie church, as thus: My holie predeceſſours in their time, although they cut not all things away that extolled it ſelfe againſt God, yet did they cut off diuers: but if they had plucked vp all by the hard roots, which might offend, who ſhould now haue raiſed the fire of temptation againſt vs? We are in much better caſe (thanks be to God) and as we haue laboured in their lot and number, ſo are we partakers of their labour and reward. What if any of them had béene defectiue or exceſſiue in any point, are we bound to follow the example of their defection or exceſſe? We blame Peter for his denieng of Chriſt, but we praiſe him in reprouing of Neros violence with danger of his life. The church hath riſen and increaſed out of manie dangerous oppreſſions, our fathers haue ſuffered manie things, bicauſe they would not forſake the name of Chriſt; and ought I to ſuppreſſe his honour, to be reconciled vnto any mans fauour? God forbid, God forbid.

The preſent ſtate of the church in Beckets daies.

When the Noble men preſent heard this anſwer of a ſubiect againſt his ſouereigne, they all held againſt him, imputing the fault to the archbiſhops arrogancie, that the peace was not made betwéene the king and him, inſomuch that there was an erle which openlie ſaid; Sith he reſiſteth the will of both the realmes, he is not worthie to be ſuccoured by either of them from henceforth: and therefore being caſt out of England, let not France receiue him.

The archb. Becket blamed of arrogancie.

The councell then being broken vp, the kings departed without bidding the archbiſhop farewell, and ſuch as were mediatours for peace, in departing from this méeting, ſpake manie reprochfull words to him, alledging that he had béene euer ſtout and wiſe in his owne conceit, and a folower of his owne will and opinion: adding that it was a great hinderance to the church, that he was ordeined archbiſhop, and that by him the church was alreadie in part deſtroied, and would ſhortlie be altogither brought to vtter ruine.

Archb. Becket wilfull in his owne opinion.

But the archbiſhop ſetting a watch before his mouth, kept ſilence (as though he had not heard) and folowed the French king with his people. Manie ſaid by the waie as they iourneied, Behold the archbiſhop yonder, which in talke the laſt night would not for the pleaſure of the king denie God, nor kéepe his honor in ſilence.

After this, when the archbiſhop was come to Sens, and aduiſed with himſelfe whether it ſhould be beſt for him to go, at length he ſaid, God is able in the laſt point of miſerie and diſtreſſe, to helpe thoſe that be his. Herewith came a meſſenger from the French king to bring him to the court, for the French king (as one that had béene better inſtructed in the matter) repented himſelfe that he had iudged euill of his anſwers at the laſt méeting, and herevpon receiued him againe into his fauour, and reſted not to trauell ſo much in his cauſe, that at length another méeting was aſſigned at a certeine place néere the confines of Normandie, whither king Henrie came, and there found king Lewes, the archbiſhop of Rouen, and diuerſe other biſhops together, with the foreſaid archbiſhop, who after they had reaſoned of the matter throughlie as they ſaw cauſe, king Henrie receiued the archbiſhop into his fauour againe, and promiſed to redreſſe all that had béene doone amiſſe, and pardon all thoſe that had followed him out of the realme. Wherevpon the king and the archbiſhop being reconciled, the archbiſhop the ſame day came before the king, and talked with him.

The French K. receiueth the archbiſhop Becket againe into fauour.

The archb. is reconciled to the king.

Now among other things he required of the K. that it might be lawfull for him (without offending of his maieſtie) to puniſh (according to the cenſures of the church) the iniurie doone vnto him by the archbiſhop of Yorke, and other biſhops in the coronation of his ſonne. The king granted this, and ſhewed himſelfe ſo courteous at that time, that (as it is ſaid) he held his ſtirrup whiles he mounted on horſſebacke.

¶ Notwithſtanding which obſequiouſnes of the king, it is to be preſumed that all inward repining could not be ſo aboliſhed, as that no fragments remained; but that the archbiſhop for his part, for the maintenance of his great title, & the K. for the ſupportation of his ſoureigntie, when opportunitie ſerued, ſought to get aduantage one of another, & acquit their harts with a new reuenge of an old grudge: for

KNow ye that Thomas the archbiſhop of Canturburie hath made his peace with me at my will and pleaſure; and therefore I command you, that both he and his may remaine in peace; and that he and al thoſe which for his cauſe departed out of the realme, may haue all their goods reſtored, and in ſuch quiet eſtate be now poſſeſſed of them as at any time within three moneths before their departure from thence. And further, cauſe to come before vs of the beſt and moſt ancient knights of the honor of Saltwood, that vpon their oths they may find what fee the archbiſhop ought to haue within that honor, & that which ſhall appeare to apperteine vnto him, as in fee, let him inioy the ſame. The archbiſhop (before he tooke his iournie into England) went to viſit the French king, and to giue him thanks for his great paines and trauell ſuſteined in his cauſe, who aduiſed him in no wiſe as yet to commit himſelfe to preſent danger amongſt his new reconciled enimies, but rather to ſtaie till their malice were ſomewhat aſſwaged. For he perceiued by king Henries words & countenance ſuch a déepe rooted diſpleaſure in his hart, that he agréed to receiue him into fauour rather by compulſion and againſt his will than otherwiſe.

But when the archbiſhop would néeds depart & go ouer into England, the French K. ſuffered him ſo to doo, dooing him all the honor he could at his leaue taking. Then the archbiſhop departing out of France, came into England, and landed at Sandwich about the firſt of December, in the ſeuenth yeare after his firſt departure out of the realme. Shortlie after his arriuall, Roger the archbiſhop of Yorke, Gilbert biſhop of London, and Iocelin biſhop of Saliſburie, with diuerſe other, came vnto him as to the popes legat, and required that it might pleaſe him to reſtore them to the miniſtration of their offices againe: whoſe requeſt he granted, but yet vpon condition, that they ſhould vndertake to ſtand to his iudgement and order in all things, which (by the counſell of the archbiſhop of Yorke) they vtterlie refuſed.

¶ Here authors agrée not (as Polydor trulie ſaith) for ſome write that archbiſhop Thomas (immediatlie vpon his returne into England) denounced the archbiſhop of Yorke with the biſhops of Saliſburie and London accurſſed, whereas before they were depriued of the vſe and adminiſtration of the ſacraments. Some others write, that now at his comming ouer into England from his exile, he depriued them onlie of the miniſtration of the ſacraments, togither with the biſhops of Exceſter, Cheſter, Rocheſter, S. Aſaph, & Landaff, which had perſonallie béene preſent at the coronation of king Henrie the ſonne, to the derogation of the dignitie of their primat the archbiſhop of Canturburie (as before you haue heard.) It ſhuld ſéeme yet by Ger. Dorober. that the archbiſhop of Yorke, and the biſhop of Durham were ſuſpended, and the biſhops of London, Saliſburie, and diuerſe other excommunicated.

The archbiſh. of Yorke and other go ouer to the king to complaine of the archbiſhop Becket.
Ger. Dor.

But how ſoeuer he vſed them, the archbiſhop of Yorke, the two biſhops London and Saliſburie, being offended with his dooings, ſailed ouer into Normandie, and there complained to king Henrie of iniuries doone to them by archbiſhop Thomas, gréeuouſlie accuſing him that he went about to take awaie their libertie of prieſthood, to deſtroie, corrupt, and finallie to aboliſh both the lawes of God and man, togither with the ancient decrées and ſtatutes of their elders; in ſomuch that he tooke vpon him to exclude biſhops at his pleaſure from the companie of chriſtian men, and ſo being excluded, to baniſh them for euer: to derogat things méerelie preiudiciall to the kings roiall prerogatiue; and finallie to take awaie from all men the equitie of lawes and ciuill orders.

The occaſion of the kings words that coſt biſh. Becket his life.

The king giuing eare to their complaint, was ſo diſpleaſed in his mind againſt archbiſhop Thomas, that in open audience of his lords, knights, and gentlemen, he ſaid theſe or the like words: In what miſerable ſtate am I, that can not be in reſt within mine owne realme, by reaſon of one onelie préeſt? Neither is there any of my folkes that will helpe to deliuer me out of ſuch troubles.

There were ſome that ſtood about the king, which geſſed by theſe words, that his mind was to ſignifie how he would haue ſome man to diſpatch the archbiſhop out of the waie. The kings diſpleaſure againſt the archbiſhop was knowne well inough, which cauſed men to haue him in no reuerence at all, ſo that (as it was ſaid) it chanced on a time, that he came to Strowd in Kent, where the inhabitants meaning to doo ſomewhat to his infamie, being thus out of the kings fauour, and deſpiſed of the world, cut off his horſſes taile.

The knights that ſlue the archbiſhop Becket.

There were ſome alſo of the kings ſeruants, that thought after an other maner of ſort to reuenge the diſpleaſure doone to the kings maieſtie, as ſir Hugh Moreuile, ſir William Tracie, ſir Richard Britaine, and ſir Reignold Fitz Vrſe, knights, who taking aduice togither, and agréeing in one mind and will, tooke ſhipping, & ſailed ouer into England, landing at a place called Dogs hauen, néere Douer.

Now the firſt night they lodged in the caſtell of Saltwood, which Randulfe de Broc had in kéeping. The next morning (being the 29. of December, and fift daie of Chriſtmaſſe, which as that yeare came about fell vpon a tueſdaie) hauing gotten togither certeine ſouldiers in the countrie thereabouts, came to Canturburie, and firſt entring into the court of the abbeie of S. Auguſtine, they talked with Clarenbald the elect abbat of that place: and after conference had with him, they procéeded in their buſineſſe as followeth.

Reignold Fitz Vrſe.
That is betwéene 4. and 5. in the euening.

The firſt knight ſir Reignold Fitz Vrſe came to him about the eleuenth houre of the daie, as the archbiſhop ſat in his chamber, and ſitting downe at his feet vpon the ground without any manner of gréeting or ſalutation, at length began with him thus: Being ſent of our ſouereigne lord the king from beyond the ſeas, we doo here preſent vnto you his Graces commandements, to wit, that you ſhould go to his ſonne the king, to doo vnto him that which apperteineth vnto you to doo vnto your ſouereigne lord, and to doo your fealtie vnto him in taking an oth, and further to amend that wherein you haue offended his maieſtie. Whervnto the archbiſhop anſwered: For what cauſe ought I to confirme my fealtie vnto him by oth? or wherin am I giltie in offending the kings Maieſtie? Sir Reignold ſaid: For your baronie, fealtie is demanded of you with an oth, and an other oth is required of thoſe clerkes, which you haue brought with you, if they meane to continue within the land. The archbiſhop anſwered: For my baronie I am readie to do to the king whatſoeuer law or reaſon ſhall allow: but let him for certeine hold, that he ſhall not get any oth either of me or of my clerks. We knew that (ſaid the knight) that you would not doo any of theſe things which we proponed vnto you. Moreouer the king commandeth you to abſolue thoſe biſhops that are excommunicated by you without his licence. Wherevnto he ſaid: The biſhops are excommunicated not by me, but by the pope, who hath therto authoritie from the Lord. If in deed he hath reuenged the iniurie doone to my church, I confeſſe that I am not diſpleaſed therwith. Then ſaid the knight: Sith that ſuch things in deſpite of the king doo pleaſe you, it is to be thought that you would take from him his crowne, and be called and taken for king your ſelfe, but you ſhall miſſe of your purpoſe ſurelie therein. The archbiſhop anſwered: I doo not aſpire to the name of a king, rather would I knit three crownes vnto his crowne if it lay in my power.

The knights command the moonks to ſee the archbiſhop kept ſafe.

At length after theſe and ſuch words, the knights turning them to the moonks, ſaid: In the behalfe of our ſouereigne lord the king, we command you, that in any wiſe ye keepe this man ſafe, and preſent him to the king when it ſhall pleaſe his grace to ſend for him. The archbiſhop ſaid: Doo ye thinke that I will run away? I came not to run away, but looke for the outrage and malice of wicked men. Truelie (ſaid they) you ſhall not runne away, and herewith went out with noiſe and threatnings. Then maiſter Iohn of Saliſburie his chancellor ſaid vnto him: My lord, this is a woonderfull matter that you will take no mans counſell: had it not beene meet to haue giuen them a more meeke and gentle anſwer? But the archbiſhop ſaid: Surelie I haue alreadie taken all the counſell that I will take, I know what I ought to doo. Then ſaid Saliſburie, I pray God it may be good. Now the knights departing out of the place, and going about to put on their armour, certeine came to the archbiſhop, & ſaid; My lord, they arme themſelues. What forceth it? ſaid he, let them arme themſelues.

Iohn de Saliſburie the archb. Beckets chancellor.

The archbiſhops reſolution.

The knights put on their armor.

Now when they were armed, and manie other about them, they entred into the archbiſhops palace. Thoſe that were about the archbiſhop cried vpon him to flee, but he ſat ſtill and would not once remooue, till the moonks brought him euen by force & againſt his will into the church. The comming of the armed men being knowne, ſome of the moonks continued ſinging of euenſong, and ſome ſought places where to hide themſelues, other came to the archbiſhop, who was loth to haue entred into the church, and when he was within, he would not yet ſuffer them to make faſt the doores, ſo that there was a great ſtur among them, but cheeflie when they perceiued that the armed men went about to ſeeke for the archbiſhop, by meane whereof their euenſong was left vnfiniſhed.

The moonks with force bring the archbiſhop into the church.

The knights enter the church.

As though archbiſhops can be no traitors.

At length the knights with their ſeruants hauing ſought the palace, came ruſhing into the church by the cloiſter doore with their ſwords drawne, ſome of them aſking for the traitor, and ſome of them for the archbiſhop, who came and met them, ſaieng; Here am I, no traitor, but the archbiſhop. The formoſt of the knights ſaid vnto him: Flee, thou art but dead. To whome the archbiſhop ſaid, I will not flee. The knight ſtept to him taking him by the ſleeue, and with his ſword caſt his cap beſides his head, and ſaid, Come hither, for thou art a priſoner. I will not (ſaid the archbiſhop) doo with me here what thou wilt: and plucked his ſleeue with a mightie ſtrength out of the knights hand. Wherewith the knight ſtepped backe two or three paces. Then the archbiſhop turning to one of the knights, ſaid to him, What meaneth this, Reignold? I haue doone vnto thee manie great pleaſures, and commeſt thou now vnto me into the church armed? Vnto whome the knight preſentlie anſwered and ſaid; Thou ſhalt know anon what is ment, thou art but dead: it is not poſſible for thee any longer to liue. Vnto whom the archbiſhop anſwered: I am readie to die for my God, and for the defenſe of his iuſtice and the libertie of the church; gladlie doo I imbrace death, ſo that the church may purchaſe peace and libertie by the ſhedding of my blood. And herewith taking on other of the knights by the habergeon, he flong him from him with ſuch violence, that he had almoſt throwne him downe to the ground. This was ſir Will. Tracie, as he after confeſſed.

The courage of the archb.

Then the archbiſhop inclined his head after the maner of one that would praie, pronouncing theſe his laſt words: To God, to ſaint Marie, and to the ſaints that are patrones of this church, and to ſaint Deniſe, I commend my ſelfe and the churches cauſe. Therewith ſir Reignold Fitz Vrſe ſtriking a full blow at his head, chanced to light vpon the arme of a clerke named Edward of Cambridge, who caſt vp his arme to ſaue the archbiſhop: but when he was not able to beare the weight of the blow, he plucked his arme backe, and ſo the ſtroke ſtaied vpon the archbiſhops head, in ſuch wiſe that the bloud ran downe by his face. Then they ſtroke at him one after an other, and though he fell to the ground at the ſecond blow, yet they left him not till they had cut and paſhed out his braines, and daſhed them about vpon the church pauement. All this being doone, they rifled his houſe, ſpoiled his goods, and tooke them to their owne vſes, ſuppoſing it lawfull for them being the kings ſeruants ſo to doo.

Edward of Cambridge.

The archbiſh. is ſlaine.

But doubting how the matter would be taken, after they had wrought their feat, they got them into the biſhoprike of Dureſme, there to remaine till they might heare how the king would take this their vnlawfull enterpriſe: though (as they alledged) they had luſtilie defended his cauſe, and reuenged his quarell as faithfull ſeruants ought to doo. Howbeit, it chanced otherwiſe than they looked it ſhould haue doone: for king Henrie gaue them ſo litle thankes for their preſumptuous act, ſounding to the euill example of other in breach of his lawes, that they deſpairing vtterlie of pardon, fled one into one place, and another into another, ſo that within foure yeares they all died an euill death (as it hath beene reported.) Some write, that they went to Rome by the kings commandement, and there preſented themſelues before the pope, to receiue ſuch penance for their wicked act as he ſhould enioine them. Herevpon the pope appointed them to go vnto Ieruſalem, there to doo their penance, where they remained certeine yeares, applieng themſelues verie diligentlie to performe the ſatiſfaction of their offenſe, according to the maner preſcribed to them by the pope, and ſo at length died.

The murtherers come to an euill end. Match. Paris. W. Paruus.

This was the end of Thomas Becket archbiſhop of Canturburie, which was after he had entred into that ſee eight yeares and ſix moneths, in the yeare after the birth of our Lord 1171. On Chriſtmas day before his death, which fell that yeare on the fridaie, he preached a ſermon to the people, and when he had made an end thereof, he accurſſed Nigell de Sackeuille, the violent incumbent of the church of Berges, and Robert de Broc, both which had (vpon ſpite) curtailed the horſſe of the ſaid archbiſhop: and as the ſame day whileſt he was at the altar, according to his cuſtome, altogither in teares and lamentation; ſo at dinner he ſhewed himſelfe verie pleaſant & merrie, inſomuch that when thoſe that were at the

This day fleſh hath a great priuilege, for this ſame day the word was made fleſh, and came into light, and appeared vnto vs. Theſe his words greatlie contented all the companie.

¶ Thus you haue heard the tragicall diſcourſe of ambitious Becket, a man of meane parentage, and yet through the princes fauour verie fortunate, if he had not abuſed the beneuolence of ſo gratious a ſoueraigne by his inſolencie and preſumption. Wherein we haue to note, how vnſeemelie a thing it was for him, being called to ſo ſacred a function, to lead ſo ſecular and prophane a life, as if he had profeſſed open hoſtilitie to the vocation which he pretended to honour and reuerence. We are alſo taught, that promotions atchiued by ambition are not permanent, and are ſo farre from procuring fame and renowme to the obteiners, that they turne them in the end to ſhame, infamie and reproch, after loſſe of life and effuſion of bloud. The iſſue of all which tragedie is to be imputed to the prouidence and counſell of almightie God, as one writeth verie agreeablie to this purpoſe, ſaieng,

King Henrie ſorie for the archb. Beckets death.

Polydor.

But to let this matter paſſe. King Henrie doubtleſſe was right penſiue for his death, bicauſe he wiſt well inough that it would be iudged, that he himſelfe was priuie to the thing: and euen ſo came it to paſſe, for immediatlie vpon notice giuen into France of the archbiſhops death, king Lewes, and Theobald the earle of Blois, as they that loued him moſt deerelie were moſt ſorowfull for it, and iudging ſtraightwaie that king Henrie was the procurer, they wrote their letters vnto pope Alexander, giuing him to vnderſtand both of the ſlaughter, and how king Henrie had cauſed it to be put in execution, requiring moſt inſtantlie, that ſuch an iniurie doone to the Chriſtian religion, might ſpeedilie be puniſhed. The pope was much offended, and determined to haue the matter throughlie conſidered and ordered, ſo as might ſtand with his dignitie, and accordinglie as the hainous ſtate of the caſe required. King Henrie whileſt theſe things were a dooing, lay certein daies at Argenton, ſo much diſpleaſed in his mind, that he would ſuffer no man once to ſpeake to him about any maner of buſineſſe.

King Henrie ſendeth ambaſſadours to the pope.

At length, he ſent his ambaſſadors to Rome, partlie to purge himſelfe of the archbiſhops death, partlie to excuſe his fault, for that in his furie he had vttered words againſt the archbiſhop, which had giuen occaſion to naughtie men to contriue his death, & partlie to require the pope to ſend his legats into England, to make inquirie both for the death of the archbiſhop, and alſo of the ſtate of the clergie. The kings ambaſſadors found the pope at Tiuoli, and there were heard to declare their meſſage: but little credit was giuen to their words, in ſo much that the pope plainelie told them, that he vnderſtood the matter to be much otherwiſe than they had declared. Yet according to the kings requeſt, he ſent two of his cardinals into England, which vpon due examination, might vnderſtand the truth of the matter thoroughlie as apperteined.

Matth. Paris.

There be that write, that the king ſent ambaſſadours twice vnto the pope, for the firſt that went, could not come to his preſence, nor be ſuffered to declare their meſſage: thoſe that were ſent the ſecond time, were receiued of ſome of the cardinals, but yet onelie with words without anie other way of freendlie interteinement. At length, when the feaſt of Eaſter drew neere, on the which either abſolution or excommunication was to be denounced againſt euerie man, there were certeine of the cardinals which gaue intelligence to the Engliſh ambaſſadours, that the pope by aduice of the colledge, meant on the thurſdaie before Eaſter daie to declare the ſentence of interdiction againſt the king of England, and againſt all his dominions, and to confirme that which had beene alreadie pronounced againſt Richard the archbiſhop of Yorke, and the other biſhops his complices.

The ambaſſadours being brought to a ſtreict iſſue herewith, by helpe of ſome of the cardinals found meanes to haue it put into the popes head, how the Engliſh ambaſſadours had commiſſion to vndertake, that the king of England ſhould obeie in all things what order ſoeuer it pleaſed the pope and his court to award him. Herevpon they tooke their oth, that it ſhould ſo be, and by that meanes they auoided the interdiction. The meſſengers of the archbiſhop of Yorke & the other biſhops vſed the like ſhift, but yet the ſame daie the pope did excommunicate the knights that had murthered the archbiſhop Thomas, and all thoſe that had procured, aided, ſuccoured, or abetted them therein. Some write, that thoſe ambaſſadours which the king ſent to the court of Rome, could not be ſuffered to come to the popes preſence, till according to the faſhion, they had giuen 500. marks in reward, and ſo at length were admitted to his preſence.

Ger. Dor.

The ambaſſadours were glad to vſe a ſhift by briberie.

Howſoeuer that matter paſſed, the king ſtood in great feare leaſt his land ſhould be interdicted, in ſo much that he commanded the wardens of the ports both on this ſide the ſea and beyond, to take good heed, leaſt any cõming with letters of interdiction ſhould paſſe into England; but if any ſuch came, that the bringer ſhould be arreſted and committed to priſon. Alſo he commanded, that no clearke were ſuffered to come ouer into England, except he firſt tooke an oth that he came about no buſineſſe that might turne to the preiudice of the king or his realme. This commandement he ſet forth, at what time he tranſported ouer into England himſelfe, where he landed this yeare at Porteſmouth the third daie of Auguſt. About which time it came into the kings mind, to make a conqueſt of Ireland vpon this occaſion.

Now it came to paſſe, that by the aſſiſtance of ſuch Engliſhmen as then came ouer, the foreſaid Iriſh king began to recouer his loſſes, and in the end wared ſo ſtrong, that he ſubdued all his enimies. When he had thus obteined the victorie, he did not onelie not ſend backe his aiders, but ſo liberallie reteined them ſtill with him, that they had no haſt to returne home, but ſetled themſelues in that countrie, where they liued a pleaſant and verie licentious life. For this cauſe alſo the ſtouteſt lords and rulers of the and Iriſh nation began ſore to ſtomach the matter againſt him that had thus brought the Engliſh nation into their countrie, in ſo much that the Engliſhmen perceiuing their malice, and therewithall hauing ſome feare of themſelues, bicauſe of their ſmall number, they ſent ouer into England for ſuch as wanted liuing, and were willing to ſéeke for it in other countries, of which ſort, great numbers went ouer thither within a ſhort ſpace, whereby the multitude of the Engliſh greatlie increaſed: but for as much as they had no ruler to gouerne them, they procured Richard Strangbow earle of Struguille, alias Chepſtow in Wales to come ouer thither, and to receiue the ſouereigne gouernement, with ſuch honorable prouiſion for maintenance of his eſtate, as ſhould ſéeme requiſit.

¶ Some write, that this earle Richard (being alſo earle Marſhall of England) for a rebellion moued againſt king Henrie, had before this time forfeited all his lands; but others affirme that through riot and more ſumptuous port than his abilitie might beare, he had made awaie and conſumed the moſt part of his liuing, and was run ſo far in debt, that he knew not how to ſatiſfie his creditors, and therefore was he the readier to incline to their requeſt, which made labour vnto him to come ouer into Ireland to haue the gouernance of ſuch Engliſh people, as had alreadie planted themſelues there to inhabit & remaine. Herevpon he prepared a nauie, and aſſembled togither a great number of ſuch as lacked liuing, and ſhortlie determined to paſſe ouer into Ireland. But euen as he was readie to ſet forward, there came vnto him meſſengers from king Henrie, commanding him to ſtaie, and not to take that iournie in hand. Howbeit the earle hauing nothing in England whereof to make anie great accompt, notwithſtanding the kings commandement, tooke the ſea, and paſſed ouer into that countrie, where he greatlie delited ſuch Engliſhmen as dailie had looked for his repaire and comming thither.

Howbeit, with theſe and the like doings of the earle, king Henrie tooke ſuch diſpleaſure (but chéeflie for diſobeieng his commandement) that he confined him the realme, ſeized his lands as forfeited, and by proclamation reſtreined all his ſubiects from paſſing into Ireland with any kind of merchandize, prouiſion of vittels, or other commodities whatſoeuer. By reaſon whereof, earle Strangbow, partlie by conſtreint, and partlie in hope to returne into fauour with king Henrie, and for other reſpects as may be coniectured, aduertiſed him of the whole ſtate of the countrie of Ireland, promiſing him, that if it would pleaſe his grace to come ouer thither, he would ſo worke that he ſhould be admitted ſouereigne lord of all the land. Héerevpon king Henrie pardoned him of all former treſpaſſes, and reſtored vnto him all his lands and inheritances within England and Normandie: and further, confirmed to him ſuch liuings abroad in Ireland out of the walled townes, as he held alreadie in right of his wife: and furthermore ordeined, that he ſhould be high ſteward of Ireland vnder him.

King Henrie then returning out of Normandie into England about the firſt day of Auguſt (as is aforeſaid) cauſed a nauie of 400. ſhips to be made readie, and to aſſemble at Milford hauen in Pembrokſhire, with all ſuch prouiſion and furniture as was thought neceſſarie for ſuch a iournie. Herewith alſo he leuied a great armie both of horſſemen and footmen, and came forward with the ſame vnto Pembroke, and ſo when all his prouiſion and ſhips were readie, he entred the ſea at Milford hauen aforeſaid the ſixtéenth daie of October, and landed in Ireland, at a place called Crowch, not paſt ſeauen miles from Waterford the day next folowing, about nine of the clocke: and on the morrow after being S. Luke the euangeliſts day, he with all his armie marched forth to Waterford, where he found William Fitz Aldelme his ſewer, and Robert Fitz Bernard, with other whome he had ſent thither before him for ſuch purpoſes as he thought moſt conuenient. He remained at Waterford fiftéene daies, during which time, there came in vnto him the king of Corke, the king of Limerike, the king of Oſſorie, the king of Méeth, Reignald de Waterford, and diuerſe other great princes of Ireland. At his firſt arriuall, the foreſaid earle Richard ſurrendred into his hands all thoſe townes and places which he had ſubdued in that countrie.

Herewithall the whole land began to tremble, ſo that the rulers of townes and countries ſent vnto him meſſengers; offering to become tributaries, and to deliuer hoſtages: for whileſt euerie of thoſe rulers which had the gouernment of Ireland in their hands, feared their owne eſtate, and miſtruſted their owne powers, they all in maner ſubmitted themſelues, ſo that this victorie chanced to king Henrie, without the drawing forth of his ſword, and in ſuch wiſe, that he could not haue wiſhed for better or more ſpéedie ſucceſſe therein. For whereas the whole Iland was diuided into ſundrie dominions, and ruled by ſundrie gouernours, not drawing all one waie, but through factions and contrarie ſtudies one enuieng an others wealth (for nothing more hindred the fierce and vnquiet nation from making reſiſtance, than in that they could not agrée to take councell togither for defending of their liberties, and entier ſtate of the commonwelth. Wherevpon, whileſt euerie of them apart by himſelfe was in doubt to attempt the hazard of war againſt ſo mightie a king, they were all ouercome, as were the Britons likewiſe in the time of Ceſar and the Saxons. King Henrie therefore gladlie receiued their humble ſubmiſſion, and they doing homage vnto him, ſware to be his liege and faithfull ſubiects. The nature of the countrie of Connagh.

This Roderike pretended to be the chéefe king of Ireland, and therefore kept continuall war with the other rulers, which was partlie the cauſe wherefore they ſubmitted themſelues ſo ſoone vnto king Henrie. The ſaid Roderike held that part of Ireland which lieth toward the weſt, being full of great and thicke woods, and defended with verie high & great mountaines, cloſed alſo with waters and mariſhes, ſo that it ſhould be verie hard, and ſpeciallie in the winter ſeaſon, to bring an armie vnto it: which was the onelie cauſe whie king Henrie attempted nothing againſt Roderike at that time, but tooke in hand to plant gariſons of ſouldiers in places conuenient to kéepe the land in quiet, which he had wonne alreadie, and to giue order for the gouernement of the whole eſtate of the countrie to his behoofe and commoditie. Herevpon going to Dublin, which is the chéefeſt citie of all Ireland, he aſſembled all the rulers lers and lords as well ſpirituall as temporall togither in councell, conſulting with them for the aſſurance of the dominion of the land to him and his heires for euermore.

The allegation of the Iriſhmen.

The Iriſh men alleged for themſelues, that his deuiſe therin could not be compaſſed, vnles the popes authoritie were therein firſt obteined: for they affirmed, that immediatlie vpon receiuing the chriſtian faith, they did ſubmit themſelues, & all that they had, vnto the ſee of Rome, ſo that they could not acknowledge any for their ſoueraigne lord, but onelie the pope. Which opinion ſome of them (although vainelie) haue holden vnto theſe our daies. King Henrie then vnderſtanding this matter, diſpatched ambaſſadours to Rome, requiring of pope Alexander, that he would by his authoritie grant him licence to ioine the countrie of Ireland vnto the realme of England, who went thither with all expedition according to their charge.

And certeinelie, theſe ambaſſadors whom the king ſent now out of Ireland to Rome in this behalfe, returned with better ſpeed in their meſſage, than did the other whom he had ſent to him out of Normandie, to excuſe him of the death of the archbiſhop Thomas. For the pope vpon good aduice taken in this matter (conſidering that he had now no profit growing to him by that Ile, and that the Iriſh people being wild and rude, were far off from all good order of chriſtianitie in diuerſe points) thought it would be a meane to bring ſome gaine to his cofers, and the people more eaſilie from their naughtie cuſtomes, if they were once made ſubiect vnto ſome chriſtian prince of puiſſance able to tame them, and conſtreine them by force to be more meeke and tractable. In conſideration whereof, he was content to grant vnto the king all that herein he required.

Herevpon, king Henrie conſidering in what reſpect the pope was ſo readie to accompliſh his requeſt, called a councell of the biſhops to aſſemble at Caſſil, where manie things were decreed and ordeined for the reforming of diuerſe cuſtomes vſed before amongſt the Iriſh men, and meerelie repugnant to the lawes of the chriſtian religion. There were alſo appointed as ſolicitors in theſe matters, and to ſit as aſſiſtants with the Iriſh biſhops, one of the kings chaplaines named Nicholas, and one Raſe the archdeacon of Landaf.

1 Amongſt other things there concluded, it was ordeined, that children ſhuld be brought to the church, there to receiue baptiſme in faire water, with three dippings into the ſame, in the name of the father, the ſonne, and the Holie-ghoſt, and that by the prieſts hands, except in caſe where danger of death was feared, which then might be doone by any other perſon, and in any other place.

2 Alſo it was ordeined, that tithes ſhould be paid to churches, and that ſuch laie men as would keepe wiues, ſhould keepe them according to the lawes of holie church, and not otherwiſe.

3 The Peter pence alſo that Adrian reſerued in his buls, ſent to the king touching the ſame matter in the beginning of his reigne (with diuerſe other things) were in like maner appointed to be paid, ſo that nothing was omitted that might pleaſure the pope, or recouer his gratious fauour alreadie loſt in the matters of Thomas Becket, whereof you haue alreadie heard. Thus you heare what ſucceſſe our ambaſſadours had in this voiage. ¶ Now will I tell you (yer I proceed any further) what ſtrange things did happen in England whileſt the king was thus occupied in Ireland, and within the compaſſe of that yeare, and firſt of all, in the night before Chriſtmas day laſt paſſed, there chanced ſuch a tempeſt of lightning and thunder, that the like had not bin heard of, which tempeſt was not onelie generallie throughout all England, but alſo in other forreine parts neere adioining, namelie in Ireland, where it continued all that night, and Chriſtmas daie following, to ſo great terror of the people, that they looked for preſent death.

Wherfore, about the beginning of Lent, the king remoued from Dublin, & went vnto the citie of Wexford, where he remained till toward Eaſter, and then prepared to returne into England: but before he tooke the ſea, he gaue and by his charter confirmed to Hugh Lacie, all the lands of Meeth, with the appurtenances, to hold of him & his heires in fee by knights ſeruice, as to find him an hundred knights or men of armes (as we may terme them) for euermore. He gaue alſo vnto the ſame Hugh, the keeping of the citie of Dublin, and made him cheefe iuſticer of Ireland. Vnto Robert Fitz Bernard he committed the cities of Waterford, and Weſſeford, that he ſhould keepe the ſame to his vſe, and build in them caſtels, for a more ſure defenſe againſt the enimies.

Thus when the king had planted gariſons of ſouldiers in thoſe & other places alſo where was thought needfull; and further had giuen order for the politike gouernement of the whole countrie, ſo far as he had conquered; he firſt ſent ouer his houſhold ſeruants, which tooke the water on Eaſter daie, and landed at Milleford, but he himſelfe and other of the Nobles ſtaid there all that daie, by reaſon of the high ſolemnitie of that feaſt: howbeit the daie next after they tooke the ſea togither, and landed neere to S. Dauids in ſouth Wales, from whence (without delaie) he haſted forth to Douer, and hauing his ſonne the yong king with him, he ſailed ouer into Normandie in the croſſe weeke to meet the popes legats, whom he vnderſtood to be alreadie come thither. At his meeting with them there, he gaue them verie good countenance, and right honorable enterteinment, omitting nothing that might doo them pleaſure.

The popes legats.

Here when the matter came to be diſcuſſed touching the death of archbiſhop Thomas, bicauſe it could not be certeinelie tried out in whom the fault reſted, much reaſoning to and fro paſſed, about obiections and excuſes laid (as in doubtfull caſes it often happeneth) ſo that welneere the ſpace of foure moneths was ſpent in debating of that matter. In which meane time, the king to auoid all contention and ſtrife betwixt him and king Lewes, ſent his ſon Henrie togither with his wife ouer into England, there eftſoones to receiue the crowne, and with them came Rotrod the archbiſhop of Rouen, Giles biſhop of Eureux, Roger biſhop of Worceſter, and diuerſe others.

R.Houed.

Herevpon the yong king being arriued in England, called an aſſemblie of the lords ſpirituall and temporall at Wincheſter, where both he and his ſaid wife Margaret daughter to the French king was crowned with all ſolemnitie, by the hands of the ſaid Rotrod archbiſhop of Rouen vpon the twentie one of Auguſt.

Rog.Houed.

In the meane time (ſaith one writer) his father king Henrie might haue foreſéene and found means to haue auoided the diſcord, which euen now began to ſpring vp betwixt him and his children, cauſing a ſore and ciuill warre, if he had not béene a man that vtterlie did deteſt all ſuperſtitious admonitions. For being told (I wot not by whome) that if he did not repent, and take more regard to miniſter iuſtice, which is a vertue that conteineth in it ſelfe all other vertues; it would come to paſſe, that within ſhort time he ſhould fall into great and manifold calamities.

A ſtrange apparition.

In his returne alſo out of Ireland (ſaith an other) vpon the ſundaie next after the feaſt of Eaſter, commonlie called Lowſundaie, as he ſhould take his horſſe at Cardiffe in Wales, there appeared vnto him a man of pale and wanne colour, barefooted, and in a white kirtell, who boldlie in the Dutch language ſpake vnto him, and admoniſhed him of amendment of life, and to haue regard that the ſabboth daie (commonlie called the ſundaie) might be more duelie kept and obſerued, ſo that no markets nor bodilie workes be holden, vſed, or donne vpon that daie within the bounds of his dominions, except that which apperteineth to dreſſing of meats. And if thou doo (ſaith he) after this commandement, I aſſure thée that all things which thou dooeſt enterpriſe of good intent and purpoſe, ſhall ſort to good effect and verie luckie end.

But the king was not greatlie pleaſed with theſe words, and in French ſaid to the knight that held his bridle; Aſke of this churle, whether he hath dreamed all this that he telleth or not. When the knight had expounded it in Engliſh, the man anſwered, Whether I haue dreamed it in my ſléepe or not, take thou héed to my words, & marke what day this is: for if thou amend not thy life, and doo as I haue aduertiſed thée, before a twelue moneth come to an end, thou ſhalt heare ſuch tidings as will make thée ſorowfull all the daies of thy life after. The man hauing thus ſpoken, vaniſhed awaie ſuddenlie, and the king tooke his words but in ſport: howbeit he wondered that he was ſo ſuddenlie gone, as he did likewiſe at his ſudden appearing. Manie other warnings the king had (ſaith mine author) but he ſet little thereby.

The ſecond warning he receiued of an Iriſhman, that told him of tokens verie priuie. The third time a knight of Lindſey called Philip de Cheſterby, paſſing the ſea, came to the king into Normandie, and there declared vnto him ſeauen articles, which he ſhould amend, which if he did, then he ſhould reigne ſeauen yeares in great honor, and ſubdue Gods enimies. If he did not amend and redreſſe thoſe points, then ſhould he come to death with diſhonour in the fourth yeare.

1 The firſt article or point was, that he ſhould ſéeke to mainteine holie church.

2 The ſecond, that he ſhould cauſe rightfull lawes to be executed.

3 The third, that he ſhould condemne no man without lawfull proceſſe.

4 The fourth, that he ſhould reſtore the lands, goods and heritages to thoſe rightfull owners from whome he had taken them by any wrong or vnlawfull meanes.

5 The fift, that he ſhould cauſe euerie man to haue right, without bribing and giuing of méed.

6 The ſixt, that he ſhould paie his debts as well due to any of his ſubiects, for any ſtuffe taken vp of them to his vſe, as to his ſeruants and ſouldiers, who bicauſe they could not haue their wages truelie paid them, fell to robbing and ſpoiling of true labouring men.

7 The ſeauenth and laſt article was, that he ſhould cauſe the Iewes to be auoided out of the land, by whom the people were ſore impoueriſhed with ſuch vnmercifull vſurie as they exerciſed.

The king (notwithſtanding theſe and other like warnings) tooke no regard to the amendment of his ſinfull life, wherevpon (as is thought) the troubles which enſued did light vpon him by Gods iuſt appointment.

¶ Howſoeuer this may ſéeme a fable, but no written veritie, & therefore eſtéemed as the chaffe of ſummer flowers; yet as in the tales of Aeſop many good morals are compriſed, ſo the ſcope whereto this apparition tendeth being neceſſarie, maketh the argument it ſelfe of the more authoritie. The end therefore being (as you ſée) to reuoke the king from worſſe to better, from the ſwines-ſtie of vice to the ſtatelie throne of vertue, from the kennell of ſinne to the riuers of ſanctitie, prooueth that euen verie fictions of poets (though of light credit) haue their drift manie times to honeſt purpoſe, and therefore bring with them a competent weight of profit to the readers. So the ſcope of this tale being the ſame that Dauid pointeth at in the ſecond pſalme, when he ſaith,

Ex. G. Buch. paraph. in pſal. 2.

(At vos in populos quibus eſt permiſſa poteſtas,
Et ius ab alta ſede plebi dicitis, maketh the narration it ſelfe (though otherwiſe ſéeming méere fabulous) to be ſomewhat authenticall. But to returne to the courſe of our ſtorie, and now to ſaie ſomewhat of this Henrie the ſeconds ſonne the yoong king, by whom the troubles were moued, (note you this) that after he had receiued the crowne togither with his ſaid wife, they both paſſed the ſeas incontinentlie backe againe into Normandie, where on the ſeauen and twentith of September, at a generall aſſemblie holden within the city of Auranches in the church of the apoſtle S. Andrew, king Henrie the father, before the cardinals the popes legats, and a great number of biſhops and other people, made his purgation, in receiuing an oth vpon the holie relikes of the ſaints, and vpon the ſacred euangeliſts, that he neither willed, nor commanded the archbiſhop Thomas to be murthered, and that when he heard of it, he was ſorie for it. But bicauſe he could not apprehend them that ſlue the archbiſhop, and for that he feared in his conſcience leaſt they had executed that vnlawfull act vpon a preſumptuous boldneſſe, bicauſe they had perceiued him to be offended with the archbiſhop, he ſware to make ſatiſfaction (for giuing ſuch occaſion) in this maner.

R. Houed. Ger. Dor.

King Henrie purgeth himſelfe of the archbiſhop Beckets death.

1 In primis, that he would not depart from pope Alexander, nor from his catholike ſucceſſours, ſo long as they ſhould repute him for a catholike king.

O vile ſubiection vnbeſéeming a king!

2 Item, that he would neither impeach appeales, nor ſuffer them to be impeached, but that they might fréelie be made within the realme vnto the pope, in cauſes eccleſiaſticall; yet ſo, that if the king haue the parties ſuſpected, they ſhall find him ſuerties that they ſhall not procure harme or hinderance whatſoeuer to him or to his realme.

3 Item, that within thrée yeares after the natiuitie of our lord next enſuing, he ſhould take vpon him the croſſe, and perſonallie paſſe to the holie land, except pope Alexander or his ſucceſſours tooke other order with him.

4 Prouided, that if vpon any vrgent neceſſitie he chanced to go into Spaine to warre againſt the Saracens there, then ſo long ſpace of time as he ſpent in that iournie, he might deferre his going into the eaſt parts.

5 Item, he bound himſelfe in the meane time by his oth, to emploie ſo much monie as the templers ſhould thinke ſufficient for the finding of two hundred knights or men of armes, for one yeares terme in the defenſe of the holie land.

6 Item, he remitted his wrath conceiued againſt

thoſe which were in exile for the archbiſhop Thomas his cauſe, ſo that they might returne againe into the realme.

7 Item, to reſtore all the lands and poſſeſſions which had béene taken awaie from the ſée of Canturburie, as they were belonging thereto in the yere before the departure of the archbiſhop Thomas out of England.

8 Item, he ſware to take awaie and aboliſh all thoſe cuſtomes, which in his time had béene brought in againſt the church, as preiudiciall thereto.

All theſe articles faithfullie, and without malengine to performe and fulfill in euerie degrée, he receiued a ſolemne oth, and cauſed his ſonne the yong king being there preſent, to receiue the ſame for performance of all thoſe articles, ſuch as touched his owne perſon onelie excepted. And to the intent the ſame ſhould remaine in the popes conſiſtorie as matter of record, he put his ſeale vnto the writing wherein the ſame articles were ingroſſed, togither with the ſeales of the aboue mentioned cardinals.

Shortlie after king Henrie the father ſuffered the yong king his ſon to go into France, togither with his wife, to viſit his father king Lewes, according as their deputies required, which iournie verelie bred the cauſe of the diſſention that followed betwixt him and his father. and namelie ſuch one as might controll him) was the more encouraged thereto by a number of prodigall currie fauours, who by flatterie ſet him aloft, declaring vnto him that he was borne to rule, and not to obeie, and therefore it became not his highneſſe to reigne by the appointment of an other, but rather to haue the gouernement fréelie in his owne hands, that he might not be counted prince by permiſſion. Herevpon the youthfull courage of the yong king being tickled, began to wax of a contrarie mind to his father: who ſuſpecting indéed that which chanced; to wit (leaſt his ſonnes yoong yeares not able yet to diſcerne good and wholeſome counſell from euill, might eaſilie be infected with ſome ſiniſter practiſe) thought it not good to ſuffer him to be long abſent from him, and therefore ſent for him: who taking leaue of his father in law king Lewes in courteous maner, returned and came to his father king Henrie into Normandie, who when the feaſt of Chriſtmas drew néere, repaired towards Aniou, where in the towne of Chinon, he ſolemnized that feaſt, hauing left his ſonne the yong king and his wife all that while in Normandie: but ſending for him after the feaſt was ended, they went both into Auvergne, where being at mount Ferrat, Hubert earle of Morienne came vnto them, bringing with him his eldeſt daughter Alice, whom king Henrie the father bought of him for the ſumme of fiue thouſand markes, that he might beſtow hir in mariage vpon his yongeſt ſonne John with the heritage of the countie of Morienne, if hir father died without other iſſue, or at the leaſtwiſe the ſaid Hubert chanced to haue any ſonne lawfullie begotten, that then he ſhould leaue vnto them and to their heires the countie of Ruſſellon, the countie of Belle, as he then had and held the ſame, Pierre caſtell with the appurtenances, the vallie of Noualleiſe, alſo Chambrie with the appurtenances, Aiz, Aſpermont, Rochet, mont Magor, and Chambres, with Burg, all which lieng on this ſide the mountaines with their appurtenances, the ſaid Hubert granted to them immediatlie for euer. And beyond the mountaines he couenanted to giue vnto them Turine with the appurtenances, the colledge of Gauoreth with the appurtenances, and all the fées which the earles of Canaues held of him, togither with the fealties and ſeruices. And alſo, the fées, fealties, and ſeruices which belonged to him in the countie of Amund, and in the vallie called Vale Doſta; and in like maner, the towne of Caſtellone.

Hubert earle of Morienne.

A marriage contracted.

Comitatus bellenſis.

All the forenamed places the ſaid earle gaue and granted to the ſaid John, ſonne to the king of England for euermore, with his daughter, ſo fréelie, wholie and quietlie (in men and cities, caſtels, fortreſſes, or other places of defenſe, in medowes, leaſſewes, milnes, woods, plaines, waters, vallies and mountaines, in cuſtomes and all other things) as euer he or his father had held or enioied the ſame. And furthermore, the ſaid earle would, that immediatlie (when it pleaſed the king of England) his people ſhould doo homage and fealtie to the king of Englands ſonne, reſeruing the fealtie due to him ſo long as he liued. Moreouer, the ſaid earle Hubert granted to the ſaid John and his wife all the right that he had in the countie of Granople, and whatſoeuer might be got and euicted in the ſame countie. It was alſo couenanted, if the elder daughter died, that then the ſaid John ſhould marrie the yoonger daughter, and enioy all the like portions and parts of inheritance as he ſhould haue enioied with the firſt.

The countie of Granople.

Finallie, that theſe couenants, grants and agréements ſhould be performed on the part and behalfe of the ſaid earle Hubert, both he, the ſaid earle, and the erle of Geneua, and in maner all the great lords and barons of thoſe countries receiued an oth, and vndertooke to come and offer themſelues as hoſtages to remaine with the king of England, in caſe the ſaid earle Hubert failed in performance of any of the aforeſaid articles, till he framed himſelfe to ſatiſfie the kings pleaſure in ſuch behalfe.

Furthermore, Peter the reuerend archbiſhop of Tarenſaſia, and Ardune the biſhop of Geneua, and alſo William the biſhop of Morienne, with the abbat of S. Michell promiſed vpon their oth to be readie at the appointment of the king of England, to put vnder the cenſures of the church the ſaid earle and his lands, refuſing to performe the foreſaid couenants, and ſo to kéepe him and the ſame lands bound, till he had ſatiſfied the king of England therein.

The earles of Mandeuille and Arundell.

William earle of Mandeuill, and William earle of Arundell ſware on the part of king Henrie, that he ſhould performe the articles, couenants and agréements on his part, as firſt to make paiment immediatlie vnto the ſaid Hubert of one thouſand marks, and aſſoone as he ſhould receiue his daughter, he ſhould pay him an other thouſand markes at the leaſt, and the reſidue then remaining of the ſaid ſum of fiue thouſand markes, ſhould be paid when the mariage was conſummate.

It was prouided alſo, that the ſaid earle Hubert might marrie his yoonger daughter where he would, without any great diminiſhing of the earledome after the firſt marriage conſummate with the lord John, the king of Englands ſonne. And that if either the ſaid lord John, or his affianced wife chanced to die before the conſummation of the marriage; then ſhould the monie which the earle had receiued, be repaied to the king, or beſtowed as the king ſhould appoint.

Shortlie after that the parties were agreed vpon the couenants afore cited, the marques of Montferrat & one Geffrey de Plorac with his ſonne Miles and other Noble men came to the king as ambaſſadors from the earle of Morienne, and receiued an oth, that they ſhould ſee and procure the ſaid earle to performe the couenants and agreements concluded betwixt the king and him. When theſe things were thus ordered, as ſeemed good to both parties, for the eſtabliſhment of the foreſaid marriage, the king the father, and the king the ſonne remoued to Limoges, whither the earle of S. Giles came, and was there accorded with king Henrie and his ſonne Richard duke of Guien, concerning the controuerſie that had beene moued for the countie of Tholouze, dooing his homage as well vnto the father as to the ſonne for the ſame countie, and further couenanted to ſerue them with an hundred knights or men of armes (as we may call them) for the terme of fourtie daies at all times, vpon lawfull ſummons. And if the king or his ſonne duke Richard would haue his ſeruice longer time after the fourtie daies were expired, they ſhould paie wages both to him and his men in reaſonable maner. Moreouer, the ſaid earle condeſcended & agreed to giue yearelie for Tholouze an hundred marks, or elſe 10. horſſes with 10. marks a peece. Now alſo, whileſt the king ſoiourned at Limoges, the earle of Morienne came thither to him, and required to vnderſtand what parcels of land he would aſſigne vnto his ſonne John. Wherevpon the king reſolued to allot vnto him the chappell of Chinon, Lodun and Mirabell, whereby he offended his eldeſt ſonne the yoong king (as after may appeare) who was glad to haue occaſion (whome the poets faine to be bald behind and hairie before, as this monaſtich inſinuateth, offered to broch his conceiued purpoſe of rebellion which of late he had imagined, and now began to put in practiſe, vſing the opportunitie of the time and the ſtate or qualitie of the quarell then taken for his beſt aduantage, and meaning to make it an ingredience or entrance to the malicious conceit which he had kept ſecret in his hart.

This yeere the moonks of Canturburie (by the kings aſſent) choſe for their archbiſhop one Richard, who before was prior of Douer, this man was the 39. in number that had ruled the church of Canturburie, being of an euill life, as he well ſhewed, in that he waſted the goods of the church inordinatlie. Roger the abbat of Bechellouin was firſt choſen, but he refuſed that dignitie rather for ſlothfulnes and idlenes (as ſome take it) than for modeſtie or wiſedome: ſo hard a thing it is to pleaſe the people, which meaſure all things to be honeſt or diſhoneſt, as they eb or flow in profit and gaine.

The ſaid Richard, after that he was elected, did homage vnto king Henrie, and ſware fealtie vnto him (Saluo ſemper ordine ſuo, His order alwaies ſaued) without making mention of the cuſtomes of the kingdome. This was doone at Weſtminſter in the chappel of S. Katharine, the kings iuſticer giuing his aſſent therevnto, where a councell was held the ſame time, and a letter of the popes read there before the biſhops and barons of the realme, conteining amongſt other things this that followeth.

A councell holden at Weſtminſter.

A breefe extract or clauſe of a letter which the pope ſent to the clergie of England, &c: for the making of a new holie daie.

WE admoniſh you all, & by the authoritie which we reteine, doo ſtreightlie charge you, that you celebrat the daie of the ſuffering of the bleſſed man Thomas the glorious martyr, ſometime archbiſhop of Canturburie, euerie yere in moſt ſolemne ſort, & that with deuout praiers ye endeuour your ſelues to purchaſe forgiuenes of ſins; that he which for Chriſtes ſake ſuffered baniſhment in this life, and martyrdome in death by conſtancie of vertue, through continuall ſupplication of faithful people, may make interceſſion for you vnto God.

The tenor of theſe letters were ſcarſlie read, but euerie man with a lowd voice began to recite this pſalme or hymne, Te Deum laudamus. Furthermore bicauſe his ſuffragans had not exhibited due reuerence to him their father, either in time of his baniſhment, or at his returne from the ſame, but rather perſecuted him; that they might openlie confeſſe their errour and wickedneſſe to all men, they made this collect: Be fauourable good Lord to our ſupplication and praier, that we which acknowledge our ſelues guiltie of iniquitie, may be deliuered by the interceſſion of Thomas thy bleſſed martyr and biſhop, Amen.

A collect deuiſed in honor of the archbiſhop Becket.

This praier was vſed by the couent of S. Albons on the daie of his martyrdome. Thus ¶ Notwithſtanding all which honour of the pope then exhibited to his ſaint, as his canonization, with other ſolemnities procured for the maintenance of his memoriall in all ages ſucceeding; what remembrance is there now of Thomas Becket? Where be the ſhrines that were erected in this church and that chappell for perpetuities of his name and fame? Are they not all defaced? are they not all ruinated? are they not all conuerted to powder and duſt? And although the pope ment by cauſing ſuch ikons to be erected, to prefer Thomas as a perpetuall ſaint to all poſterities, and thought as he that ſaid of his poems,

Yet is he growne not into renowme, but infamie and ſhame in England, as our chronicles declare, which haue publiſhed that Romiſh rakehels ambitious and traitorous heart to all ſucceſſions. Naie, whereas in times paſt he was reckoned in the popes rubricke for a ſaint and a martyr, now it is come to paſſe (by the meanes belike of other ſaints whoſe merits haue ſurpaſſed Beckets) that he is growne in obliuion euen at Rome, and his name raced out of the popes calendar (as a learned man preached in a ſolemne audience at a high feſtiuall time) by whom he was ſo magnified. In which kind of diſcontinuing his fauour to his ſworne children, he ſheweth himſelfe verie ingratefull, and not worthie of the dutifulneſſe wherewith (like buzzards as they be) they ouercharge their helliſh (holie I would ſaie) father.

This yeare the ſiſter of the ſaid archbiſhop Richard was made abbeſſe of Berking. But now touching the new elected archbiſhop Richard, we find, that comming to Canturburie on the ſaturdaie after his election, in hope to be there conſecrated, he was diſappointed by letters that came from king Henrie the ſonne, in forme as followeth.

A letter of yoong king Henrie touching the diſappointment of archbiſhop Richards conſecration.

Henrie by the grace of God king of England, duke of Normandie, and earle of Aniou, ſonne of king Henrie; to our deere and faithfull freend Odo, prior of the church of Canturburie, and to all the conuent there, ſendeth greeting. By the aſſured report of ſome we vnderſtand, that in your church and in other churches alſo, my father goeth about to inſtitute certein perſons not verie meet for ſuch calling: and bicauſe (without our conſent) it ought not ſo to be doone, who by reaſon of our kinglie annointing haue taken vpon vs the kingdome and charge of the whole realme: hervpon we haue in the preſence of many perſons appealed to the ſee of Rome, and haue ſignified our appeale in that behalfe, made vnto our reuerend fathers and freends Albert and Theodorike, cardinals and legats of the apoſtolike ſee, by our writing and meſſenger, who likewiſe and diſcreet perſonages haue aſſented therevnto. We haue likewiſe ſignified the ſame our appeale to our faithfull freends the biſhops of London, Exceſter, and Worceſter, and as we haue appealed, ſo likewiſe we doo appeale vnder your teſtimonie.

After the peruſall of this letter, and the due conſideration of the ſubſtance and ſumme of the ſame, (albeit no ſuch afterclaps were ſuſpected before) the biſhops were altogither driuen to their ſhifts, ſome of them deſiring to go forward with the conſecration, and ſome ſuppoſing it better to yéeld vnto the appeale. The elect archbiſhop therefore firſt ſent meſſengers to Rome with letters, not written onelie by himſelfe, but alſo by all the biſhops and conuent of Canturburie. After this he followed himſelfe in perſon, and comming to the popes court, found there diuers aduerſaries to his cauſe. For ſome were there that tooke part with the king the father, and ſome with the king the ſonne, and ſo his buſineſſe could haue no ſpéedie diſpatch. In the meane time the rancor which king Henrie the ſonne had conceiued againſt his father was ſo ripened, that it could not but burſt out, and ſhew it ſelfe to the breach of all dutifull obedience which nature requireth of a ſonne towards his father.

You haue heard how king Henrie promiſed the earle of Morienne, when the marriage was concluded betwixt his ſon Iohn and the ſaid earles daughter, to giue vnto the ſaid Iohn certeine townes in Normandie, for the better mainteining of his eſtate and his wiues. This gift of the fathers cauſed his eldeſt ſonne the yong king Henrie, the ſooner to powre out his poiſon which he had ſucked before at his being with his father in law king Lewes. For conceiuing an offenſe, that his father ſhould giue away any portion of his inheritance, he would not condeſcend to any ſuch gifts, but alledged that ſithens he was king of England, and that all belonged to him, his father could not now haue any title to giue awaie that which did in no wiſe apperteine vnto him.

Wil.Paruus.

There was another cauſe that troubled his mind alſo, and mooued him to grudge at his father, which was; for that the proportion of his allowance for maintenance of his houſhold and port was verie ſlender, and yet more ſlenderlie paied. Alſo his father remooued from him certeine of his ſeruants, as Aſtulfe de S. Hilarie, and other whome he ſuſpected to giue him euill counſell. Wherefore thoſe that were procurers of him to attempt the ſeizing of the gouernement into his hands, vpon this occaſion ſlept not, but put into his head ſuch matter, that at length he openlie demanded to haue the whole rule committed to him: which when he ſaw would not be obteined of his father by quiet meanes, he fled ſecretlie awaie vnto his father in law king Lewes, requiring aid of him to recouer his right, which king Henrie the elder vniuſtlie deteined from him.

King Henrie the ſonne fled to the French king.

The French king comforted him, and bad him be of good cheare, for he ment to doo for him all that in him laie. Herewith he proclaimed him duke of Normandie, and receiued homage of him for the ſame. King Henrie the father vnderſtanding that his ſonne was thus fled to the French king, ſent ambaſſadours forthwith to the ſame king, requiring him to giue his ſon ſome good & wholeſome counſell, that he might repent, and not follow ſuch wilfulneſſe of mind in ſwaruing from his fathers fréendſhip, but rather with ſpéed to returne home againe; & to promiſe in his name, that if any thing were otherwiſe than well, he would be contented the ſame ſhould be reformed by his order and correction. But ſo farre was king Lewes from meaning to ſet a quietneſſe betwixt the father and the ſonne, that he would not heare the ambaſſadors declare their meſſage, bicauſe they named the father, king, to the derogation of the ſonnes right, to whome he ſaid he offered manifeſt wrong in vſurping the gouernement, which he had alreadie giuen ouer and reſigned. Inſomuch that when the ambaſſadours had declared ſome part of their meſſage, he aſked them what he was that willed ſuch things of him: and when they anſwered that the king of England had ſent them with that meſſage, That is a falſe lie (ſaith he) for behold here is the king of England, who hath giuen you no commiſſion to declare any meſſage from him vnto me at all.

King Henrie the father perceiuing hereby that warres would follow, prepared the beſt he could for his owne defenſe: but he was in great doubt on euerie ſide, not knowing whome he might truſt. And to increaſe this miſchéefe, his wife quéene Elianor ſtudied to mainteine the ſtrife betwixt hir ſonnes. The yoong king then getting an armie togither entred into Guian.

King Henrie the father knoweth not whome he may truſt.

King Henrie was not haſtie to go againſt him, but ſought rather with gentleneſſe and all courteous meanes to reconcile him: inſomuch that whereas diuerſe graue perſonages being of the yoong kings counſell, and doubting to runne into the diſpleaſure of his father, reuolted from the ſonne to the father, and brought with them the ſonnes ſeale, which he vſed in in ſealing of letters. Howbeit, the father receiued them not, but ſent them backe againe to his ſonne, commanding them to continue faithfull in ſeruing him as he ſhould appoint them, and herewith he ſent ambaſſadours vnto his ſonne to entreate with him of peace and concord.

Now whileſt the father went about to aſſwage the ſonnes diſpleaſure, the mother quéene Elianor did what ſhe could to pricke him forward in his diſobedient attempts. For ſhe being enraged againſt hir huſband bicauſe he kept ſundrie concubines, and therefore delited the leſſe in hir companie, cared not what miſchéefe ſhe procured againſt him. Herevpon ſhe made hir complaint ſo gréeuouſlie vnto hir ſons Richard and Geffrey, that they ioined with their brother againſt their father, & came to him into Guien, to aid him to the vttermoſt of their powers.

¶ This may well séeme to be brought vpon the king as a plague of his incontinent, vnchaſt and libidinous life; who hauing Chara coniugij pignora, a notable motiue to kindle and continue honeſt loue in wedlocke, did notwithſtanding moſt inordinatlie abandon his bodie to beaſtlie and vnlawfull companie kéeping with ſtrange fleſh. Note héere how God ſtirreth vp the wife of his owne boſome, & the ſonnes deſcending of his owne loines to be thornes in his eies and godes in his ſides for profaning ſo diuine and holie an ordinance; which the verie pagans did ſo honour and reuerence, that they did not onlie giue precepts touching the due obſeruation thereof, but denounced vndoubted vengeance for the violation of the ſame, as appeareth in this old teſtimonie,

But we will remit this to the readers conſideration, and note the iſſue of this miſchéefe now broched. The yong king reioiſing that he had his brethren thus on his ſide, readie to take his part, became more ſtout than before, and for anſwere vnto the meſſengers that came to him from his father, he declared that if his father would deliuer vp the whole gouernment into his hands, he would be content to breake vp his armie. As for ſuch ſouldiers as would willinglie take his part in this quarell, he cauſed them to ſweare that they ſhould faithfullie ſerue him againſt his aduerſaries: and thoſe that had rather ſerue on the other ſide, he licenced them fréelie to depart and go to his father.

Twẽtie thouſand Brabanders were reteined by king Henrie the father as ſaith R.Houed.

King Henrie the father receiuing ſuch a rebellious anſwer from his ſonne, much lamented the matter, and ſo much the more, for that he ſaw there was no remedie, but to haue the controuerſie decided by the ſword. Therefore leaſt he ſhould be taken vnprouided, he kept his armie in a readineſſe about him, hauing reteined certeine bands of Brabanders called the Rowts.

The lords that tooke part with his ſonne, being aduertiſed by eſpials of the doings of the father, and hearing that he was readie (if he were conſtreined) to defend himſelfe by battell, and yet willing to receiue his ſons into his fauour againe, if they would be reformed, they tooke great care how to cauſe his ſons to perſiſt in their enterpriſe, till the father were compelled by force to reſigne the gouernment vnto them. But none more than the French king coueted to mainteine the diſcord, till it might be ended by force of armes: and therfore ſent vnto king Henrie the ſonne, willing him to come to Paris, where he cauſed a councell to be called, & there made a league betwixt the ſaid Henrie and himſelfe, with William king of Scotland, Hugh earle of Cheſter, William Patrike the elder, the thrée ſons of Robert earle of Mellent, whoſe caſtels king Henrie the elder had in poſſeſſion, Roger Moumbray, Hugh Bigot, and diuerſe other complices of the conſpiracie, Flabella ſeditionum, that tooke part with Henrie the ſonne.

Here after they had conſulted of the maner how to mainteine warre, bicauſe they would aſſure the yong king that they ment not to forſake him, firſt king Lewes, and after all the reſidue tooke an oth to aid him with men and monie, till his father ſhould either be driuen out of his kingdome, or brought to agrée with him at his will and pleaſure. On the other part, he ſware neuer to conclude any peace with his father without their conſent and good will. He alſo promiſed vpon his oth to giue, & by his charter vnder his ſeale he confirmed vnto Philip earle of Flanders (for his homage) a thouſand pounds of yearelie reuenues in England, and the countie of Kent, with the caſtels of Douer and Rocheſter. And to Matthew earle of Bullongne (for his homage) he likewiſe promiſed and confirmed the Soke of Kirketon in Lindſey, and the earldome of Morton, with the honour of Hey. Alſo to Theobald earle of Blois (for his homage) he gaue and granted fiue hundred marks of yearelie reuenue in Aniou with the caſtell of Ambois, and all that which he claimed as his right within the countrie of Touraine, and ſurrendred to him all the right which he and his father claimed and demanded to haue in Chateau Reignold. To the K. of Scots (for his aſſiſtance) he gaue and granted all Northumberland as far as the riuer of Tine. And to his brother Dauid (to haue his ſeruice) he granted the counties of Huntington and Cambridge. To Hugh Bigot (for his ſeruice) he gaue the caſtell of Norwich. All theſe gifts and grants (with diuerſe other to other perſons) promiſed & granted, he confirmed with his new ſeale, which the king of France had cauſed him to make. Theſe things being thus ordered at Paris, euerie man reſorted to his charge, that he might prouide for the warre with all ſpéed conuenient.

King Henrie the father aduertiſed of this new league of the conſpirators againſt him, was in great perplexitie of mind, for that he ſaw himſelfe in danger, not onelie of outward enimies, but alſo of his owne ſubiects at home. Yet bicauſe the winter ſeaſon was alreadie at hand, taking awaie all conuenient occaſions of attempting any great exploit by war for that time, he was in hope to compaſſe ſome agréement with his ſons yer the ſpring of the yeare ſhould returne, and therefore he made not ſo great prouiſion for his defenſe, as had béene neceſſarie in ſo dangerous a caſe. But the Frenchmen, who were bent to ſet forward this war with all diligence, were readie in the field immediatlie vpon the comming of the ſpring with king Henrie the ſonne, and euen at one inſtant made their inuaſions vpon the lands of king Henrie the father in thrée ſeuerall parties; namelie, in Normandie, Guien, and Britaine, which (againſt the will of his ſonne Geffrey duke thereof) king Henrie the father did hold and reteine in his owne hands. The Frenchmen thus inuading the forſaid countries, did much hurt with robbing and ſpoiling, and alſo tooke diuerſe caſtels and townes.

The confederats inuade yͤ dominions of king Henrie the father.

The king of Scots inuadeth Cumberland.

Moreouer, about the ſame time, William king of Scotland entred with a great power, firſt into Cumberland, and beſieged Carleil: but hearing that an armie was prepared againſt him in the ſouth parties of the realme, and readie to ſet forward, he raiſed his ſiege, and entred into Northumberland (which prouince king Henrie the ſonne had giuen him in the laſt aſſemblie holden at Paris) endeuouring to bring it into his poſſeſſion. But the more earneſtlie he went about to inforce the people to his will, the more ſtiflie did they withſtand his purpoſe, hating him ſo much, that in no condition they were willing to come vnder his rule, whereby the Scots were put backe and repelled, and that to their great loſſe. The kings power alſo comming into the countrie followed them, and paſſing ouer the water of Twéed, which diuided then (as it doth at this daie) the two realmes, made the like ſpoile in the land of the enimies, as they had made in the countries of Northumberland and Cumberland.

Vernueil beſieged.

Hugh Beauchampe.

But in Normandie, whileſt others in other places, made their hand in fetching preies and booties out of the enimies countrie, king Lewes beſieged Vernueil, which towne being ſtrong of it ſelfe, Hugh Beauchampe and others that had charge thereof valiantlie defended, ſo that the French king was a moneth before it, yer he could win anie part thereof. This towne of Vernueil was in thoſe daies diuided into thrée portions, beſide the caſtell, euerie of them apart from other with mightie wals and déepe ditches full of water. One of theſe parts was called the great Burrow without the wals, where the French king had pitcht his field & planted his engins. About a moneth after thoſe cõming thither, vittels began to faile them within, ſo that at length they required a truce onlie for thrée daies, & if no ſuccour came within thoſe thrée daies, they promiſed to yéeld that part of the towne called the great Burrow, & the peremptorie daie was the vigill or éeue of S. Laurence. Hereupon were hoſtages deliuered by the burgeſſes vnto the French king. Now it was agréed that if they yéelded the towne at the daie appointed for want of ſuccor, king Henrie the ſon, and Robert the French kings brother, with the earls of Trois & Blois, Henrie and Theobald, and William archbiſh. of Sens, vndertooke vpon their othes that the hoſtages ſhould then be reſtored frée & without any hurt or damage.

King Henrie being certified from them within of the compoſition thus made, was driuen to a verie hard ſhift: for he doubted nothing leſſe than that any ſuch thing ſhould haue chanced. Yet conſidering with himſelfe, that the ſauing of the towne ſtood in his ſpéedie comming to the reſcue, he haſted thither without any ſtaie, and came to the place the daie before the third and laſt daie of the truce. King Lewes perceiuing him to be come, doubting leaſt he ſhould loſe the preie which he looked for, ſent vnto the king, and required that he might common with him on the next daie, touching ſome means of agréement to be had betwixt him and his ſons. This did he of policie, to féed him with hope of ſome end to be made in the troubles betwixt him and his ſons, till he had gotten poſſeſſion of the towne.

The French king requireth to talke.

Now as he forecaſt that matter, euen ſo it came to paſſe, for whileſt a great péece of the next daie was ſpent in feined talke about an agréement; K. Lewes appointed a great part of his hoſt to cloſe the towne about, and to declare vnto them within, that king Henrie was put to flight; which talke they within Vernueil beléeuing, yéelded the towne & themſelues to the Frenchmen. Soone after, king Lewes miſtruſting leaſt he ſhould not be able to kéepe it, ſet it on fire, and ſo burnt it, contrarie to the compoſition betwixt him and them agréed and concluded vpon. He kept alſo the ſouldiers that had yéelded it into his hands, togither with the hoſtages as priſoners, and doubting to cope with his enimie, went awaie in the night with as ſtill noiſe as was poſſible. Which euill dealing had not inuaded his hart, but that euill meaning had poſſeſſed it before, euen at the compoſition making: but he neuer learned that,

Fidem qui perdit nihil poteſt vltra perdere.

King Henrie at length perceiuing the fraud, ſent certeine bands of his horſſemen after to purſue the enimie: but for that king Lewes was alreadie gotten into the inner parts of his owne countrie, thoſe which were ſent, turned vpon thoſe that were left in the hindermoſt ward, of whome they ſlue a great number both horſſemen and footmen.

K. Henrie following his men, came to Vernueil, and ſtaieng there that night, tooke order for the repairing and new fortifieng of the towne. On the morrow after he went to the caſtell of Danuille, and wan it, taking diuerſe knights and yeomen within it: this caſtell belonged to one Gilbert de Tileres. And thus it came to paſſe touching the attempt of the French king for the winning of Vernueil, as in ſome authors we find reported. ¶ Other write otherwiſe of the mater, as thus, the French K. being ſummoned by K. Henrie the father, either to depart from the ſiege of Vernueil, or to looke for battell, & hearing alſo that in performance of the meſſage K. Henrie approched with his power, he ſent a biſhop & an abbat vnto him to vnderſtand if he meant to giue battell in déed. The meſſengers met king Henrie as he was aduanced before his hoſt vpon ſome occaſion, with a ſmall companie about him, vnto whome they declared that their maiſter the French king required to be aſſured whether he ſhould haue battell or no. King Henrie armed as he was, with fierce countenance and dreadfull voice made this ſhort anſwere; Get you hence, and tell your king that I am here at hand. The meſſengers returning to their maiſter, declared what they had ſéene and heard. Whereupon (without longer ſtaie) he raiſed his field, and with a gallant and mightie armie departed home to his great diſhonour, not winning the towne at all, as by the ſame author it ſhould appéere.

Albemarle woon by the earle of Flanders.

About the ſame time the earle of Flanders, one of the confederats beſieged the towne of Albemarle, and the earle thereof within it, which earle was thought to betraie the towne, bicauſe it was ſo eaſilie woone, and both he himſelfe, and thoſe which king Henrie the father had ſent thither to defend the towne were taken priſoners. The earle o Bullongne wounded, and dieth.

After this towne of Newcaſtell (otherwiſe called Drincourt) in thoſe frontiers was beſieged, and finallie woone by ſurrender, by the ſaid earle of Flanders, who reioiſed nothing at the gaine of that towne: for his brother Matthew the earle of Bullongne who ſhould haue béene his heire, was ſhot into the knée with an arrow, as he approched to the wals, and died of the hurt within a few daies after. The earle of Flanders was ſo penſiſe for his brothers death, that he brake vp his iournie and returned, blaming his euill hap and follie in that he had attempted war againſt his coſen germane king Henrie, who neuer had harmed him, but rather had doone him manie great and ſingular pleaſures from time to time.

¶ Good cauſe had the earle to giue ouer the proſequuting of violence againſt his ſoueraigne, being dawnted with ſo heauie a chance, & griped alſo with the grudge of conſcience, in ſo vnkindlie rewarding his welwiller, at whoſe hands he confeſſed himſelfe to haue receiued manie a benefit. Wherein we are to note, that ingratitude neuer hurteth anie ſo much as him or them in whom it is neſtled. And hereto alludeth the comedie-writer, when he ſaith verie neatlie, the caſtell of Dole in Britaine, and there making warre, brought all the countrie into trouble, he ſent forth ſtreightwaies certeine of his capteines with the Brabanders to aid his people in thoſe parts who on the twentith day of Auguſt (being monday) encountring with the enimies, diſcomfited them in battell, tooke ſeauenteene knights, beſides diuerſe others both horſſemen and footmen, ſlue aboue fifteene hundred of the enimies being Britaines, and purſuing the reſidue, entred the towne which they wan, and droue their aduerſaries into the caſtell, where they beſieged them, and with all ſpeed aduertiſed the king of that enterpriſe, who immediatlie with all poſſible haſt came thither, applieng his whole diligence to win the place, that he might haue them which were within the ſame at his commandement.

Rog. Houed.

To be ſhort, it was not long yer he had his deſire, for being ſuch a multitude, that they were not able long to continue within ſo ſtreict a roome, for want of vittell they fell to a compoſition, yeelding the caſtell vnto the king, their bodies liues and lims ſaued, on the 25. day of Auguſt. There were taken within this caſtell 80. knights, beſides yeomen and other common ſouldiers. In like maner, and with the ſemblable good fortune, about the ſame time, his capteins in England ouercame his enimies: for whereas Robert earle of Leiceſter that tooke part with king Henrie the ſonne, had aſſembled at the towne of Leiceſter a great hoſt of men, in purpoſe to ſet vpon Reignold earle of Cornewall and Richard Lucie capteines on the ſide of king Henrie the father: they vnderſtanding his meaning, marched ſtreight towards Leiceſter, and by the way met with their enimie earle Robert, whome they ſo fiercelie aſſailed, that they put him to flight, and after approching the towne, had it ſurrendered vnto them, permitting the inhabitants to depart with bag and baggage, and then burned the towne: but the caſtell (which in thoſe daies was of great ſtrength by reaſon of the ſituation) they could not win.

The earle of Leiceſter put to flight.

Howbeit ſome write, that by vndermining, the walles of the towne were ſubuerted and throwne downe, ſo that the towne was entred by force, although they within withdrew themſelues into the caſtell and other ſtrong houſes, which they defended for a time, till at length they ſurrendered all, one parcell of the caſtell excepted, for the which by compoſition they paied by way of a fine the ſum of three hundred pounds to the vſe of K. Henrie the father. The ſiege began the ſeauenth day of Iulie, and on the 28. day of the ſame moneth the armie departed from thence, a truce being granted to thoſe that ſtill defended a certeine tower of the caſtell into the which they were withdrawne.

The Engliſh armie folowing him, waſted the countrie of Louthian, till at length by mediation of certeine religious men, a truce was granted to the Scots to indure till the feaſt of S. Hilarie. For the which truce happilie ſome rewards went betwixt, and ſo the Engliſh lords with ſpoiles and gaines returned homewards.

A truce.

A few daies after theſe luckie chances thus happening to king Henrie, king Lewes perceiuing fortune to be on that ſide, determined to aſſaie whether he could obteine his purpoſe by ſome means of treatie, or at the leaſt put king Henrie in hope of a peace for a time, knowing that he would rather ſuffer all diſcommodities whatſoeuer, than once to trie the matter by battell with his ſonnes: wherefore he offered to come to a communication with him betwixt Giſors and Trie, ſhewing bread in the one hand (as they ſay) and hiding a ſtone in the other.

Rog. Houed. A treatie of peace.

King Henrie was eaſilie intreated to heare of anie talke for peace, and therefore comming to the place on tueſdaie the fifteenth daie of September, made ſo large offers, that he had almoſt conuerted the yoong mens minds vnto concord. Firſt he offered to his ſonne Henrie the yoong king, the moitie or one halfe of all the reuenues belonging to the demaines of the crowne within England, and foure conuenient caſtels within the ſame. Or if his ſonne had rather remaine in Normandie, he offered the halfe of all the reuenues of that dutchie, with all the rents and profits that were his fathers perteining to the earledome of Aniou, with certeine caſtels in Normandie, one caſtell in Aniou, one in Maine, and one in Towraine. To his ſonne Richard, he offered halfe the reuenues of Guien, and foure conuenient caſtels in the ſame. And to his ſonne Geffrey he offered all thoſe lands that belonged by right of inheritance vnto the daughter of Conan erle of Britaine, if he might by the popes good licence marrie hir. And further king Henrie the father yeelded himſelfe to ſtand to the order of the archbiſhop of Tharent and other the popes legats, not refuſing to giue his ſonnes what rents and reuenues ſoeuer they ſhould ſay were reaſonable, reſeruing onelie to himſelfe the adminiſtration of iuſtice, and the power roiall.

Rog. Houed. The offer of K. Henrie the father to his ſonnes.

Theſe ſeemed to be large offers, but yet they could not be accepted. For certeine ſonnes of Beliall, ſet vpon nothing but miſcheefe, troublers of common peace and quietneſſe, wrought ſo with them, that no conditions of peace (were the ſame neuer ſo reaſonable) could content them, ſo that without effect this communication brake vp, but not without contumelious words paſſed betwixt the parties, inſomuch that the earle of Leiceſter (who being put from all his aid in England, was come ouer to the French king to purchaſe aid at his hands) could not reſtraine but giuing credit to the old adage,

The earle of Leiceſter offred to ſtrike the king.

On the morrow after, the French and Engliſh ſkirmiſhed togither betwixt Curſeils and Giſors, in which conflict Enguerane Chaſtillone de Trie was taken priſoner by earle William de Mandéuille, who preſented him to the king of England. King Lewes though he iudged it his part to preſerue his ſonne in law from danger, yet he ment nothing leſſe than to ioine battell with the Engliſh at that preſent. But within a few daies after, he ſent Robert earle of Leiceſter into England with an armie of Flemings and others, there to ioine with Hugh Bigot, that both of them might as well by force as faire promiſes and gentle perſuaſions bring the whole realme vnto the obedience of king Henrie the ſonne.

The earle of Leiceſter therefore landing at Walton the 21. of September, paſſed through the countrie vnto Fremingham, where he was receiued of Hugh Bigot earle of Northfolke; and after that an other fleet of Flemings were arriued for their aid, they went vnto Gipſwich, where when they had remained a few daies, and augmented their forces by certeine bands of men of warre that belonged vnto earle Bigot, they went to the caſtell of Haghenet

After this, hearing that the counteſſe of Leiceſter was arriued at Orceford with an other power of Flemings, they went to méet hir: and ſo the earle of Leiceſter, hauing now a ſtrong armie about him, tooke leaue of earle Bigot, and ment to paſſe through the countrie into Leiceſterſhire, there to ſuccour his freends, and to worke ſome feat for the behoofe and furtherance of their quarell.

Rog.Houed.

In the meane time the arriuall of the earle of Leiceſter being knowne, the people of the countrie were aſſembled togither. Alſo Richard Lucie lord chéefe iuſtice, and Humfrey de Boun high coneſtable of England, with the kings power of horſſemen which latelie before had béene in Scotland and made inrodes there (as before is mentioned) came with all ſpéed to ſaue the countrie from ſpoile, hauing firſt taken a truce (as before is ſaid) with the king of Scots, till the feaſt of Saint Hilarie next enſuing (or rather Eſter) hoſtages being deliuered on both ſides. Upon knowledge then had where the enimies were lodged, and what they intended to doo, the ſaid Richard Lucie ⁊ Humfrey de Boun came to Saint Edmundſburie, whither Reignold earle of Cornewall the kings vncle, Robert earle of Gloceſter, and William erle of Arundell reſorted.

Rog.Houed.

In the meane while, the earle of Leiceſter paſſed forward on his waie ſo farre as Fornham a little village beſide S. Edmundſburie. The lord chéefe iuſtice ⁊ the earls before mentioned with a great armie, and amongſt others the ſaid Humfrey de Boun, who had the leading of 300. knights, or men of armes at the kings wages, came out of S. Edmundſburie, hauing the baner of S. Edmund borne before them, ⁊ in a mariſh ground betwixt Fornham ⁊ Edmundſburie, they encountred with the ſaid earle of Leiceſter, and after long and cruell fight diſcomfited his people, and tooke him priſoner, togither with his wife the counteſſe Petronill, after he had doone all that belonged to a valiant capteine.

Some write that there were killed on that day of his people to the number of ten thouſand [and almoſt as manie taken] verelie [all the footmen of the Flemings being in number foure or fiue thouſand were either taken or ſlaine:] the reſidue that eſcaped fled towards Leiceſter, that they might both defend the towne ⁊ themſelues from the danger of their foes.

Wil.Paruus.

¶ But here is to be noted, that it ſéemeth by the report of ſome writers, how the earle of Leiceſter had not ſo great an armie there at that battell, as by others account of the number ſlaine and taken it ſhould appeare he had. For at his departure from his companion in armes Hugh Bigot, he tooke vpon him to paſſe through the countrie (as ſome write) partlie vpon truſt that he had of the force and number of his ſouldiers, being about foure or fiue thouſand ſtout and valiant footmen, beſides 80 choſen and well appointed horſſemen; and partlie in hope that manie of thoſe which were in his aduerſaries campe, would rather turne to him than fight againſt him.

He had a great confidence in the Flemings, who indéed preſumed much vpon their owne ſtrength, ſo that they made account of ſome great conqueſt, in ſuch wiſe, that when they came into any large plaine where they might reſt, they would take ech others by the hand, and leading a danſe, ſing in their countrie language,

King Henrie receiuing aduertiſement of the victorie which his capteines had thus gotten in England, was maruellous ioifull, and commanded that the priſoners ſhould be brought ouer vnto him into Normandie: which being doone, he went into Aniou, and there fortified the towns and caſtels of the countrie with ſure garriſons of men, to reſiſt all ſudden inuaſions, ſecret practiſes, and other attempts of the enimies. 1174

King Henrie the father held his Chriſtmaſſe this yeare at Caen in Normandie, about which time a truce was made betwixt him and king Lewes to endure till Eaſter, or (as others write) for the terme of ſix moneths. For ye haue to vnderſtand, that the fame of the victorie gotten by the capteines of king Henrie the father againſt the earle of Leiceſter (being not onlie ſpred through England, but alſo blown ouer into France) put thoſe that tooke part with him in great feare; but ſpeciallie king Lewes miſtruſting the matter began to war wearie that he had attempted ſo far, and ſuſteined ſo great trauell and expenſes in another mans cauſe.

Ger.Dor.

Whileſt this truce indured, the archbiſhop of Canturburie being readie to returne home in deſpaire of his buſineſſe, vpon a feigned rumor ſpred that there was a peace concluded betwixt the two kings, the father and ſonne, he was called backe and conſecrated by the pope the ſundaie after Eaſter: and then furniſhed with the dignities of primat and legat of England, and other priuileges according, he tooke his waie homewards towards England, after he had laid forth great ſummes of monie to diſappoint the purpoſes of his aduerſaries.

This yeare in June, the lord Geffrey the elect of Lincolne the kings ſonne beſieged the caſtell which Roger de Mowbray had repaired at Kinard Ferie, within the Ile of Oxholme, and compelling the ſouldiers within to yéeld, he beat downe and raced the ſame caſtell vnto the verie ground. Robert Mowbray coneſtable of that caſtell, as he paſſed thorough the countrie towards Leiceſter, there to procure ſome aid, was taken by the men of Claie, and kept as priſoner. Moreouer, the ſaid elect of Lincolne tooke the caſtell of Maleſert that belonged to the ſaid Roger Mowbray, which being now taken, was deliuered vnto the kéeping of the archbiſhop of Yorke. The ſaid elect alſo fortified a caſtell at Topclife, and tooke it to the kéeping of William Stuteuille. In this meane while the king tooke the ſtrengths and fortreſſes which his ſonne Richard had fortified at Xanctes, and in the ſame forts and church (which was alſo fortified againſt him) 60. knights or men of armes, and 400. archbaliſters, that is, the beſt of them that bare croſſebowes.

Philip earle of Flanders in the preſence of the French king and other the peeres of France, laieng his hand vpon the holie relikes, ſware that within 15. daies next inſuing the feaſt of S. Iohn then inſtant to enter England with an armie, and to doo his beſt to ſubdue the ſame to king Henrie the ſon. Vpon truſt whereof the yong king the more preſuming came downe to Whitſand, the 14. daie of Iulie, that he might from thence ſend ouer into England Rafe de la Haie with certeine bands of ſouldiers. Before this the earle of Flanders had ſent ouer 318. knights or men of armes, as we may call them. But after their arriuall at Orwell, which chanced the 14. of Iune, by reaſon that their aſſociats were diſperſed, and for the more part ſubdued, they tooke with them earle Hugh Bigot, and marching to Norwich, aſſaulted the citie and wan it, gaining there great riches, and ſpeciallie in readie monie, and led awaie a great ſort of priſoners whome they ranſomed at their pleaſure. This chanced the 18. of Iune.

Math. Paris. Ger. Dor.

¶ I remember that William Paruus writeth, that the citie of Norwich was taken by the Flemings that came ouer with the earle of Leiceſter in the yeare laſt paſt, by the conduct of the ſaid earle before he was taken, and that after he had taken that citie, being accompanied with earle Bigot, he led thoſe Flemings alſo vnto Dunwich, purpoſing to win and ſacke that towne alſo: but the inhabitants being better prouided againſt the comming of their enimies than they of Norwich were, ſhewed ſuch countenance of defenſe, that they preſerued their towne from that danger, ſo that the two earles with Flemings were conſtreined to depart without atchiuing their purpoſe. But whether that this attempt againſt Dunwich was made by the earle of Leiceſter (before his taking) in companie of earle Bigot, I haue not to auouch. But verelie for the winning of Norwich, I ſuppoſe that William Paruus miſtaketh the time, except we ſhall ſaie that it was twiſe taken, as firſt by the earle of Leiceſter in the yeare 1173. For it is certeine by conſent of moſt writers, and eſpeciallie thoſe that haue recorded particularlie the incidents that chanced here in this land during theſe troubles betwixt the king and his ſons, that it was taken now this yeare 1174. by earle Bigot (as before we haue ſhewed.)

But now to procéed. The lords that had the rule of the land for king Henrie the father, perceiuing earle Bigots procéedings, ſent knowledge thereof with all expedition to the king, as yet remaining in the parties beyond the ſeas. Whileſt theſe things were a dooing, although the minds of manie of the conſpirators againſt king Henrie the father were inclined to peace, yet Roger Mowbray, and Hugh Bigot (by reaſon of this new ſupplie of men got out of Flanders) ceaſſed not to attempt freſh exploits: and chéeflie they ſolicited the matter in ſuch wiſe with William king of Scotland, that whileſt they in other quarters of the realme plaied their parts, he entred into the confines of Cumberland, and firſt beſieged the citie of Carleil, but perceiuing he could not win it in any ſhort time, he left one part of his armie to keepe ſiege before it, and with the reſidue marched into the countrie alongſt by the riuer of Eden, taking by force the caſtels of Bourgh and Aplebie, with diuerſe other. This doone, he paſſed ouer the riuer, and came through Northumberland (waſting the countrie as he went) vnto Alnewike, which place he attempted to win, though his labour therein proued but in vaine.

He had giuen his eldeſt ſonne in hoſtage vnto the ſaid king of Scots for aſſurance of ſuch couenants to be kept on his behalfe as were paſſed betwixt them. In the meane time one Duncane or Rothland, with an other part of the Scotiſh armie entered into Kendall, and waſted that countrie in moſt cruell wiſe, neither ſparing age nor ſex, inſomuch that he brake into the churches, ſlue thoſe that were fled into the ſame for ſafegard of their liues as well préeſts as other. Hereupon riding foorth one morning, there aroſe ſuch a thicke fog and miſt that they could not diſcerne any waie about them, ſo that doubting to fall within the laps of their enimies at vnwares, they ſtaied a while to take aduiſe what ſhould be beſt for them to doo. Now when they were almoſt fullie reſolued to haue turned backe againe, by the comfortable words and bold exhortation of Bernard Balliolle, they changed their purpoſe, and rode forward, till at length the northerne wind began to waken, and droue awaie the miſt, ſo that the countrie was diſcouered vnto them, and perceiuing where Alnewike ſtood, not knowing as yet whether the Scots had wone it or not, they ſtaied their pace, and riding ſoftlie, at length learning by the inhabitants of the countrie, that the Scotiſh king deſpairing to win Alnewike, had raiſed his ſiege from thence the ſame day, they turned ſtreight thither, and lodging there all night, in the morning got to their horſſes verie earelie, riding foorth towards the enimies that were ſpred abroad in the countrie to forrey the ſame. They had anon eſpied where the king was, and incontinentlie compaſſed him about on euerie ſide, who perceiuing the Engliſh horſſemen readie thus to aſſaile him, with all diligence called backe his men from the ſpoile; but the more part of them being ſtraied far off through the ſwéetnes they found in getting of preies, could not heare the ſound of the trumpets, yet notwithſtanding with thoſe his horſſemen which he could get togither, he encountred the Engliſh men which came vpon him verie haſtilie.

This chanced a little after whitſuntide.

In the meane while and ſomewhat before this time, the earle of Leiceſters men, which laie at Leiceſter vnder the conduct of Robert Ferreis earle of Darbie (as ſome write) or rather of Anketille Malorie conſtable or gouernour (if we ſhall ſo call him, as Roger Houeden ſaith) came to Northampton, where they fought with them of that towne, and getting the victorie, tooke two hundred priſoners, and ſlue or wounded néere hand as manie more, and ſo with this good ſucceſſe in that enterpriſe returned againe to Leiceſter, from whence they firſt ſet forth. The kings horſſemen hereupon came ſtreightwaies to Northampton, and following the enimies, could not ouertake them.

Notingham taken.

Robert Ferreis earle of Darbie being now come vnto Leiceſter in aid of them that laie there, ſtaied not paſt ten daies: but finding meanes to increaſe his number of horſſemen, ſuddenlie made to Notingham, which Reignold de Lucie had in kéeping, and comming thither earelie in the morning tooke it, droue out the kings ſouldiers that laie there in gariſon, burned the towne, ſlue the inhabitants, and diuided their goods amongſt his ſouldiers: which thing put the countrie about in ſuch feare, that manie of the inhabitants ſubmitted themſelues vnto him.

Wil.Paruus.

King Henrie the ſonne being hereof aduertiſed by letters oftentimes ſent vnto him by this Robert Ferreis, and other his fréends here in England, eftſoones conceiued ſome good hope to obteine his purpoſe: and therefore determined to prepare for the warre. Hereupon he purchaſed aid of king Lewes, who (bicauſe the truce which he had taken with king Henrie the father was now expired) thought it was reaſon to further his ſonne in lawes enterpriſe ſo farre as in him laie. Wherfore he made his prouiſion at Graueling, and there incamping with his people, ſtaied till his ſhips were readie to tranſport him and his armie, which conſiſted of certeine horſſemen, and of a number of Brabanders.

King Henrie the father being informed both of his ſonnes purpoſe, and of the doings in England, with all poſſible ſpéed determined to paſſe ouer into England, and therefore got his ſouldiers a ſhipboord, among whom were certeine bands of his Brabanders: and ſo ſoone as the wind blew to his mind, he cauſed the ſailes to be hoiſed vp, and the nauie to ſet forward. Being landed, he repaired firſt vnto Canturburie, there to make his praiers, doubting leaſt the bloud of the archbiſhop Thomas Becket being ſhed through his occaſion, did yet require vengeance againſt him for that fact. From Canturburie he came to London, and tooke order for the placing of capteins with their bands in certeine townes about the coaſt, to defend the landing places, where he thought his ſonne was like to arriue. Then went he to Huntington, and ſubdued the caſtell there the 19. of Iulie: for the knights and other ſouldiers that were within it yéelded themſelues to the kings mercie, their liues and lims ſaued.

After this, aſſembling his people on all ſides, he made his generall muſters at S. Edmundſburie, and determined to beſiege the caſtels of Bunghey and Fremingham, which the earle Hugh Bigot held againſt him, who miſtruſting that he was not able to defend himſelfe and thoſe places againſt the king, agréed with the king to haue peace, paieng him the ſumme of a thouſand markes by compoſition. This agréement was concluded the 25. of Iulie. Hereupon a multitude of the Flemings which Philip earle of Flanders had ſent into England (as before is mentioned) vpon their oth receiued, not afterwards to come as enimies into England, had licence to returne into their countrie. Alſo the bands of ſouldiers that came into the realme with Raſe de la Haie departed without impechment by the kings ſufferance.

The king of Scots preſented to the king of England.

The earle of Glocester.
The earle Richard of Clar

The king hauing thus accompliſhed that which ſtood with his pleaſure in thoſe parties, remoued from thence and drew towards Northampton. To which towne after his comming thither, the king of Scots was brought with his féet bound vnder the horſſes bellie. Thither alſo came the biſhop of Durham, and deliuered to the king the caſtels of Durham, Norham, and Allerton. Thither alſo came to the king Roger Mowbraie, and ſurrendred to him the caſtell of Treſke, and Robert earle Ferreis deliuered vp into his hands the caſtels of Tutburie and Duffield, and Anketill Mallorie, and William de Diue conſtables to the earle of Leiceſter yéelded to the king the caſtels of Ciceſter, Grobie, and Mountſorell, to the intent that he ſhould deale more courteouſlie with the earle their maiſter. Alſo William earle of Gloceſter, and earle Richard of Clare ſubmitted themſelues to the king, and ſo he brought all his aduerſaries within the realme of England vnto ſuch ſubiection as he himſelfe wiſhed; ſo that the king hauing atchiued the vpper hand of his enimies returned to London.

¶ All this hurlie burlie and bloudie tumult, was partlie to be aſcribed to the king himſelfe, who ouer tenderlie fauouring his ſonne, did deiect and abaſe himſelfe to aduance the other; partlie to the ambitious diſpoſition of the youth, who was charged with roialtie, before he had learned ſufficient loialtie, elſe would he not haue made inſurrections againſt his father, that himſelf might obteine the monarchie, and the old king doo him homage: and partlie to the quéenes diſcontented or rather malicious mind, whoſe dutie it had béene (notwithſtanding ſuch diſhonour doone hir by the king in abuſing his bodie vnlawfullie) ſo little to haue thought of ſtirring commotions betwixt the father and the ſonnes, that ſhe ſhould rather haue lulled the contention aſléepe, and doone what ſhe poſſiblie could to quench the feruent fier of ſtrife with the water of pacification. Rouen beſieged by the Frēch king.
Wil.Paruus.

But to procéed, king Lewes being aduertiſed that there was no great number of men of war left in Normandie to defend the countrie, raiſed a power, and comming to Rouen, beſieged it verie ſtreitlie. Shortlie after alſo king Henrie the ſonne and Philip earle of Flanders came thither, meaning to obteine the poſſeſſion of Normandie firſt, and after to go into England. The citizens of Rouen perceiuing in what danger they ſtood, without faint harts prepared all things neceſſarie for defenſe, and did euerie thing in order, purpoſing not to giue ouer their citie for anie threats or menaces of their enimies. Now whileſt they within were buſie in deuiſing how to repell the aſſault, and to defend themſelues, the aduerſaries about midnight came forth of their campe, and approching the walles with their ladders, raiſed them vp, and began to ſcale the citie. But the citizens being aduiſed thereof, boldlie got them to the loops and towers, ouerthrew the ladders of the enimies that were comming vp, and with arrowes, ſtones and darts beat them backe, to their great loſſe and ouerthrow. Howbeit though the enimies could not preuaile thus to get the citie by this aſſault, yet they continued the ſiege, and ſuffered not them within to be in quiet, but daie and night aſſailed them by one meanes or other.

Rog.Houed.
King Henrie returneth into Normandie.

King Henrie the father being aduertiſed héereof, after he had ſet his buſineſſe in order, touching the ſuertie and ſafe defenſe of the Engliſh eſtate, he returned into Normandie, and landed at Harfleet on a thurſdaie being the eight daie of Auguſt, bringing backe againe with him his Brabanders, and a thouſand Welſhmen. In this meane while, king Lewes continued ſtill his ſiege before Rouen, conſtreining them within by all meanes he could deuiſe to yeeld vp their citie. At length came the feaſt of Saint Laurence, on which daie the French king commanded that no man ſhould attempt any enterpriſe againſt the citizens, granting them truce for that day, in worſhip of that ſaint. This truce was ſo acceptable a thing to them within, that they forgetting themſelues, without all reſpect to the danger wherein the citie ſtood, threw off their armour, and gaue themſelues to ſléepe and reſt. Some alſo fell to banketting and other paſtimes in verie diſſolute maner.

¶ But through this their remiſſe vſage and loſe behauiour, and forgetting that a temporarie truce is no ſafe warrant of ſecuritie and peace, they deriued danger and deſtruction to themſelues; which it had béene their parts prouidentlie to haue preuented, and not through their careleſneſſe to ſet open a gap of aduantage to their enimies, who purſued them with profeſſed hoſtilitie, notwithſtanding they repoſed confidence in the truce that was granted. Héerein they are to be reſembled to the cooks of whome Plautus ſpeaketh verie neatlie, ſaieng,

Meaning ſobrietie: ſo theſe delighting more in their diſhes, than miſtruſting their enimies, remembred to take the vſe of any pleaſure that the conuenientneſſe of this preſent time might proffer; onelie as cookes among all their ſawces do mind nothing leſſe than ſoberneſſe: ſo theſe in the abundance of their ioies, thought nothing of afterclaps, which afterwards made them (like fooles) to ſing an vnhappie had I wiſt. For the Frenchmen, perceiuing this their negligence, required licence of the French king to giue aſſault to the citie, declaring in what ſtate the matter preſentlie ſtood; who not meaning to violate the reuerence of that day, and his promiſed faith, with any ſuch vnlawfull attempt, commanded his men of warre that made the requeſt in no wiſe to ſtirre. Howbeit the ſouldiers vpon couetouſneſſe of the ſpoile, raiſed the ladders to that part of the wall which they iudged to be moſt without warders, ſo that ſome of them mounting aloft, got vp, and were about to helpe vp their fellowes.

The Frenchmen aſſault the citie, without commandement of their king.
Two préeſts.

Now it happened (as God would haue it) that two préeſts being gone vp into the ſteeple of the chéefe church, to looke about them for their pleaſures, fortuned to ſée where the French men were about to enter the citie, and ſtreightwaies gaue knowledge to the citizens beneath. Wherevpon the alarum roſe, inſomuch that with all ſpéed the people ran to the place, and with ſuch violence came vpon their enimies which were entred vpon the walles, that ſtreightwaies they ſlue manie of them, and chaſed the reſidue out of the ditches, ſo that they returned with bléeding wounds to their campe, repenting them of their vnhappie enterpriſe, that turned them to ſuch wo and gréeuance.

The Frenchmen are repelled.

Polydor.

The ſame day a little before night, king Henrie the father came vnto Rouen, and was receiued into the citie with great ioy and gladneſſe: for he came thither by chance, euen about the time that the citie had thus like to haue bin ſurpriſed & taken at vnwares.

Matt.Paris.

¶ There be that write, how the French king (immediatlie vpon the arriuall of king Henrie) left his field and departed, greatlie to his diſhonor, burning vp his engines of warre, and not ſtaieng till his men might haue leiſure to charge their wagons with their armor and other ſtuffe, which they were glad to leaue behind for a prey to the Engliſh men iſſuing forth vpon them. But other declare, that the French king being nothing abaſhed of king Henries comming, continued the ſiege, in hope to win the citie.

The next day earlie in the morning (or as other ſay in the night ſeaſon) the king did ſend forth a certeine number of Welſhmen to paſſe ouer the riuer of Saine, which they did, and by force made themſelues waie through the French campe, getting without loſſe or danger vnto a great wood, and ſlue that day of their aduerſaries aboue an hundred men. After this, lieng abroad in the countrie, they ſkirmiſhed dailie with the French horſſemen, and oft times cut off ſuch prouiſion of vittels as came to nouriſh the campe. The king himſelfe on the other ſide remaining within the citie, cauſed his people to iſſue out at the gates, and to kéepe the enimies occupied with ſkirmiſhes afore the citie. And moreouer, where there was a great trench caſt betwixt the French campe and the walles of the citie, he cauſed the ſame to be filled vp with fagots, ſtones, and earth. But although the French men ſawe this the kings déed well enough, yet none of them iſſued forth of their tents to hinder the Engliſh of their purpoſe.

A truce.

Now king Lewes being ſore vexed with his enimies on ech ſide, and perceiuing the citie would not be woone within any ſhort time, began to wax wearie, and to repent himſelfe (as afore) for taking in hand ſo chargeable and great a warre for another mans quarell. Wherevpon he cauſed William biſhop of Sens, and Theobald earle of Blois to go to king Henrie, and to promiſe vpon forbearance from warre for a time, to find means to reconcile him and his ſonnes, betwéene whome vnnaturall variance reſted. Whereof K. Henrie being moſt deſirous, and taking a truce, appointed to come to Giſors [in the feaſt of the natiuitie of our ladie] there to meet king Lewes, that they might talke of the matter and bring it to ſome good end.

The French king leaueth his ſiege.

The French king, ſo ſoone as he knew that truce was taken, raiſed his ſiege, and returning home, within a few daies after (according to the appointment) came to Giſors, and there communed with king Henrie: but bicauſe he could not make any agréement betwixt him and his ſonnes at that time, he appointed another time to meet about it. King Henrie the father (whileſt the truce continued with the French king) and his ſonne Henrie went to Poictou, where his ſonne Richard (whileſt his father had béene occupied in other places) had gotten the moſt part of the countrie into his poſſeſſion. But now hearing of his fathers comming, and that a truce was taken with the French king and with his brother, he conſidered with himſelfe, that without their aſſiſtance he was not able to withſtand his fathers power. Howbeit at length chooſing rather to trie the matter with force of armes, than cowardlie to yéeld, he prepared for defenſe, furniſhing diuerſe townes and caſtels with gariſons of men: and aſſembling togither all the other power that he was able to make, came into the field, & pitched his tents not far off from his father. In the meane while, which way ſoeuer his father paſſed, the townes and caſtels ſubmitted themſelues vnto him, ſo that Richard began to deſpaire of the matter, inſomuch that he durſt not approch néere his father, but kept alooſe, doubting to be entrapped.

He beginneth to deſpaire of good ſucceſſe.

Polydor.

At length when he had conſidered his owne ſtate, and weied how vnthankefullie the French king and his brother had dealt with him, in hauing no conſideration of him at ſuch time as they tooke truce, he determined to alter his purpoſe, and hauing ſome good hope in his fathers clemencie, thought beſt to trie it, which he found to be the beſt waie that he could haue taken. For oftentimes it chanceth, that latter thoughts are better aduiſed than the firſt, as the old ſaieng is,

Δεύτεραι φρόντιδες σοφότεραι.

The ſon ſubmitteth himſelfe to the father.

Herevpon Richard laieng armour aſide, came of his owne accord vnto his father on the 21. of September, and aſked pardon. His father moſt courteouſly receiuing him, made ſo much of him as though he had not offended at all. Which example of courteſie preuailed much to the alluring of his other ſons to come to a reconciliation. For the bringing whereof to ſpéedie effect, he ſent this Richard vnto king Lewes, and to his other ſonne Henrie, to commen with them of peace, at which time earle Richard did ſo effectuallie his meſſage, that he brought them both in good forwardneſſe to agrée to his fathers purpoſe, ſo that there was a daie appointed for them to méet with their father, betwixt Towres in Touraine and Ambois.

The father & ſonnes are accorded.

The conditions of the agréement.

King Henrie reioiſing hereat, kept his daie (being the morrow after the feaſt of S. Michaell) and there met him both king Lewes, and his two ſonnes Henrie and Geffrey, where finallie the father and the ſonnes were accorded; he promiſing to receiue them into fauour vpon theſe conditions.

1 Firſt the priſoners to be releaſed fréelie without ranſome on both ſides, and their offenſes, which had taken either the one part or the other, to be likewiſe pardoned.

R. Houed.

2 Out of this article were excepted all thoſe which before the concluding of this peace had alreadie compounded for their raunſomes, as the king of Scots, the earles of Leiceſter and Cheſter, and Rafe Fulgiers, with their pledges.

3 It was alſo agréed, that all thoſe caſtels which had béene builded in time of this warre, ſhould be raced and throwne downe; and all ſuch cities, townes, caſtels, countries and places, as had béene wonne by either part during theſe wars, ſhould be reſtored vnto thoſe perſons that held the ſame, and were in poſſeſſion of them 15. daies before the departure of the ſonnes from king Henrie the father.

4 That king Henrie the father ſhould aſſigne to his ſons more large reuenues for maintenance of their eſtates, with a caution included, that they ſhould not ſpend the ſame riotouſlie in any prodigall ſort or maner.

R. Houed.

5 To the king his ſonne, he gaue two caſtels in Normandie, with an increaſe of yearelie reuenues, to the ſumme of 15. thouſand pounds Aniouin.

Richard.

6 To his ſonne Richard he gaue two houſes in Poictou, with the one halfe of all the reuenues of the countie of Poictou to be receiued and taken in readie monie.

Geffrey.

7 And to his ſonne Geffrey he granted in monie, the moitie of that which he ſhould haue by the mariage of earle Conans daughter, and after he had maried hir by licence purchaſed of the pope, he ſhould enioy all the whole liuings and reuenues that deſcended to hir, as in hir fathers writing therof more at large was conteined.

8 On the other part, king Henrie the ſon couenanted to & with the king his father, that he would performe and confirme all thoſe gifts, which his father ſhould grant out of his lands, & alſo all thoſe gifts of lands which he either had made and aſſured, or hereafter ſhould make and aſſure vnto any of his men for any of their ſeruices: & likewiſe thoſe gifts which he had made vnto his ſonne Iohn the brother of king Henrie the ſonne; namelie, a thouſand pounds in lands by yeare in England of his demaine and eſcheats with the appurtenances, and the caſtell and countie of Notingham, with the caſtell of Marlebrough, & the appurtenances. Alſo a thouſand pounds Aniouin of yearelie reuenues in Normandie, and two caſtels there. And in Aniou a thouſand pounds Aniouin, of ſuch lands as belonged to the earle of Aniou, with one caſtell in Aniou, and one in Touraine, and another in Maine.

Iohn.

Thus were the father and ſons agréed and made fréends, the ſonnes couenanting neuer to withdraw their ſeruices and bounden dueties from their father, but to obeie him in all things from that day forward. Herewith alſo the peace was renewed betwixt king Henrie and king Lewes, and for the further confirmation, a new aliance was accorded betwixt them, which was, that the ladie Adela the daughter of king Lewes ſhould be giuen in mariage vnto earle Richard the ſonne of king Henrie, who bicauſe ſhe was not yet of age able to marie, ſhe was conueied into England to be vnder the guiding of king Henrie, till ſhe came to lawfull yeares.

A marriage concluded.

Thus the peace being concluded, king Henrie forgetting all iniuries paſſed, brought home his ſons in maner aforeſaid, who being well pleaſed with the agréement, attended their father into Normandie, where Richard and Geffrey did homage to him, receiuing their othes of allegiance according to the maner in that caſe required. But king Henrie the ſonne did no homage, for his father (in reſpect that he was a king) would not ſuffer him, and therefore tooke onelie ſureties of him for performance of the couenants on his part, as was thought expedient.

Wil. Paruus.

R. Houed. Wil. Paruus ſaieth that he did homage alſo.

¶ All this diſſention and ſtrife was kindled (no doubt) by the meanes of certeine ſowers of diſcord, ſycophants, paraſits, flatterers, clawbacks, & pickethanks, who had learned their leſſon, that

Principibus placuiſſe viris non vltima laus eſt, and thinking by their emboſſed ſpéech to tickle the eares and harts of the yong princes, who by reaſon of their yong yeares and nakedneſſe of experience in the courſe of worldlie maters, ſought their owne aduancement, euen by flinging firie faggots of diſſention betwéene them, whoſe harts naturall affection had vnited. For by the tenor of the ſtorie (marke it who will) we ſhall ſée that no attempt of the ſons againſt the father but had originall from the ſuggeſtions of euill diſpoſed perſons, who (like eeles that fatten not in faire running water, but in muddie motes and ponds) ſought honour in hurlie burlies, & reached out long armes to riches by manie a ones impoueriſhment. This to be true, the finall euent and iſſue prooueth; namelie, the mutuall attonement and reconciliation wouen betwéene the father and the ſonnes; their remorſe for their vndutifulnes, his louing fauour and gratiouſneſſe; their promptneſſe to yéeld to conditions of agréement, his forwardnes to giue conſent to couenants required; their readineſſe to doo the old king homage, his acceptable admiſſion miſſion of their proferred ſeruice; with other circumſtances to be collected out of the ſtorie, all which doo proue that this their diſloiall reſiſtance ſprang rather by others incitement, than of their owne ſeeking. Thus we ſee what alterations happen in the actions of men, and that euill things manie times (though naturallie bad) doo inferre their contraries, as one aptlie ſaith, Diſcordia fit charior concordia.

At length king Henrie went to Faleiſe, and there deliuered out of captiuitie William king of Scotland, Robert earle of Leiceſter, Hugh earle of Cheſter, with diuerſe other Noble men which were kept there as priſoners, putting them to their ranſomes, and receiuing of them pledges with an oth of allegiance. But yet ſome (as is alreadie ſpecified) were excepted out of the benefit of that article, as William king of Scotland, who being not able to paie his ranſome in preſent monie, deliuered vp in gage foure of the ſtrongeſt caſtels within his realme into king Henries hands; namelie, Barwike, Edenbourgh, Rorbourgh, and Sterling, with condition, that if he brake the peace, and paied not the monie behind due for his raunſome, king Henrie and his ſucceſſours ſhould enioy for euer the ſame caſtels. He alſo couenanted, not to receiue any Engliſh rebels into his realme. Other write that the king of Scots did not onelie become the king of Englands liegeman at this time, and couenanted to doo homage vnto him for the realme of Scotland, and all other his lands, but alſo deliuered the caſtels of Barwike, and Rorbourgh to be poſſeſſed of the ſame king of England and his heires for euer, without any couenant mentioned of morgage.

Things being ſetled thus in good order, king Henrie leauing his ſonne Henrie at Rouen, went to Argenton, and there held his Chriſtmaſſe, and afterwards, namelie in the feaſt of the purification of our ladie, both the kings (as well the father as the ſonne) were at Mauns, and vpon their returne from thence into Normandie, came to a communication with the French king at Giſors, and then being come backe into Normandie at Bure, the ſonne (to put the father out of all doubt and miſtruſt of any euill meaning in him) ſware fealtie to him againſt all perſons; and ſo became his liegeman in the preſence of Rothrod archbiſhop of Rouen, Henrie biſhop of Baieux William earle of Mandeuille, Richard de Humez his coneſtable, and manie other.

The kings of England and France meet at Giſors.

After this they kept their eaſter at Chirebourgh, from whence they came to Caen; where they met with Philip earle of Flanders, who had latelie before taken on him the croſſe, to go to the holie land: where king Henrie the father required him to releaſe all ſuch couenants as king Henrie the ſonne had made vnto him in time of his laſt warres, which he freelie did, and deliuered vp the writing that he had of the ſame king concerning thoſe couenants, and ſo they confirmed vnto him the yearelie rent which he was wont to receiue out of England, before the ſaid warres.

Philip earle of Flanders.

Finallie, when king Henrie had viſited the moſt part of the countrie, he came to Harflew, and cauſed his nauie to be decked and rigged, that he might saile ouer into England. Whileſt he tarried heere till his ſhips were readie, he ſent letters to his ſonne king Henrie, willing him to repaire vnto him, and meaning that he ſhould accompanie him into England. Who at the firſt was loth to obeie his fathers will and pleaſure herein, bicauſe ſome enuious perſons about him had put in his head a doubt, leaſt his father had not altogither forgot his former grudge, and that he ment at his comming into England to commit him to priſon. Which was a ſurmize altogither void of likelihood, conſidering that the father, in the whole proceſſe of his actions betweene himſelfe and his ſonnes, was ſo farre from the deſire of inflicting any corporall puniſhment, or leuieng anie fine vpon them for their miſdemenour, that he alwaies ſought meanes of reconcilement and pacification. And though this Henrie the ſonne for his part deſerued to be roughlie dealt withall; yet the father handled him ſo gentlie with courteous letters & meſſages, that ſhortlie after he came of his owne accord vnto Harflew, from whence ſhortlie after they ſailed both togither ouer into England, landing at Portſmouth on a fridaie being the ninth of Maie, from thence they tooke their iournie ſtreight to London, all the waies being full of people that came to ſee them, and to ſhew themſelues glad and ioifull of their concord and happie arriuall. At their comming to the citie they were receiued with great reioiſing of the people, beſeeching God long to preſerue them both in health and honour.

The two kings the father and the ſonne returne into England.

The ſame yeare William de Breauſe hauing got a great number of Welſhmen into the caſtell of Abergauennie, vnder a colourable pretext of communication, proponed this ordinance to be receiued of them with a corporall oth; That no traueller by the waie amongſt them ſhould beare any bow, or other vnlawfull weapon. Which oth when they refuſed to take, bicauſe they would not ſtand to that ordinance he condemned them all to death. This deceit he vſed towards them in reuenge of the death of his vncle Henrie of Hereford, whom vpon eaſter euen before, they had through treaſon murthered, and were now acquited with the like againe.

The Welſhmē not well dealt withall.

The ſame yeare died Reignold earle of Cornwall, baſtard ſonne to king Henrie the firſt without heirs male, by reaſon whereof the king tooke into his hands all the inheritance of lands and liuings which he held within England, Normandie and Wales, except corteine portions which the daughters of the ſame earle had by aſſignement allotted to them. Alſo Richard earle of Gloceſter deceaſſed this yeare, and his ſonne Philip ſucceeded him.

N. Triuet. Reignold erle of Cornewall departed this life.

The ſame yeare was a ſynod of the cleargie kept at Weſtminſter, wherein many things were decreed for the conſeruation of religion. Amongſt other things it was prouided, that thoſe abbeies and churches which were void of gouernours, and could haue none placed in them by the time of the late ciuill warres, ſhould now be committed vnto men worthie to enioy the ſame, for the reformation of diſorders growne and plentifullie ſprong vp in time of the vacations.

Matth. Weſt. A ſynod held at London.

The realme now brought into good order and deliuered from the troubles of warre, as well at home as abroad, the king being at good leiſure determined to ride about a great part of the realme, and comming to Yorke, ſent for the king of Scots to come and doo his homage. Now the king of Scots (according to couenants before concluded) came vnto Yorke in the moneth of Auguſt, where dooing his homage about the twentith day of the ſame moneth in S. Peters church, the king granted further by his letters patents, that he and his ſucceſſours kings of Scotland, ſhould doo homage and fealtie to the kings of England, ſo often as they ſhould be neceſſarilie required thereunto. Wilhelmus rex Scotiæ deuenit homo ligius domini regis Angliæ contra omnes homines, de Scotia & de alijs terris ſuis, & fidelitatem ei fecit vt ligio domino ſuo ſicut alij homines ſui ipſi facere ſolent. Similiter fecit homagium Henrico filio regis ſalua fide domini regis patris ſui.

3 Conceſsit autem rex Scotiæ, & frater eius, & barones, & alij homines ſui domino regi, quòd eccleſia Scotiæ talem ſubiectionem amodò faciet eccleſiæ Angliæ, qualem facere debet, & ſolebat tempore regum Angliæ prædeceſſorum ſuorum.

7 Si autem de terra regis Scotiæ aliquis fugitiuus fuerit pro felonia in Anglia, niſi voluerit venire ad rectũ in curia domini regis Scotiæ, & ſtare iudicio curiæ, non receptabitur in terra regis, ſed liberabitur hominibus regis Scotiæ, per balliuos domini regis vbi inuentus fuerit.

8 Præterea homines domini regis habebunt terras ſuas quas habebant, & habere debent de domino rege, & hominibus ſuis, & de rege Scotiæ & de hominibus ſuis. Et homines regis Scotiæ habebunt terras ſuas, quas habebant, & habere debent de domino rege & hominibus ſuis. Pro iſta vero conuentione & fine firmiter obſeruando domino regi & Henrico filio ſuo & hæredibus ſuis à rege Scotiæ & hæredibus ſuis, liberauit rex Scotiæ domino regi caſtellum de Roxburgh, & caſtellum Puellarum, & caſtellum de Strtueling, in manu domini regis, & ad cuſtodienda caſtella aſsignabit rex Scotiæ de redditu ſuo meſurabiliter ad voluntatem domini regis.

12 Prædictam itaq; conuentionem firmiter obſeruandam bona fide, & ſine malo ingenio domino regi & Henrico filio ſuo & hæredibus ſuis à Wilhelmo rege Scotiæ & Dauid fratre ſuo & baronibus ſuis prædictis, & hæredibus eorum aſſecurauit ipſe rex Scotiæ, & Dauid frater eius, & omnes barones ſui prænominati ſicut ligij homines domino regis contra omnem hominem, & Henrici filij ſui (ſalua fidelitate patris ſui) hijs teſtibus, Richardo epiſcopo Abrincenſi, & Iohanne Saliſburiæ decano, & Roberto abbate Malmesburiæ, & Radulpho abbate Mundesburg, nec non alijs abbatibus, comitibus & baronibus, & duobus filijs ſuis ſcilicet Richardo & Galfrido.

These things being recited in the church of S. Peters in Yorke, in the preſence of the ſaid kings, & of Dauid the king of Scots brother, and before an innumerable number of other people, the biſhops, earles, barons and knights of Scotland ſware fealtie to the king of England and to Henrie his ſonne, and to their heires againſt all men, as to their liege and ſouereigne lords.

King Henrie hauing ended his buſineſſe at Yorke with the king of Scots and others, which likewiſe did homage to him there, returned to London, in the octaues of S. Michaell, and he called a parlement at Windſor, whereat were preſent king Henrie the ſonne, Richard archbiſhop of Canturburie, and other biſhops of England, Laurence archbiſhop of Dublin with a great number of earles and barons of this realme. About the ſame time the archbiſhop of Tuamon, and the abbat of S. Brandon, with Laurence the chancellor of Roderike king of Connagh in Ireland were come as ambaſſadours from the ſaid Roderike, vnto king Henrie, who willinglie heard them, as he that was more deſirous to grow to ſome accord with thoſe ſauage people by ſome freendlie order, than to war with them that had nothing to loſe: ſo that he might in purſuing of them ſeeme to fiſh with an hooke of gold. Therefore in this parlement the matter was debated, and in the end a peace concluded at the requeſt of the ſaid ambaſſadours, the king appointing Roderike to paie vnto him in token of ſubiection, a tribute of ox hides.

Moreouer, at this parlement the king gaue an Iriſhman named Auguſtine, the biſhoprike of Waterford, which ſee was then void, and ſent him into Ireland with Laurence the archbiſhop of Dubline to be conſecrated of Donat the archbiſhop of Caſſels. The ſame yeare, both England and the countries adioining were ſore vexed with a great mortalitie of people, and immediatlie after followed a ſore dearth and famine.

A parlement at Northhampton.

Matth. Paris.

An act againſt preeſts that were hunters.

King Henrie held his Chriſtmas at Windſor, and about the feaſt of the conuerſion of ſaint Paule he came to Northampton, & after the mortalitie was well ceaſſed, he called a parlement, whereat was preſent a deacon cardinall intituled of S. Angelo, being ſent into England as a legat from the pope, to take order in the controuerſies betwixt the two archbiſhops of Canturburie and Yorke. This cardinall whoſe name was Hugh Petro Lion, aſſembled in the ſame place a conuocation or ſynod of the biſhops and cleargie, as well of England as Scotland: in which conuocation, after the ceaſſing of certeine ſtrifes and decrees made as well concerning the ſtate of common-wealth, as for the honeſt behauiour of mans life, the cardinall conſented that (according as by the kings lawes it was alreadie ordeined) all maner of perſons within the ſacred orders of the cleargie, which ſhould hunt within the kings grounds and kill any of his deare, ſhould be conuented and puniſhed before a temporall iudge. Which libertie granted to the king, did ſo infringe the immunitie which the cleargie pretended to haue within this realme, that afterwards in manie points, preeſts were called before temporall iudges, and puniſhed for their offenſes as well as the laitie, though they haue grudged indeed and mainteined that they had wrong therein, as they that would be exempted and iudged by none, except by thoſe of their owne order.

Polydor.

Obedience of the church of Scotland to the church of England.

Moreouer, in this councell the matter came in queſtion touching the obedience which the biſhops of Scotland did owe by right vnto the archbiſhop of Yorke, whom from the beginning the popes of Rome had conſtituted and ordeined to be primat of all Scotland, and of the Iles belonging to that realme, as well of the Orkeneis as all the other. Which conſtitution was obſerued by the biſhops of thoſe parts manie yeares togither, though after they renounced their obedience. Whervpon the archbiſhops of Yorke (for the time being) continuallie complained, ſo that theſe popes, Paſchall the ſecond, Calixt the ſecond, Honorius, Innocentius, Eugenius the third, and Adrian the fourth, had the hearing of the matter, and with often ſending their letters, went about to reduce them to the prouince of Yorke. But the Scots ſtill withſtanding this ordinance, at length the matter thus in controuerſie was referred to pope Alexander, who ſent the foreſaid cardinall Hugh as well to make an end of that contention, as of diuerſe other: but yet he left it vndecided.

Rog. Houed.

The king of Scots commeth to the parlement.

William king of Scotland came perſonallie vnto this parlement at Northhampton, by commandement of king Henrie, and brought with him Richard biſhop of S. Andrew, and Ioſſeline biſhop of Glaſcow, with other biſhops and abbats of Scotland, the which being commanded by king Henrie to ſhew ſuch ſubiection to the church of England as they were bound to doo by the faith which they owght to him, and by the oth of fealtie which they had made to him, they made this anſwer, that they had neuer ſhewed any ſubiection to the church of England, nor ought. Againſt which deniall, the archbiſhop of Yorke replied, and brought foorth ſufficient priuileges granted by the forenamed popes, to prooue the ſubiection of the Scotiſh biſhops, and namelie Glaſcow and Whiterne vnto the ſee of Yorke. But bicauſe the archbiſhop of Canturburie meant to bring the Scotiſh biſhops vnder ſubiection to his ſee, he wrought ſo for that time with the king, that he ſuffered them to depart home, without yeelding any ſubiection to the church of England. The letters which the foreſaid popes did ſend touching this matter, were remaining ſafe and ſound amongſt other writings in the colledge at Yorke, when Polydor Virgil wrote the hiſtories of England, the copies whereof in an old ancient booke he confeſſeth to haue ſeene and read.

Diuiſion of circuits for iuſtices itinerants.

But to ſpeake further of things ordered and doone at this parlement holden at Northampton, the king by common conſent of his Nobles and other ſtates, diuided his realme into ſix parts, appointing three iuſtices itinerants in euerie of them, as here followeth, Hugh de Creſſie, Walter Fitz Robert, and Robert Mantell, were deputed vnto Northfolke, Suffolke, Cambridgeſhire, Huntingtonſhire, Bedfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, Eſſex and Hertfordſhire; Hugh de Gundeuille, William Fitz Rafe, and William Baſſet were appointed to Lincolnſhire, Notinghamſhire, Derbiſhire, Staffordſhire, Warwikeſhire, Northamptonſhire, and Leiceſterſhire; Robert Fitz Bernard, Richard Gifford, Roger Fitz Remfrey, were aſſigned to Kent, Surrey, Hampſhire, Suſſex, Berkſhire and Oxfordſhire: William Fitz Stephan, Bertram de Verdon, Thurſtan Fitz Simon were ordeined to Herefordſhire, Gloceſterſhire, Worceſterſhire, and Salopſhire; Rafe Fitz

Stephan, William Ruffe, and Gilbert Pipard were put in charge with Wilſhire, Dorſetſhire, Summerſetſhire, Deuonſhire & Cornwall: Robert de Wals, Ranulf de Glanuile, and Robert Pikenet were appointed to Yorkeſhire, Richmondſhire, Lancaſhire, Copeland, Weſtmerland, Northumberland, and Cumberland.

The oth of the iuſtices.

The king cauſed theſe iuſtices to ſweare vpon the holie euangeliſts, that they ſhould kéepe his aſſiſes which he firſt had ordeined at Clarendon, and after had renewed here at Northampton, & alſo cauſed all his ſubiects within the relme of England to kéepe and obſerue the ſame.

Ger. Dor.

Moreouer at this councell, king Henrie reſtored vnto Robert earle of Leiceſter all his lands, both on this ſide the ſea, and beyond, in maner as he held the ſame fiftéene daies before the warre. To William de Albenie earle of Arundell, he gaue the earledome of Suſſex. About midlent, the king with his ſonne and the legat came to London, where at Weſtminſter a conuocation of the cleargie was called, but when the legat was ſet, and the archbiſhop of Canturburie on his right hand as primat of the realme, the archbiſhop of Yorke comming in, and diſdaining to ſit on the left, where he might ſéeme to giue preheminence vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie (vnmanerlie inough indéed) ſwaſht him downe, meaning to thruſt himſelfe in betwixt the legat, and the archbiſhop of Canturburie. And where belike the ſaid archbiſhop of Canturburie was loth to remoue, he ſet his buttocks iuſt in his lap, but he ſcarſlie touched the archbiſhops ſkirt with his bum, when the biſhops and other chapleins with their ſeruants ſtept to him, pulled him away, and threw him to the ground, and beginning to lay on him with bats and fiſts, the archbiſhop of Canturburie yéelding góod for euill, ſought to ſaue him from their hands. Thus was verified in him that ſage ſentence,

Nunquam periculum ſine periculo vincitur.

The archbiſhop of Yorke with his rent rochet got vp, and awaie he went to the king with a great complaint againſt the archbiſhop of Canturburie: but when vpon examination of the matter the truth was knowne, he was well laught at for his labour, and that was all the remedie he got. As he departed ſo bebuffeted forth of the conuocation houſe towards the king, they cried out vpon him; Go traitor that diddeſt betray that holy man Thomas, go get thée hence, thy hands yet ſtinke of bloud. The aſſemblie was by this meanes diſperſed, and the legat fled and got him out of the waie, as he might with ſhame enough, which is the common panion and waiting-woman of pride, as one verie well ſaid, Appeales made.

After this, followed appealings, the archbiſhop of Yorke appealed to Rome, and the legat alſo for his owne ſafegard appealed the archbiſhop of Canturburie vnto Rome, which archbiſhop ſubmitting himſelfe and his cauſe vnder the popes protection, made a like ſolemne appeale from the legat to the pope. The legat perceiuing that the matter went otherwiſe than he wiſhed, and ſéeing little remedie to be had at that preſent, gaue ouer his legatſhip as it had béene of his owne accord, though greatlie againſt his will, and prepared himſelfe to depart. Neuertheleſſe, through mediation of fréends that tóoke paines betwixt them, they gaue ouer their appeales on either ſide, and diſſembled the diſpleaſures which they had conceiued either againſt other, but yet the conuocation was diſſolued for that time, and the two archbiſhops preſented their complaints to the king, who kept his Eaſter this yeare at Wincheſter, and about the ſame time or ſhortlie after, licenced his ſonne Henrie to ſaile ouer into Normandie, meaning ſhortlie after to go vnto Compoſtella in Spaine, to viſit the bodie of ſaint Iames the apoſtle, but béeing otherwiſe aduiſed by his fathers letters, he diſcontinued his purpoſe and ſtaied at home.

The conuocation diſſolued.

The ſame yeare, the ladie Iohan the kings daughter was giuen in marriage vnto William king of Sicill. Alſo the ſame yeare died the lord chéefe iuſtice of Ireland, Robert earle of Striguill otherwiſe Chepſtow, then was William Fitzaldelme ordeined lord chéefe iuſtice in his place, who ſeized into the kings hands all thoſe fortreſſes which the ſaid earle of Striguill held within the realme of Ireland. The Iriſhmen alſo paied to the king a tribute of twelue pence yearelie for euerie houſe, or elſe for euerie yoke of oxen which they had of their owne. William earle of Arundell died alſo this yeare at Wauerley, and was buried at Wimondham.

This yeare, when it might haue béene thought that all things were forgotten touching the rebellious attempts made againſt king Henrie the father by his ſons, and other (as before ye haue heard) he cauſed the wals both of the towne and caſtell of Leiceſter to be raced, and all ſuch caſtels and places of ſtrength as had béene kept againſt him during the time of that rebellion, to be likewiſe ouerthrowne and made plaine with the ground, as the caſtels of Huntington, Waleton, Growby, Hey, Stuteſbirrie or Sterdeſbirrie, Malaſert, the new caſtell of Allerton, the caſtels of Fremingham and Bungey, with diuers other both in England and Normandie. But the caſtels of Paſcie, and Mountſorell he reteined in his owne hands as his of right, being ſo found by a iurie of fréeholders impanelled there in the countrie; further, he ſeized into his hands all the other caſtels of biſhops, earles and barons, both in England and Normandie, appointing kéepers in them at his pleaſure. This yeare alſo he married his daughter Elianor vnto Alfonſe king of Caſtile.

Moreouer, Gilbert the ſonne of Fergus lord of Galloway, who had ſlaine his brother Uthred coſen to king Henrie, came this yeare into England, vnder conduct of William king of Scotland, and became king Henrie the fathers man, ſwearing fealtie to him againſt all men: and to haue his loue and fauour gaue him a thouſand marks of ſiluer, and deliuered into his hands his ſon Duncane as a pledge. It is to be remembred alſo, that in this yeare, Richard earle of Poictow ſonne to king Henrie, fought with certeine Brabanders his enimies betwixt S. Megrine and Buteuille, where he ouercame them.

¶ Here I haue thought góod to aduertiſe the reader, that theſe men of war, whom we haue generallie in this part of our bóoke named Brabanders, we find them written in old copies diuerſlie, as Brebazones, Brebanceni, and Brebationes, the which for ſo much as I haue found them by the learned tranſlated Brabanders, and that the French word ſomewhat yéeldeth thereto, I haue likewiſe ſo named them: wherein whether I haue erred or not, I muſt ſubmit mine opinion to the learned & ſkilfull ſearchers of ſuch points of antiquities. For to confeſſe in plaine truth mine ignorance, or rather vnreſolued doubt herein, I can not ſatiſfie my ſelfe with any thing that I haue read, whereby to aſſure my coniecture what to make of them, although verelie it may be, and the likelihóod is great, that the Brabanders in thoſe daies for their trained ſkill and vſuall practiſe in warlike feats, wan themſelues a name, whereby not onelie thoſe that were naturallie borne in Brabant, but ſuch alſo as ſerued amongſt them, or elſe vſed the ſame warlike furniture, order, trade and diſcipline, which was in vſe among them, paſſed in that age vnder the name of Brabanders. Which if it ſo chanced to theſe Brabanceni, I know not then what countriemen to make them: for as I remember, Marchades that was a chiefe leader of ſuch ſouldiers as were knowne by that name (as after ye ſhall heare) is reported by ſome authors to be a Prouancois.

It ſhould ſéeme alſo that they were called by other names, as the Routs (in Latine Ruptarij) which name whether it came of a French word, as ye would ſay ſome vnrulie and headſtrong companie, or of the Dutch word Rutters, that ſignifieth a rider, I cannot ſay. But it may ſuffice for the courſe of the hiſtorie to vnderſtand that they were a kind of hired ſouldiers, in thoſe daies highlie eſtéemed, and no leſſe feared, in ſo much that againſt them and others there was an article conteined among the decrées of the Laterane councell holden at Rome, in the yeare 1179, whereby all thoſe were to be denounced accurſed, which did hire, mainteine or any way nouriſh thoſe Brebationes, Aragonois, Nauarrois, Baſques and Coterelles, which did ſo much hurt in the chriſtian world in thoſe daies.

Wil. Paruus, lib.3.cap.3.

But to returne where we left to earle Richard, beſide the aboue mentioned victorie againſt thoſe Brabanders, if we ſhall ſo take them; he alſo vanquiſhed Hamerike vicount of Limoges, and William earle of Angoleſme, with the vicounts of Ventadore and Cambanais, who attempted rebellion againſt him, whome earle Richard ſubdued, and tooke priſoners, with diuerſe caſtels and ſtrong holds which they had fortified.

The departure of the legat foorth of the Realme.

Liberties obteined for churchmen.

About the feaſt of Peter and Paule, the legat departed out of the realme, of whom we find, that as he granted to the king ſome liberties againſt the priuileges which the cleargie pretended to haue a right vnto; ſo he obteined of the king certeine grants in fauour of them and their order, as thus.

1 Firſt, that for no offenſe, crime or tranſgreſſion any ſpirituall perſon ſhould be brought before a temporall iudge perſonallie, except for hunting, or for ſome laie fée, or that for which ſome temporall ſeruice was due to be yéelded, either to the king, or ſome other that was chéefe lord thereof.

2 Secondlie, that no archbiſhops ſée, nor biſhops ſée, nor any abbaie ſhould be kept in the kings hands more than one yeare, except vpon ſome euident cauſe or neceſſitie conſtreining.

3 Thirdlie, that ſuch as ſlue any ſpirituall perſon, and were of ſuch offenſe conuicted, either by euidence or confeſſion before the iuſtice of the realme in preſence of the biſhop, ſhould be puniſhed as the temporall law in ſuch caſes required.

4 Fourthlie, that ſpirituall men ſhould not be compelled to fight in liſts for the triall of any matter or cauſe whatſoeuer.

N. Triuet.

It ſhould appeare by Nicholas Triuet, that the archbiſhop of Canturburie procured the biſhops of Wincheſter, Elie, and Norwich, thrée prelats highlie at that preſent in the kings fauour, to further theſe grants; namelie, that ſuch as ſlue any préeſt or ſpirituall perſon might haue the law for it: where before, there was no puniſhment for a ſeaſon vſed againſt ſuch offendors but onelie excommunication. But now to leaue préeſts, we will paſſe to other matters.

The yoong K. beginneth new practiſes againſt his father.

In this meane time, king Henrie the ſonne remaining in Normandie, began to deuiſe new practiſes how to remoue his father from the gouernment and to take it to himſelfe: but one of his ſeruants named Adam de Cherehedune being of his ſecret counſell, aduertiſed king Henrie the father thereof, for the which his maiſter king Henrie the ſonne put him to great ſhame and rebuke, cauſing him to be ſtripped naked, and whipped round about the ſtréets of the citie of Poictiers, where he then was vpon his returne from his brother earle Richard, with whome he had béene to aid him againſt his enimies. King Henrie the father perceiuing the naughtie mind of his ſonne, and that he ceaſſed not from his wilfull maliciouſneſſe, thought to diſſemble all things, ſith he ſaw no hope of amendment in him; but yet to be prouided againſt his wicked attempts, he furniſhed all his fortreſſes both in England & in Normandie with ſtrong gariſons of men, and all neceſſarie munition.

About this time, the ſea roſe on ſuch a heigth, that manie men were drowned thereby. Alſo a great ſnow fell this yeare, which by reaſon of the hard froſt that chanced therewith, continued long without waſting away, ſo that fiſhes both in the ſea and freſh water died through ſharpeneſſe and vehemencie of that froſt, neither could huſbandmen till the ground. A ſore eclipſe of the ſunne chanced alſo the ſixt ides of Ianuarie. The monaſterie of Weſtwood or Leſnos was begun to be founded by Richard de Lucie Lord chéefe iuſtice. The ſame yeare alſo at Woodſtocke the king made his ſonne the lord Geffrey knight.

In the yeare 1177. king Henrie held his Chriſtmas at Northampton, with his two ſonnes Geffrey and Iohn, his other two ſonnes the yoong king Henrie, and Richard earle of Poictou, were in the parts beyond the ſeas, as the king in Normandie, and the earle in Gaſcoigne, where he beſieged the citie of Aques, which the vicount of Aques and the earle of Bigorre had fortified againſt him, but he wan it within ten daies after his comming thither. Within the like terme alſo he wan the citie of Baion, which Arnold Berthram had fortified againſt him, and cõming to the vttermoſt frontiers of that countrie adioining to Spaine, he tooke a caſtell called ſaint Piero which he deſtroied, and conſtreined the Baſques and Nauarrois to receiue an oth, that from thenceforth they ſhould ſuffer paſſengers quietlie to come and go through their countrie, and that they ſhould liue in quiet and kéepe peace one with an other, and ſo he reformed the ſtate of that countrie, and cauſed them to renounce manie euill cuſtomes which they before that time had vnlawfullie vſed.

Geffrey the kings baſe ſonne made biſhop of Lincolne.

Moreouer, king Henrie, to auoid further ſlander, placed for biſhop in the ſée of Lincolne a baſtard ſon which he had named Geffrey, after he had kept that biſhoprike in his hands ſo long till he had almoſt cléerelie deſtroied it. And his ſonne that was now made biſhop to helpe the matter for his part, made hauocke in waſting and ſpending in riotous manner the goods of that church, and in the end forſooke his miter, and left the ſée againe in the kings hands to make his beſt of it.

Furthermore, the king in times paſt made a vow to build a new monaſterie in ſatiſfaction of his offenſes committed againſt Thomas the archbiſhop of Canturburie: wherefore he required of the biſhops and other ſpirituall fathers, to haue ſome place by them aſſigned, where he might begin that foundation. But whileſt they ſhould haue taken aduiſe herein, he ſecretlie practiſed with the cardinals, and with diuerſe other biſhops, that he might remoue the ſecular canons out of the colledge at Waltham, and place therein regular canons, ſo to ſaue monie in his

Howbeit, bicauſe it ſhould not be thought he did this of ſuch a couetous meaning, he promiſed to giue great poſſeſſions to that houſe, which he after but ſlenderlie performed, though vpon licence obteined at the biſhops hands, he diſplaced the preeſts, and brought in to their roomes the canons as it were by waie of exchange.

The ſame yeare alſo he thruſt the nunnes of Ameſburie out of their houſe, bicauſe of their incontinent liuing, in abuſing their bodies greatlie to their reproch, and beſtowed them in other monaſteries to be kept in more ſtreightlie. And their houſe was committed vnto the abbeſſe and couent of Founteuered, who ſent ouer certeine of their number to furniſh the houſe of Ameſburie, wherein they were placed by the archbiſhop of Canturburie, in the preſence of the king and a great number of others.

Philip earle of Flanders.

Philip earle of Flanders by ſending ouer ambaſſadours to king Henrie, promiſed that he would not beſtow his two neeces, daughters to his brother Matthew earle of Bullongne, without conſent of the ſame king: but ſhortlie after he forgot his promiſe, & married the elder of them to the duke of Zaringes, & the yonger to Henrie duke of Louaine.

Iohn de Curcie lord cheefe iuſtice of Ireland diſcomfiting a power of Iriſhmen, wan the citie of Dun in Vlneſtre, where the bodies of S. Patrike and S. Colme confeſſors, and S. Brigit the virgin are buried, for the taking of which citie, Roderike king of Vlneſtre being ſore offended, raiſed a mightie hoſt, and comming into the field, fought with the lord cheefe iuſtice, and in the end receiued & tooke the ouerthrow at his hands, although the lord cheefe iuſtice at that encounter loſt no ſmall number of his men. Amongſt priſoners that were taken, the biſhop of Dun was one, whom yet the lord cheefe iuſtice releaſed and ſet at libertie, in reſpect of a requeſt and ſuit made to him by a cardinall the popes legat that was there in Ireland at that time.

Viuiano a cardinall.

This cardinals name was Viuiano, intituled the cardinall of S. Stephan in Mount Celio; he was ſent from the pope the yeare before, and comming into England, though without licence, was pardoned vpon knowledging his fault for his entring without the kings leaue firſt obteined, and ſo permitted to go into Scotland, whither (as alſo into other the northweſt regions) he was ſent as legat, authoriſed from the pope. Now when he had ended his buſineſſe in Scotland, he paſſed ouer into Man, and there held his Chriſtmaſſe with Euthred king of Man, and after the feaſt of the Epiphanie, ſailed from thence into Ireland, and chanced (the ſame time that the Engliſhmen inuaded that countrie) to be in the citie of Dun, where he was receiued of the king & biſhops of that land with great reuerence.

Wil. Paruus.

The inuaſion then of the Engliſhmen being ſignified to them of the countrie aforehand, they aſked counſell of the legat what he thought beſt to be doone in that matter; who ſtreightwaies told them, that they ought to fight in defenſe of their countrie, and at their ſetting forward, he gaue them his benediction in waie of their good ſpeed. But they comming (as ye haue heard) to encounter with the Engliſhmen, were put to flight, and beaten backe into the citie, which was herewith alſo woone by the Engliſhmen, ſo that the Romane legat was glad to get him into the church for his more ſafegard, and like a wiſe fellow had prouided afore hand for ſuch haps if they chanced, hauing there with him the king of Englands letters directed to the capteins in Ireland in the legats fauour, ſo that by the aſſiſtance and authoritie of the ſame, he went to Dublin, and there (in the name of the pope and the king of England) held a councell.

The legat holdeth a councell at Dublin.

But when he began to practiſe, after the manner of legats in thoſe daies, ſomewhat largelie for his owne aduantage, in the churches of that ſimple rude countrie, the Engliſh capteins commanded him either to depart, or elſe to go forth to the wars with them: wherevpon he returned into Scotland, hauing his bags well ſtuffed with Iriſh gold, for the which it ſeemed he greatlie thirſted.

¶ Where we haue to note the drift of the pope and all popelings to be far otherwiſe than they pretend. For who (vnleſſe he will be wilfullie ignorant) knoweth not, that he and his neuer attempt any thing, but the ſame beareth the hew and colour of holineſſe and honeſtie? Hereto tend the ſendings out of his legats and cardinals to make pacifications, to redreſſe diſorders, to appeaſe tumults, & I wot not what infinit enormities (for he muſt haue his ore in euerie mans bote, his ſpoone in euerie mans diſh, and his fingers in euerie mans purſſe) but the end and ſcope of all his doings conſiſteth in this; namelie, to ſet himſelfe aboue all ſoueraigntie, to purchaſe and aſſure to himſelfe an abſolute and ſupereminent iuriſdiction, to rob chriſtian kingdomes, to impoueriſh churches, chapels, and religious places. Our chronicles are full of theſe his pranks, and here we haue one practiſed by a lim of his, who (as you ſee) verie impudentlie and licentiouſlie preied vpon the church-goods, and conuerted the ſame to his owne profit and commoditie: which he had if not trembled, yet bluſhed to doo, conſidering that the goods of the church are the treaſurie of Chriſt (or at leaſtwiſe ought to be) and that none ought to alienate or change the propertie of ſuch goods, as the canon law hath prouided. Beſides, the wretch ought to haue remembred that which euen the verie pagans did not forget; namelie,

But now to the doings of Iohn de Curcie, and of thoſe Engliſhmen that were with him, who did not onelie defend ſuch places as they had woone out of the Iriſhmens hands againſt thoſe kings and their powers, but alſo inlarged dailie more and more their frontiers, and wan the towne of Armach (wherein is the metropolitane ſee of all that land) with the whole prouince thereto belonging.

About the ſame time came ambaſſadours vnto king Henrie from Alfonſe king of Caſtile and Garſias king of Nauarre, to aduertiſe him, that in a controuerſie riſen betwixt the ſaid two kings touching the poſſeſſion of certeine grounds neere vnto the confines of their realms, they had choſen him for iudge by compromiſe, promiſing vpon their oths to ſtand vnto & abide his order and decree therein. Therfore they required him to end the matter by his authoritie, ſith they had wholie put it to his iudgement. Furthermore, either king had ſent a moſt able and valiant knight furniſhed with horſſe and armour readie in their princes cauſe to fight the combat, if king Henrie ſhould happilie commit the triall of their quarrell vnto the iudgement of battell. King Henrie gladlie accepted their requeſt, ſo that therevpon calling his councellors togither, he conſulted with them of the thing, and hearing euerie mans opinion, at length he gaue iudgement ſo with the one, that the other was contented to be agreeable therevnto.

Within a while after, Philip earle of Flanders came ouer into England to doo his deuotions at the toome of Thomas archbiſhop of Canturburie, of whome the moſt part of men then had conceiued an opinion of ſuch holineſſe, that they reputed him for a ſaint. The king met him there, and verie freendlie enterteined him, and bicauſe he was appointed ſhortlie after to go ouer into the holie land to war againſt

A parlement at Oxford.

After this, the king went to Oxenford, and there held a parlement, at the which he created his ſonne Iohn king of Ireland, hauing a grant and confirmation thereto from pope Alexander. About the ſame time it rained bloud in the Ile of Wight, by the ſpace of two daies togither, ſo that linen clothes that hong on the hedges were coloured therewith: which vnvſed wonder cauſed the people, as the manner is, to ſuſpect ſome euill of the ſaid Iohns gouernement.

Moreouer, to this parlement holden at Oxenford, all the cheefe rulers and gouernours of Southwales and Northwales repaired, and became the king of Englands liege men, ſwearing fealtie to him againſt all men. Heerevpon he gaue vnto Rice ap Griffin prince of Southwales the land of Merionith, and to Dauid ap Owen he gaue the lands of Elleſmare. Alſo at the ſame time he gaue and confirmed vnto Hugh Lacie (as before is ſaid) the land of Meth in Ireland with the appurtenances, for the ſeruice of an hundred knights or men of armes, to hold of him and of his ſonne Iohn by a charter which he made thereof. Alſo he diuided there the lands and poſſeſſions of Ireland with the ſeruices to his ſubiects, as well of England as Ireland, appointing ſome to hold by ſeruice to find fortie knights or men of armes, and ſome thirtie, and ſo forth.

Vnto two Iriſh lords he granted the kingdome of Corke for the ſeruice of fortie knights, and to other three lords he gaue the kingdome of Limerike for the ſeruice of the like number of knights to be held of him & his ſonne Iohn, reſeruing to himſelfe & to his heires the citie of Limerike with one cantred. To William Fitz Adelme his ſewer, he gaue the citie of Weſſeford with the appurtenances and ſeruices: and to Robert de Poer his marſhall, he gaue the citie of Waterford, and to Hugh Lacie, he committed the ſafe keeping of the citie of Diueline. And theſe perſons, to whome ſuch gifts and aſſignations were made, receiued othes of fealtie to beare their allegiance vnto him and to his ſonne for thoſe lands and poſſeſſions in Ireland, in maner and forme as was requiſite.

After the king had diſſolued and broken vp his parlement at Oxenford, he came to Marleborough, and there granted vnto Philip de Breauſe all the kingdome of Limerike for the ſeruice of fortie knights: for Hubert and William the brethren of Reignold earle of Cornewall, and Iohn de la Pumeray their nephue, refuſed the gift thereof, bicauſe it was not as yet conquered. For the king thereof, ſurnamed Monoculus, that is, with one eie, who had held that kingdome of the king of England, being latelie ſlaine, one of his kinſemen got poſſeſſion of that kingdome, and held it without acknowledging any ſubiection to king Henrie, nor would obeie his officers, bicauſe of the loſſes and damages which they did practiſe againſt the Iriſh people, without occaſion (as they alleadged) by reaſon whereof the king of Corke alſo rebelled againſt the king of England and his people, and ſo that realme was full of trouble.

Iewes in England.

The ſame ſeaſon, queene Margaret the wife of king Henrie the ſonne was deliuered of a man child which liued not paſt three daies. In that time there was alſo through all England a great multitude of Iewes, and bicauſe they had no place appointed them where to burie thoſe that died, but onelie at London, they were conſtreined to bring all their dead corpſes thither from all parts of the realme. To eaſe them therfore of that inconuenience, they obteined of king Henrie a grant, to haue a place aſſigned them in euerie quarter where they dwelled, to burie their dead bodies. The ſame yeare was the bodie of S. Amphibulus the martyr, who was inſtructor to ſaint Albone found, not farre from the towne of S. Albones, and there in the monaſterie of that towne buried with great and ſolemne ceremonies.

In the meane time, king Henrie paſſed ouer into Normandie, hearing that the old grudge betwixt him & king Lewes began to be renewed vpon this occaſion, that whereas king Henrie had receiued the French kings daughter Alice, promiſed in mariage vnto his ſonne Richard, to remaine in England with him, till ſhe were able to companie with hir husband, king Henrie being of a diſſolute life, and giuen much to the pleaſure of the bodie (a vice which was graffed in the bone and therefore like to ſticke faſt in the fleſh, for as it is ſaid, Quod noua teſta capit inueterata ſapit)

at leaſtwiſe (as the French king ſuſpected) began to fantaſie the yoong ladie, and by ſuch wanton talke and companie-keeping as he vſed with hir, he was thought to haue brought hir to conſent to his fleſhlie luſt, which was the cauſe wherefore he would not ſuffer his ſonne to marrie hir, being not of ripe yeares nor viripotent or mariable. Wherefore the French king imagining (vpon conſideration of the other kings former looſe life) that an inconuenieuce & infamie might redound to him and his, bethought himſelfe that and therefore deemed iuſtlie that ſuch a vile reproch wrought againſt him in his bloud, was in no wiſe to be ſuffered, but rather preuented, reſiſted & withſtood. Herevpon he complained to the pope, who for redreſſe thereof, ſent one Peter a preeſt, & cardinall intituled of ſaint Griſogone as legat from him into France, with commiſſion to put Normandie and all the lands that belonged to king Henrie vnder interdiction, if he would not ſuffer the mariage to be ſolemnized without delaie betwixt his ſonne Richard and Alice the French kings daughter. The king aduertiſed hereof, came to a communication with the French king at Yurie, vpon the 21. of September, and and there offered to cauſe the mariage to be ſolemnized out of hand, if the French king would giue in marriage with his daughter the citie of Burges, with all the appurtenances as it was accorded, and alſo vnto his ſonne king Henrie the countrie of Veulgeſine, that is to ſay, all the land betwixt Giſors and Puſſie, as he had likewiſe couenanted.

But bicauſe the French king refuſed ſo to doo, king Henrie would not ſuffer his ſonne Richard to marrie his daughter Alice: howbeit at this enteruew of the two princes, by the helpe of the cardinall, and other Noble men of both ſides, they agreed to be freends, and that if they could not take order betwixt them, to end all matters touching the controuerſies depending betwixt them for the lands in Auuergne and Berrie, and for the fee of Chateau Raoul; then ſhould the matter be put to twelue perſons, ſix on the one ſide, and ſix on the other, authoriſing them to compound and finiſh that controuerſie and all other which might riſe betwixt them. For the French king theſe were named, the biſhops of Claremount, Neuers, and Trois; and three barons, erle Theobald, Robert, and Peter de Courtneie, the kings brethren. For the king of England were named the biſhops of Mauns, Peregort, and Naunts; with three barons alſo, Maurice de Croume, William Maigot and Peter de Mountrabell.

At the ſame time alſo, both theſe kings promiſed and vndertooke to ioine their powers togither, and to go into the holie land to aid Guido king of Jeruſalem, whome the Saracen Saladine king of Aegypt did ſore oppreſſe with continuall and moſt cruell war. This doone, the French king returned home, and king Henrie came to Vernueil, where he made this ordinance, that no man ſhould trouble the vaſſall or tenant, as we may call them, for his lords debt.

After this, king Henrie went into Berrie, and tooke Chatean Roux or Raoul, and marching towards Caſtre, the lord of that towne came and met him on the waie, ſurrendring into his hands the daughter of Rafe de Dolis latelie before deceaſſed, whome the king gaue vnto Baldwine de Riuers, with the honour of Chatean Roux or Raoul. Then went he vnto Graundemont, where Audebert earle of March came vnto him, and ſold to him the whole countrie of March for the ſumme of fifteene thouſand pounds Aniouin, twentie mules, and twentie palfreis. The king this yeare held his Chriſtmas at Angiers, and meaning ſhortlie after to returne into England, he ſent to the French king for letters of protection, which were granted, and ſent to him in forme as followeth.

Giuen at Nicens.

Shortlie after, king Henrie returned into England from Normandie, and at Woodſtocke made his ſonne Geffrey knight. This yeare pope Alexander ſent into all parts legats to ſummon the biſhops and prelates to a generall councell to be holden at Rome in the beginning of the Lent in the yere next following. Whereabout two legats came into England, the one named Albert de Suma, who had in commiſſion to ſummon them of England and Normandie: and the other called Petro de Santa Agatha, who was appointed to ſummon them of Scotland, Ireland, and the Iles about the ſame: whervpon obteining licence to paſſe through the king of Englands dominions, he was conſtreined to ſweare vpon the holie euangeliſts, that he ſhould not attempt any thing in his legatſhip that might be hurtfull to the king or his realme, and that he ſhould come and viſit the king againe as he returned homewards.

A generall councell ſummoned at Rome.

This yeare on the ſundaie before the natiuitie of S. John Baptiſt, being the 18 of June, after the ſetting of the ſunne, there appeared a maruellous ſight in the aire vnto certeine perſons that beheld the ſame. For whereas the new moone ſhone foorth verie faire with his hornes towards the eaſt, ſtreightwais the vpper horne was diuided into two, out of the mids of which diuiſion a burning brand ſprang vp, caſting from it a farre off coles and ſparks, as it had beene of fire. The bodie of the moone in the meane time that was beneath, ſeemed to wreſt and writh in reſemblance like to an adder or ſnake that had beene beaten, and anon after it came to the old ſtate againe. This chanced aboue a dozzen times, and at length from horne to horne it became blacke.

In September following, the moone being about 27. daies old, at ſix of the clocke, a partile eclipſe of the ſunne happened, for the bodie thereof appeared as it were horned, ſhooting the horns towards the weſt as the moone dooth; being twentie daies old. The reſidue of the compaſſe of it was couered with a blacke roundell, which comming downe by little and little, threw about the horned brightneſſe that remained, till both the hornes came to hang downe on either ſide to the earthwards; and as the blacke roundell went by little & little forwards, the hornes at length were turned towards the weſt, and ſo the blackneſſe paſſing awaie, the ſunne receiued his brightneſſe againe. In the meane time, the aire being full of clouds of diuerſe colours, as red, yellow, greene, and pale, holpe the peoples ſight with more eaſe to diſcerne the maner of it.

¶ Touching theſe celeſtiall apparitions, the common doctrine of philoſophie is, that they be méere naturall, and therefore of no great admiration. For of eclipſes, as well ſuch as are proper to the ſunne, as alſo thoſe that are peculiar to the moone, the poſition is not ſo generallie deliuered, as it is conſtantlie beléeued. For the philoſophers giue this reaſon of eclipſes.

Luc. lib. 1.

In ſomuch as obſeruing them to be ordinarie accidents, they are ouerpaſſed and nothing regarded. Howbeit Lucane maketh a great matter of eclipſes, and of other ſtrange ſights préceding the bloudie battels betwéene Pompeie and Ceſar; intimating thereby, that prodigious woonders, and other rare and vnaccuſtomed accidents are ſignifications of ſome notable euent inſuing, either to ſome great perſonage, to the common-wealth, or to the ſtate of the church. And therefore it is a matter worth the marking, to compare effects following with ſignes and woonders before going; ſince they haue a doctrine in them of no ſmall importance. For not manie yeares after, the kings glorie was darkened on earth, nay his pompe and roiall ſtate tooke end; a prediction whereof might be imported by the extraordinarie eclipſe of the ſunne, a beautifull creature, and the ornament of the ſkie.

Laurence archbiſhop of Dublin, and Catholicus the archbiſhop of Tuamon, with fiue or ſix other Iriſh biſhops, and diuerſe both biſhops and abbats of Scotland, paſſed through England towards the generall councell, and withall tooke their oth, that they ſhuld not procure any damage to the king or realme of England. There went but onelie foure biſhops ont of England, to wit, Hugh Putſey or Pudſey biſhop of Durham, Iohn biſhop of Norwich, Reignold biſhop of Bath, and Robert biſhop of Hereford, beſide abbats: for the Engliſh biſhops firmelie ſtood in it, that there ought but foure biſh. onlie to go forth of England to any generall councell called by the pope. This yeare Richard de Lucie lord chéefe iuſtice of England gaue ouer his office, and became a canon in the abbeie of Weſtwood or Leſnos, which he had founded, and built vpon his owne ground, endowing it with great reuenewes, and in Iulie after he died there.

A parlement at Windſore.

King Henrie the father called a parlement at Windſore, at the which was preſent king Henrie the ſonne, and a great number of lords, earles and barons. At this parlement, order was taken for partition of the realme, ſo that it was diuided into foure parts, certeine ſage perſonages being allotted vnto euerie part to gouerne the ſame, but not by the name of iuſtices, albeit that Ranulfe de Glanuille was made ruler of Yorkeſhire, & authoriſed iuſtice there, as he that beſt vnderſtood in thoſe daies the ancient lawes and cuſtomes of the realme. The ſame yeare, Geffrey earle of Britaine by his fathers commandement leuied an armie, and paſſing ouer into Britaine, waſted the lands of Guidomer de Leons, and conſtreined him to ſubmit himſelfe vnto him.

The moone eclipſed. The French K. commeth a madding to viſit the archbiſhop Beckets toome.

The 18. day of Auguſt, the moone was eclipſed, which was ſéene of king Henrie and his companie as he rode all that night towards Douer there to méet the French king, who was comming towards England to viſit the toome of archbiſhop Thomas Becket, as he had before time vowed. He landed at Douer the 22. day of Auguſt. There came ouer with him Henrie duke of Louaine, Philip earle of Flanders, Baldwin earle of Guines, earle William de Mandeuille, and diuerſe other earles, lords, barons and knights; whome king Henrie was readie to receiue at the water ſide, and the morow after brought them with great honor to Canturburie, where they were with due reuerence and vnſpeakeable ioy receiued of archbiſhop Richard, and diuerſe other biſhops there aſſembled togither with the couent of Chriſtes-church, and an infinit multitude of Nobles and gentlemen. The French king offered vpon the toome of the ſaid archbiſhop Thomas, a rich cup of gold; and gaue to the moonks there an hundred tuns of wine to be receiued yearelie of his gift for euer at Poiſſie in France. Further he granted to the ſame moonks, that whatſoeuer was bought in his dominions of France to their vſe, ſhould be frée from toll, tallage, and paieng any maner of excise for the ſame. Theſe grants he confirmed with his charter thereof, made & deliuered to them by the hands of Hugh Putſey, ſon to the biſhop of Dureſme that was his chancellor. King Lewes hauing performed his vow, and receiued manie rich gifts of king Henrie, returned home into France, and ſhortlie after cauſing his ſonne to be crowned king, reſigned the gouernment to him (as by ſome writers appeareth.) About the ſame time, Cadwallon prince of Wales, being brought before the king to make his anſwer to diuerſe accuſations exhibited againſt him, as he returned toward his countrie vnder the kings ſafe conduct, was laid for by his enimies, and ſlaine, to the kings great ſlander, though he were not giltie in the matter. After this, king Henrie the father held his Chriſtmaſſe at Notingham, and William king of Scotland with him.

Diſcord betwixt the French K. and his nobles.

The ſame yeare fell diſcord betwixt the yoong king of France, and his mother and vncles, hir brethren, earle Theobald and earle Stephan, who thinking themſelues not well vſed, procured king Henrie the ſonne to ioine with them in fréendſhip, and to go ouer into England to purchaſe his fathers aſſiſtance in their behalfe againſt their nephue. Who being come ouer to his father, informed him of the whole mater, and did ſo much by his earneſt ſuit therin, that before the feaſt of Eaſter, his father went ouer with him into Normandie, and immediatlie vpon their arriuall in thoſe parts, the old French quéene, mother to the yoong king Philip, with their brethren the ſaid earles, and manie other Noble men of France, came vnto him, and concluding a league with him, deliuered hoſtages into his hands, and receiued an oth to follow his counſell and aduice in all things.

R. Houed.

Herevpon king Henrie aſſembled a great armie, in purpoſe after Eaſter to inuade the French kings dominions: but before any great exploit was made, he came to an enteruew with the new king of France, betwixt Giſors and Treodſunt, where partlie by gentle words, and partlie by threatnings which king Henrie vſed for perſuaſion, the French king releaſed all his indignation conceiued againſt his mother and vncles, and receiued them againe into his fauour, couenanting to allow his mother for euerie day towards hir expenſes ſeuen pounds of Paris monie, during his father king Lewes his life time; and after his death, ſhe ſhould inioy all hir dower, except the caſtels which king Philip might reteine ſtill in his hands. Alſo at this aſſemblie, king Henrie the father in the preſence of the French king, receiued homage of Philip earle of Flanders, and granted to him for the ſame a thouſand markes of ſiluer, to be receiued yearelie out of the checker at London, ſo that in conſideration thereof he ſhould find fiue hundred knights or men of armes, to ſerue the king of England for the ſpace of 40. daies, when Moreouer, the two kings at this aſſemblie concluded a league togither, and whereas certeine lands were in controuerſie betwixt them, as the fée of Chateau, Raoul, and other ſmall fées, if they could not agrée among themſelues concerning the ſame, either of them was contented to commit the order thereof, and of all other controuerſies betwixt them vnto ſix biſhops, to be choſen indifferentlie betwixt them, the one to chooſe thrée, and the other thrée.

Tailbourg wonne.

In this yeare, or (as the annales of Aquitaine ſay) in the yeare laſt paſſed, Richard earle of Poictou ſubdued the ſtrong fortreſſe of Tailbourg, which was iudged before that time inexpugnable: but earle Richard oppreſſed them that kept it ſo ſore with ſtreight ſiege, that firſt in a deſperate mood they iſſued forth, and aſſailed his people verie valiantlie, but yet neuertheleſſe they were beaten backe, and forced to retire into their fortreſſe, which finallie they ſurrendred into the hands of earle Richard, who cauſed the wals thereof to be raced. The like fortune chanced to diuers other caſtels and fortreſſes that ſtood in rebellion againſt him within a moneth ſpace.

Matth. Paris.

Tailbourg belonged vnto one Geffrey de Rancin, who of a proud and loftie ſtomach practiſing rebellion againſt duke Richard, tooke this enterpriſe in hand, and when he had atchiued the ſame to his owne contentation, he paſſed ouer into England, and was receiued with great triumph, pompe & magnificence.

King Henrie the father, whileſt he was at Mauns after Chriſtmaſſe made this ordinance, that euerie man being worth in goods to the value of an hundred pounds Aniouin, ſhould keepe one horſſe able for ſeruice in the wars, and complet armour for a knight or man of armes, as we may rather call them. Alſo that ſuch as had goods worth in value from 40. pounds to 25. of the ſame monie, ſhould at the leaſt haue in his houſe for his furniture an habergeon, a cap of ſtéele, a ſpeare, and a ſword, or bowe and arrowes. Furthermore he ordeined, that no man might ſell or laie to gage his armour and weapon, but ſhould be bound to leaue it to his next heire. When the French king and the earle of Flanders were aduertiſed that king Henrie had made this ordinance amongſt his ſubiects, they gaue commandement that their people ſhould be armed after the like manner.

Matth. Paris.

This yeare after Candlemaſſe, Laurence archbiſhop of Dublin came ouer to the king into Normandie, and brought with him the ſon of Roderike king of Conagh, to remaine with him as a pledge, for performance of couenants paſſed betwixt them, as the paiment of tribute and ſuch like. The ſaid archbiſhop died there in Normandie, wherevpon the king ſent Geffrey de Haie one of his chapleins, and chapleine alſo to Alexius the popes legat into Ireland, to ſeize that archbiſhops ſée into his hands. He alſo ſent Iohn Lacie coneſtable of Cheſter, and Richard de Peake, to haue the citie of Dublin in kéeping, which Hugh Lacie had in charge before, and now was diſcharged, bicauſe the king tooke diſpleaſure with him, for that without his licence he had maried a daughter of the king of Conagh, according to the manner of that countrie.

This yeare alſo, Geffrey the kings baſtard ſonne, who was the elect of Lincolne, and had receiued the profits of that biſhoprike by the ſpace of ſeuen years, and had his election confirmed by the pope in the feaſt of the Epiphanie at Marlebridge, in preſence of the king and biſhops renounced that preferment, of his owne frée will. Within a while after the pope ſent a ſtreit commandement vnto Richard archbiſhop of Canturburie, either to cauſe the ſame Geffrey by the cenſure of the church to renounce his miter, or elſe to take vpon him the order of préeſthood. Wherefore vpon good aduice taken in the matter with his father and other of his eſpeciall fréends, iudging himſelfe inſufficient for the one, he was contented to part with the other; and therevpon wrote letters vnto the ſaid archbiſhop of Canturburie, in forme as followeth.

R. Houed.

A letter of Geffrey the kings baſe ſonne elect of Lincolne to Richard archbiſhop of Canturburie.

Venerabili patri Richardo Dei gratia Cantuarienſi archiepiſcopo apoſtolicæ ſedis legato, Galfridus domini regis Angliæ filius & cancellarius ſalutem & reuerentiam debitam ac deuotam. Bene vale.

The king for his maintenance, now after he had reſigned his biſhoprike, gaue him 500. markes of yearelie rent in England, and as much in Normandie, and made him moreouer lord chancellor.

This yeare alſo after Eaſter, the kings of England and France came to an enterview togither, at a place in the confines of their countries called by ſome writers Vadum Sancti Remigij, on a mondaie being the 17. of April, in which aſſemblie of thoſe two princes, the knights templers and hoſpitallers preſented to them letters directed from pope Alexander vnto all chriſtian princes, aduertiſing them of the danger wherein the holie land ſtood at that preſent, if ſpéedie remedie were not the ſooner prouided. Wherefore he exhorted them to addreſſe their helping hand towards the reléefe thereof, granting vnto all ſuch as would enterpriſe to go thither in perſon (to remaine there vpon defenſe of the countrie againſt the infidels) great pardon, as to thoſe that did continue there the ſpace of two yéeres, pardon of penance for all their ſins, except theft, extortion, roberie, and vſurie; in which caſes reſtitution was to be made, if the partie were able to doo it; if not, then he ſhould be abſolued as well for thoſe things as for other. And thoſe that remained one yeare in thoſe parties were pardoned of halfe their whole penance due for all their ſinnes. And to thoſe that went to viſit the holie ſepulchre, he alſo granted great pardon, as remiſſion of their ſinnes, whether they came thither or peraduenture died by the waie. He alſo granted his frée indulgence vnto thoſe that went to warre againſt the common, the profeſſed and open enimies of our religion religion in the holie land, as his predeceſſors the popes Vrbanus and Eugenius had granted in time paſt: and he receiued likewiſe their wiues, their children, their goods and poſſeſſions vnder the protection of S. Peter and the church of Rome.

The two kings hauing heard the popes letters read, and taken good aduice thereof, promiſed by Gods fauour ſhortlie to prouide conuenient aid for reléefe of the holie land, and of the chriſtians as yet remaining in the ſame. This was the end of their communication for that time, and ſo they departed, the French king into France, and the king of England into Normandie.

In the meane time, by the king of Englands appointment, William king of Scotland went ouer into Normandie, and by the aduice and good admonition of king Henrie, he granted licence vnto two biſhops of his realme of Scotland, to wit, Aberdene and ſaint Andrewes, to returne into Scotland, whom he had latelie before baniſhed, and driuen out of his realme. Moreouer, as king Henrie laie at Harfléet readie to ſaile ouer into England, diſcord fell betwixt the king of France and the erle of Flanders, ſo that the king of England at deſire of the French king returned backe, and came vnto Giſors, where the French king met him, and ſo did the earle of Flanders, betwixt whom vpon talke had in the matter depending in controuerſie, he made a concord, and then comming downe to Chirburge, he and the king of Scots in his companie paſſed ouer into England, landing at Porteſmouth the 26. of Iulie.

An ordinance for armour.

The king now being returned into England, ordeined a ſtatute for armour and weapon to be had amongſt his ſubiects héere in this realme, which was thus. Euerie man that held a knights fée ſhould be bound to haue a paire of curaſſes, an helmet, with ſhield and ſpeare; and euerie knight or man of arms ſhould haue as manie curaſſes, helmets, ſhields and ſpeares as he held knights fées in demaine. Euerie man of the laitie hauing goods or reuenues to the value of ſixtéene marks, ſhould haue one paire of curaſſes, an helmet, a ſpeare, and a ſhield. And euerie frée man of the laitie hauing goods in value worth ten marks, ſhould haue an habergeon, a ſtéele cap, & a ſpeare; and all burgeſſes, and the whole communaltie of frée men ſhould haue a wambais, a cap of ſtéele, and a ſpeare.

Further it was ordeined, that euerie man thus bound to haue armour, ſhould be ſworne to haue the ſame before the feaſt of S. Hilarie, and to be true vnto king Henrie Fitz empres, in defenſe of whome and of his realme they ſhould kéepe with them ſuch armour and weapon, according to his precept and commandement thereof had and made. And no man being furniſhed with ſuch armour, ſhould ſell, pledge, lend, or otherwiſe alien the ſame, neither may his lord by any means take the ſame from him, either by waie of forfeiture, by diſtreſſe or pledge, nor by any other means: and when any man died, hauing ſuch armour, he ſhall leaue it to his heire, and if his heire be not of lawfull age to weare it into the field, then he that hath the cuſtodie of his bodie ſhall haue the armour, and find an able man to weare it for him, till he come to age.

Iewes might haue no armour.

If any burgeſſe of any good towne haue more armour than he ought to haue by this ſtatute, he ſhall ſell it or giue it to ſome man that may weare it in the kings ſeruice. No Iew might haue armour by this ſtatute: but thoſe that had anie, were appointed to ſell the ſame to ſuch as were inhabitants within the realme, for no man might ſell or tranſport anie armour ouer the ſea, without the kings licence. For the better execution of which ordinance, it was ordeined, that inqueſts ſhould be taken by ſufficient iurors, what they were that were able to haue armour by their abilitie in lands and goods. Alſo the K. would, that none ſhould be ſworne to haue armour, except he were a frée man of birth and bloud.

Matt. Paris.

The ſame yeare, the king being at Waltham, aſſigned an aid to the maintenance of the chriſtian ſouldiers in the holie land, that is to wit, 42. thouſand marks of ſiluer, and fiue hundred marks of gold. Hugh Boſum otherwiſe called Reuelocke the ſonne of Ranulfe the ſecond of that name earle of Cheſter, died this yeare, and was buried at Léeke. He left behind him iſſue by his wife the counteſſe Beatrice daughter of Richard Lacie lord iuſtice of England, a ſonne named Ranulfe, who ſuccéeded him, being the firſt erle of Cheſter, & third of that name after the conqueſt. Beſides this Ranulfe he had foure daughters by his ſaid wife; to wit, Maud married to Dauid earle of Angus, Huntington and Galloway; Mabell coupled with William Daubignie earle of Arundell, Agnes married to William Ferrers earle of Derbie, and Hauiſe ioined with Robert Quincie earle of Lincolne.

But the king tooke no ſmall diſpleaſure with this vndiſcréet anſwer, inſomuch that he ſeized the caſtell of Durham into his hands, and ſought means to diſquiet the ſaid biſhop by diuerſe maner of waies.

The K. paſſeth ouer into Normandie.

The king held his Chriſtmaſſe this yeare at Wincheſter, and afterwards ſailed ouer into Normandie, bicauſe he heard that the king his ſonne was gone to his brother in law king Philip, and began to practiſe eftſoones new trouble, which was true indéed: but yet at length he came backe, and was reconciled to his father, and tooke an oth, that from thenceforth he would neuer ſwarue from him, nor demand more for his maintenance but an hundred pounds Aniouin by the daie, and ten pounds a day of the ſame monie for his wife. His father granted this, and alſo couenanted, that within the tearme of one yeare he would giue him the ſeruices of an hundred knights. Neuertheleſſe all this did little amend the matter, for though he ſet a new copie of countenance therevpon, yet he reteined his old peruerſe purpoſe in his diſcontented mind, hauing learned that War betwixt the brethren.

Here would king Henrie the father, that his ſon the king ſhould receiue homage of his brethren Richard earle of Poictow, and Geffrey earle of Britaine. The earle of Britaine did not ſtaie at the matter, but the earle of Poictow refuſed, alledging that it was not conuenient ſo long as their father liued, to acknowledge any ſuperioritie to their brother: for as the fathers inheritance was due to the eldeſt ſonne, ſo he claimed the lands which he held due to him in right of his mother. This deniall ſo much offended his brother the king, that afterwards when Richard would haue doone homage, he would not receiue it, wherevpon Richard departed from the court in great diſpleaſure, & comming into Poictow, began to fortifie his caſtels & townes, that he might be in a readineſſe to ſtand vpon his ſafegard, if his father or brethren ſhould come to purſue him. King Henrie the ſonne followed him, ſet on by the earles and barons of Poictow, which for the ſharpe and cruell gouernement of earle Richard, hated him mortallie. Againe on the other ſide, the fauourable courteſie, ſéemelie perſonage, and other noble qualities which they ſaw in the yoong king, moued them to take part with him againſt Richard, and ſhortlie after their brother Geffrey came with a great armie in aid of his brother the king, in ſo much that earle Richard not knowing how to ſhift off the preſent danger, ſent to his father for aid, who being verie ſorie in his mind to ſée ſuch vnnaturall dealing among his ſonnes, gathered an armie and ſet forward.

The father ſéeketh to appeaſe the quarell betwixt his ſonnes.

Earle Geffrey dealeth vnfaithfullie.

He had a little before trauelled to ſet them at one, in ſomuch that where earle Richard held a caſtell named Clareualx, which after the fathers deceaſſe ought to remaine vnto king Henrie the ſon, vpon his complaint thereof made, the father did ſo much with the earle, that he ſurrendered it into his fathers hands. Immediatlie after all the thrée ſonnes came to Angers, and there ſware to be obedient vnto their fathers will, and to ſerue him againſt all men: wherevpon he appointed them a daie to méet at Mirabell, where the barons of Guien ſhould alſo be, vnto whom king Henrie the ſonne had ſworne to aid them againſt earle Richard. Herewith was earle Geffrey ſent vnto them to perſuade them to peace and quietneſſe, and to come vnto Mirabell according to king Henrie the fathers appointment: but in ſtéed of perſuading them to peace (contrarie to his oth ſo oftentimes receiued) he procured them to purſue the warre both againſt his father and his brother earle Richard: and no maruell, for Malè ſarta gratia nunquam benè coaleſcit.

King Henrie the ſonne remaining with his father, ſhewed outwardlie that he wiſhed for peace, but his meaning was all contrarie, and ſo obteined licence of his father to go vnto Limoges, that he might labour to reduce both his brother Geffrey, and the barons of Guien vnto quietneſſe. But ſuch diſſembling was put in practiſe by king Henrie, that when the father followed with an armie, and came vnto Limoges, in ſtéed of receiuing him with honor, as it had béene their duties to haue doone, they ſhot at him, and pearſed through his vppermoſt armor, ſo that both he and his ſonne Richard were conſtreined to depart. Howbeit afterwards he entered that citie, and comming forth of it againe to talke with his ſonnes, thoſe within Limoges eftſoones rebelled, ſo that certeine of them within, ſhot the horſſe whereon king Henrie the father rode into the head. And if it had ſo chanced, that the horſſe in caſting vp his head had not receiued the blow, the arrow had light in the kings breſt, to the great danger & perill of his perſon. Neither did his ſonnes the king and his brother Geffrey go about to ſée ſuch an heinous attempt puniſhed, but rather ſéemed to like well of it, and to mainteine thoſe moſt malicious enimies of their ſoueraigne lord and father, for they ioined with them againſt him, although king Henrie the ſonne made countenance to be willing to reconcile his brother and the barons of Guien to his father by waie of ſome agréement: but his double dealing was too manifeſt, although indéed he abuſed his fathers patience for a while, who was deſirous of nothing more than to win his ſonnes by ſome courteous meanes, and therfore diuerſe times offered to pardon all offenſes committed by his enimies, at the ſuit of his ſonne the king, who in déed offered himſelfe now and then as an intreatour, but that was onelie to win time that his brother with ſuch Brabanders and other ſouldiers as he had with him in aid, beſide the forces of the barons of Guien, might worke the more miſchéefe againſt their father and their brother earle Richard, in waſting and deſtroieng their countries that ſtood ſtedfaſt on their ſide.

The diſloiall diſſembling of the yoong king.

In the meane time Richard the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and diuerſe other biſhops and abbats both of England and Normandie aſſembled togither at Caen, and in the abbeie church of S. Stephan pronounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt all thoſe that did hinder and impeach their purpoſe, which was to haue peace and concord concluded betwixt the king and his ſonnes, the ſame ſonnes onlie out of the ſaid ſentence excepted.

Diuerſe ſhiftes were made by king Henrie the ſonne, and his brother earle Geffrey alſo to get monie for the paiment of their ſouldiers, as ſpoiling of ſhrines, and ſuch like. But at length when things framed not to their purpoſe, and that the harme which they could doo againſt their father was much leſſe than they wiſhed, if power had béene anſwerable to their willes, king Henrie the ſonne through indignation and diſpleaſure (as ſome write) fell into a gréeuous ſickneſſe in a village called Mertell, not farre from Limoges, where his father laie at ſiege.

King Henrie the ſonne falleth ſicke.

At the firſt he was taken with an extreame feuer, and after followed a ſore flixe. Now perceiuing himſelfe in danger of death, and that the phyſicians had giuen him ouer, he ſent to his father (better late than neuer) confeſſing his treſpaſſe committed againſt him, and required of all fatherlie loue to come & ſée him once before he died. But for that the father thought not good to commit himſelfe into the hands of ſuch vngratious perſons as were about his ſonne, he ſent his ring vnto him in token of his bleſſing,

He ſendeth to his father.

and as it were a pledge to ſignifie that he had forgiuen him his vnnaturall doings againſt him. The ſon receiuing it with great humilitie, kiſſed it, and ſo ended his life in the preſence of the archbiſhop of Burdeaux and others, on the day of ſaint Barnabie the apoſtle. He died (as ſome write) verie penitent and ſorowfull.

His repentance before his death.

And whereas in his life time he had vowed to make a iournie into the holie land againſt Gods enimies, and taken vpon him the croſſe for that intent, he deliuered it vnto his familiar fréend William Marſhall to go thither with it in his ſtead. Moreouer when he perceiued preſent death at hand, he firſt confeſſed his ſinnes ſecretlie, and after openly before ſundrie biſhops and men of religion, and receiued abſolution in moſt humble wiſe. After this, he cauſed his fine clothes to be taken from him, and therewith a heare cloth to be put vpon him, and after tieng a cord about his necke, he ſaid vnto the biſhops and other that ſtood by him; I deliuer my ſelfe an vnworthie and gréeuous ſinner vnto you the miniſters of God by this cord, beſéeching our Lord Ieſus Chriſt, which pardoned the théefe confeſſing his faults on the croſſe, that through your praiers and for his great mercies ſake it may pleaſe him to be mercifull vnto my ſoule; wherevnto they all anſwered, Amen. Then he ſaid vnto them, Draw me out of this bed with this cord, and laie me on that bed ſtrawed with aſhes (which he had of purpoſe prepared) and as he commanded ſo they did: and they laid at his féet and at his head two great ſquare ſtones. Thus being prepared to die, he willed his bodie after his deceaſſe to be conueied into Normandie, and buried at Rouen. And ſo after he had receiued the ſacrament of the bodie and bloud of our Lord, he departed this life as afore is ſaid, about the 28. yeare of his age.

A ſtrange kind of ſuperſtitious deuotion, if this report of our author be true

He is drawne out of his bed, a thing vnlike to be true.

His death.

His bodie after his death was conueied towards Rouen, there to be buried accordinglie as he had willed: but when thoſe that had charge to conueie it thither were come vnto the citie of Mauns, the biſhop there and the cleargie would not ſuffer them to go any further with it, but committed it to buriall in honourable wiſe within the church of ſaint Iulian. Whereof when the citizens of Rouen were aduertiſed, they were ſore offended with that dooing, and ſtreightwaies ſent vnto them of Mauns, requiring to haue the corps deliuered, threatening otherwiſe with manie earneſt oths to fetch it from them by force. Wherefore king Henrie, to ſet order in this matter, commanded that the corps of his ſonne the king ſhould be deliuered vnto them of Rouen to be buried in their citie, as he himſelfe had willed before his death. And ſo it was taken vp and conueied to Rouen, where it was eftſoones buried in the church of our ladie.

N. Triuet.

The bodie of the yong king laſtlie buried at Rouen.

¶ Thus ended this yoong king in his floriſhing youth, to whome through his owne iuſt deſerts long life was iuſtlie denied, ſith he delighted to begin his gouernement with vnlawfull attempts, as an other Abſolon againſt his owne naturall father, ſéeking by wrongfull violence to pull the ſcepter out of his hand. He is not put in the number of kings, bicauſe he remained for the more part vnder the gouernance of his father, ſo that he rather bare the name of king as appointed to reigne, than that he may be ſaid to haue reigned in déed. So that héere by the waie a notable obſeruation dooth occurre and offer it ſelfe to be noted of vs; namelie, that euen princes children, though borne to great excellencie, and in high degrée of dignitie, are to conſider with themſelues, that notwithſtanding their ſtatelie titles of ſouereigntie, they haue a dutie to diſcharge vnto their parents, which if it be neglected, and that in place thereof diſobedience is ſubſtituted, God himſelfe (when politike lawes prouide not to puniſh ſuch offenſes) will take the cauſe in hand, & will powre vengeance vpon ſuch vngratious children. For he will be true of his word both in bleſſing and curſſing, in bleſſing the dutifull child with long life and happie daies, and in curſſing the obſtinate and froward with ſhort life and vnfortunate daies, according to the tenure of his law. If this man had liued in the old Romans time, when aged perſons were ſo reuerenced and honoured (much more parents) he had béene cut off in the prime of his diſobedience, and preſent death had béene inflicted vpon him as a due and deſerued reward; which Iuuenal noteth excellentlie well in theſe words,

Credebant hoc grande nefas, & morte piandum,
Si iuuenis vetulo non aſſurrexerat, & ſi
Barbato cuicunq; puer, licèt ipſe videret
Plura domi farra, & maioris glandis aceruos,
Tam venerabile erat præcedere quattuor annis,
Primáq; par adeò ſacræ lanugo ſenectæ.

King Henrie (after his ſonne the king was thus dead) inforced his power more earneſtlie than before to winne the citie and caſtell of Limoges which he had beſieged, and at length had them both ſurrendered into his hands, with all other caſtels and places of ſtrength kept by his enimies in thoſe parts, of the which ſome he furniſhed with gariſons, and ſome he cauſed to be laied flat with the ground.

Limoges rendred to king Henrie.

There roſe about the ſame time occaſion of ſtrife and variance betwixt king Henrie and the French king, about the enioieng of the countrie lieng vpon Giſors, called Veulqueſine, on this ſide the riuer of Hept, which was giuen vnto king Henrie the ſonne, in conſideration of the marriage betwixt him and quéene Margaret the French kings ſiſter. For the French king now after the death of his brother in law king Henrie the ſonne, required to haue the ſame reſtored vnto the crowne of France: but king Henrie was not willing to part with it. At length they met betwixt Trie and Giſors to talke of the matter, where they agréed that quéene Margaret the widow of the late deceaſed king Henrie the ſon, ſhould receiue yearelie during hir life 1750 pounds of Antouin monie at Paris, of king Henrie the father and his heires; in conſideration whereof ſhe ſhould releaſe and quit claime all hir right to thoſe lands that were demanded, as Veulqueſine and others. Shortlie after, Geffrey erle of Britaine came to his father, and ſubmitting himſelfe, was reconciled to him, and alſo to his brother Richard earle of Poictow. Alſo I find that king Henrie at an enterview had betwixt him and the French king at their accuſtomed place of méeting betwixt Trie and Giſors on ſaint Nicholas day, did his homage to the ſame French king for the lands which he held of him on that ſide the ſea, which to doo till then he had refuſed. The ſame yeare king Henrie held his Chriſtmas at the citie of Mauns.

The kings of England and France talke togither.

Anno Reg. 30.

When the king had ſet the French king and the earle of Flanders at agréement for the controuerſie that chanced betwixt them about the lands of Vermendois, he paſſed through the earle of Flanders countrie, and comming to Wiſand, tooke ſhip and ſailed ouer into England, landing at Douer the tenth day of Iune, with his daughter the dutches of Saxonie, who was afterwards deliuered of a ſonne at Wincheſter, and hir huſband the duke of Saxonie came alſo this yeare into England, and was ioifullie receiued and honourablie interteined of the king his father in law.

The ducheſſe of Saxonie deliuered of a ſonne.

And whereas the archbiſhop of Colen came ouer into England this yeare to viſit the toome of Thomas late archbiſhop of Canturburie, the king trauelled to make an agréement betwixt him and the Saxoniſh duke touching a certeine variance depending betwixt them, wherin the king did ſo much, that the archbiſhop forgaue all iniuries paſt, and ſo they were made fréends. Alſo by the counſell of the ſame archbiſhop the king ſent Hugh Nouant archdeacon of Liſeux and others, ambaſſadours from him vnto pope Lucius, that by his helpe there might be made ſome waie to obteine a pardon for the ſaid duke, and licence for him to returne into his countrie. Thoſe that were ſent demeaned themſelues ſo diſcréetly in dooing their meſſage, that the emperour comming where the pope then was, that is to ſay, at Verona in Italie, at the earneſt ſuit of the ſaid pope was contented to releaſe all his euill will which he bare towards the duke, pardoned him for all things paſt, and licenced him now at length to returne home into his countrie, his condemnation of exile being cléerlie reuoked.

There died this yeare ſundrie honorable perſonages, as Simon earle of Huntington ſon to Simon earle of Northampton, after whoſe deceaſe the king gaue his earledome vnto his brother Dauid, or (as Radulfus de Diceto ſaith) bicauſe the ſaid Simon died without iſſue, the king gaue the earledome of Huntington vnto William king of Scots ſonne to earle Henrie that was ſonne to king Dauid. Alſo the earle of Warwike died this yeare, and Thomas Fitz Bernard lord chéefe iuſtice of the foreſts, which roome Alaine de Neuill had inioied before him. Now after the death of this Thomas Fitz Bernard, the king diuided his foreſts into ſundrie quarters, and to euerie quarter he appointed foure iuſtices, two of the ſpiritualtie, and two knights of the temporaltie, beſide two generall wardens that were of his owne ſeruants, to be as ſuruеiers aboue all other foreſters of vert and veniſon, whoſe office was to ſée that no diſorder nor ſpoile were committed within any grounds of warren contrarie to the aſſiſes of foreſts. Diuerſe prelates died this yeare alſo, as foure biſhops, to wit, Gerald ſurnamed la Pucelle biſhop of Cheſter, Walran biſhop of Rocheſter, Joceline of Saliſburie, and Bartholomew of Exceſter.

Beſides theſe, diuerſe abbats, & on the 16. of Februarie died Richard archbiſhop of Canturburie in the 11. yeare after his firſt entring into the gouernment of that ſée. His bodie was buried at Canturburie. He was noted to be a man of euill life, and waſted the goods of that church inordinatlie. It was reported that before his death there appeared to him a viſion, which ſaid; Thou haſt waſted the goods of the church, and I ſhall root thée out of the earth. Wherevpon he tooke ſuch a feare, that he died within eight daies after. Then Baldwin who before was biſhop of Worceſter ſucceeded him, he was the 40. archbiſhop that had ruled the church of Canturburie. The king and biſhops procured his election not without much adoo: for the moonks pretending a right thereto, were ſore againſt it. It is reported of him, that after he was made a white moonke, he neuer eat fleſh to his liues end. On a time an old woman met him, and aſked him if it were true that he neuer eat any maner of fleſh; It is true ſaid he. It is falſe quoth ſhe, for I had but one cow to find me with, and thy ſeruants haue taken hir from me. Whervnto he anſwered, that if it ſo were, ſhe ſhould haue as good a cow reſtored to hir by Gods grace as hir owne was. The ſame time alſo Margaret the wife of the late deceaſed king Henrie the ſon, returned into France to hir brother king Philip, and was after ioined in mariage with Bela king of Hungarie.

But after long digreſſion to returne againe to our purpoſe. The king being aduertiſed of the deſtruction and ſpoile which the Welſhmen dailie did practiſe againſt his ſubiects, both in their perſons and ſubſtance, aſſembled a mightie armie, and came with the ſame vnto Worceſter, meaning to inuade the enimies countries. But Rées ap Griffin fearing his puiſſance thus bent againſt him and other the leaders of the Welſhmen, came by ſafeconduct vnto Worceſter, and there ſubmitting himſelfe, ſware fealtie to the king, and became his liegeman, promiſing to bring his ſonne and nephues vnto him as pledges. But when (according to his promiſe) he would haue brought them, they refuſed to go with him, and ſo the matter reſted for a time.

After this, king Henrie held his Chriſtmaſſe at Windſore, and the ſame yeare Heraclius the patriarch of Jeruſalem, and Roger maſter of the houſe of S. Johns of Jeruſalem came into England, to make ſuit vnto king Henrie for aid againſt the Saracens that dailie wan from the chriſtians, townes and holds in the holie land, taking and killing the people moſt miſerablie, as in the deſcription of the holie land may more plainelie appeare, where the dooings of Saladine the Saracen are touched. The patriarch made earneſt requeſt vnto the king, proffering him the keies of the citie of Jeruſalem, and of the holie ſepulchre (with the letters of Lucius the third then pope of Rome) charging him to take vpon him the iournie, and to haue mind of the oth which before time he had made.

Heraclius patriarch of Jeruſalem.

The king deferred his anſwer for a time, and calling a councell of his lords togither at Clerkenwell, on the 15. of Aprill, aſked their aduice in this matter: who declared to him, that as they tooke it, he might not well depart ſo far out of his realme and other dominions, leauing the ſame as a prey to his enimies. And wheras it was thought by ſome, that he might apoint one of his ſonnes to take vpon him that iournie, yet bicauſe they were not as then within the realme, it was iudged that in their abſence there was no reaſon why it ſhould be ſo decréed.

A councell at Clerkenwell.

Howbeit in the meane time vpon licence granted by the king, that ſo manie might go as would, Baldwin the archbiſhop of Canturburie preached, and exhorted men to take vpon them the croſſe ſo effectuallie, that a great number receiuing it, fullie purpoſed to go on in that iournie. At length the king gaue anſwer to the patriarch, excuſing himſelfe in that he could go, for he declared that he might not leaue his land without kéeping, being in danger to remaine as a prey to the robberie and ſpoile of the French men: but he offered to giue large ſummes of gold and ſiluer to ſuch as would take vpon them that voiage. With this anſwer the cardinall was nothing pleaſed, and therefore ſaid; We ſéeke a man and not monie: euerie chriſtian region well néere ſendeth vs monie, but no countrie ſendeth vs a prince; and therfore we require a prince that néedeth monie, and not monie that néedeth a prince. But the king ſtill alledged matter for his excuſe, ſo that the patriarch departed from him comfortleſſe, and greatlie diſcontented in his mind: whereof the king hauing knowledge, and intending ſomewhat to recomfort him with ſwéet and pleaſant words, followed him to the ſea ſide. But the more the king thought to ſatiſfie the patriarch with words, the more wroth and diſcontented he ſhewed himſelfe to be; in ſo much that at the laſt he ſaid vnto him, Hitherto haſt thou reigned gloriouſlie, but hereafter ſhalt thou be forſaken of him, whom thou at this time forſakeſt. Conſider of him, and remember what he hath giuen thée, and what thou haſt yéelded to him againe, how firſt thou waſt falſe to the king of France, and after ſluedſt archbiſhop Becket, and now laſtlie thou forſakeſt the protection of Chriſtes faith.

The words of the patriarch to the king.

The king was ſtirred with theſe words, and ſaid vnto the patriarch, Though all the men of the land were one bodie, and ſpake with one mouth, they durſt not vtter ſuch words againſt me. No woonder (ſaid the patriarch) for they loue thine and not thee; that is to ſay, they loue thy temporall goods, and ſtand in feare of thee for loſſe of promotion, but thy ſoule they loue not. And when he had ſo ſaid, he offered his head to the king; ſaieng, Doo by me euen as thou diddeſt by archbiſhop Becket, for all is one to me, either to be ſlaine heere in Europe of a wicked chriſtian, or in the holie land by a Saracen, for thou art woorſe than a Saracen, and thy people follow the prey and ſpoile and not a man. The king kept his patience, and ſaid, I may not go out of my land, for if I ſhould, mine owne ſonnes would riſe and rebell againſt me. No maruell (ſaid the patriarch) for of the diuell they came, and to the diuell they ſhall. And thus he departed from the king in great diſpleaſure. ¶ Thus haue ſome written: but by others it appeareth that the patriarch remained here till the king went ouer into Normandie himſelfe, in companie of whom the patriarch went alſo (as after ſhall appeare.)

John the kings ſonne made king of Ireland.
Ger.Dor.

This yeare the laſt of March, king Henrie made his ſonne John knight, and ſhortlie after ſent him ouer into Ireland, of which countrie he had made him king. At his comming into Ireland, he was honourablie receiued of the archbiſhop of Diueline, and other noble men that had beene ſent thither before him. The king allowed him great abundance of treaſure, but he hauing learned that keeping it in his coffers (as one now come into a ſtrange place, and not knowing what he ſhuld want) would not depart with it ſo freelie amongſt his ſouldiers and men of warre as they looked for: by reaſon whereof their ſeruice was ſuch, that in diuerſe conflicts he loſt manie of his men, and at length was driuen through want of conuenient aid, to returne againe into England, hauing appointed his capteins and ſouldiers to remaine in places moſt expedient for the defenſe of that countrie. ¶ But heereof yee may read more at large in the hiſtorie of Ireland.

Non minor eſt virtus quàm quærere parta tueri,

An earthquake.

On the mondaie in the weeke before Eaſter, chanced a ſore earthquake thorough all the parts of this land, ſuch a one as the like had not beene heard of in England ſithens the beginning of the world. For ſtones that laie couched faſt in the earth, were remooued out of their places, ſtone houſes were ouerthrowne, and the great church of Lincolne was rent from the top downwards.

The king and the patriarch paſſe ouer into France.

The kings meſſage to his ſonne earle Richard.

Erle Richard obeieth his father.

The day next after this terrible woonder, the king and the patriarch with the biſhop of Durham and a great ſort of other Noble men of this realme, paſſed the ſeas from Douer to Willand, and ſo rode forth towards Normandie, where immediatlie vpon his comming thither he raiſed a power, and ſent word to his ſonne Richard earle of Poictou (which had fortified the townes and caſtels of Poictou againſt him, and taken his brother Geffrey priſoner) that except he deliuered vp into his mothers hands the whole countrie of Poictou, he would ſurelie come to chaſtiſe him with an iron rod, and bring him vnder obedience ſmallie to his eaſe. Vpon this meſſage earle Richard being ſomewhat better aduiſed, obeied his fathers commandements in all points, rendring vp into his mothers hands the earldome of Poictou, and comming to his father as an obedient ſonne, ſhewed himſelfe readie to ſerue him at commandement with a glad and willing mind. Soone after this, and about the ſeauenth houre of the day, the ſunne ſuffered a generall eclipſe, ſo that no part of it appeared, and therwith followed great thunder with lightning and ſore tempeſt, with the violence whereof both men and beaſts were deſtroied, and manie houſes burned.

Particular and not generall, ſaith Ger.Dor.

Shortlie after this, the kings of England and France met and communed togither for the aiding of them in the holie land, and they promiſed indeed to ſend thither both men and monie: but the patriarch made ſmall account thereof, for he was much deceiued of that which he hoped to haue brought to paſſe, which was, either to haue got the king of England, or one of his ſonnes, or ſome other man of great authoritie with him into the holie land: but bicauſe that would not be, he departed from the court verie ſorrowfull and ſore diſpleaſed, ſo that it may be thought, that then (and not before his departure out of England) he ſpake his mind ſo plainlie vnto the king (as before yee haue heard.)

Anno Reg. 42.

Moreouer, about this time king Henrie obteined of pope Vrbane the third, that he might crowne which of his ſonnes it ſhould pleaſe him king of Ireland, in token of which grant and confirmation, the ſaid pope ſent vnto him a crowne of peacocks feathers, after a feat maner wouen in with gold.

1186

This yeare the king held his Chriſtmaſſe at Danfrount, and ſhortlie after came to a communication with the French king, at the which he tooke a ſolemne oth that he would deliuer the ladie Alice the French kings ſiſter (whome he had as yet in his cuſtodie) vnto his ſonne Richard erle of Poictou in mariage. For the which mariage to be had and ſolemnized, the French king granted to deliuer vnto the ſaid Richard the towne of Giſors, with all that which his father king Lewes promiſed vnto king Henrie the ſonne (latelie deceaſſed) in marriage with queene Margaret the wife of the ſame Henrie, receiuing an oth thereto, neuer to make anie claime or chalenge to the ſame towne and lands.

King Henrie returneth into England.
Ger.Dor.
Hugh prior of Witham made biſhop of Lincolne.

King Henrie (after he had thus concluded and finiſhed his affaires with the French king) returned backe into England in Maie, and then was Hugh prior of Witham inſtituted biſhop of Lincolne after that the ſee there had beene void and without any lawfull gouernour almoſt the ſpace of ſeauenteene yeares. This Hugh was reputed a verie godlie and vertuous man. Before him Walter Conſtance was nominated to that ſee, but bicauſe he was made archbiſhop of Rouen before he was inueſted in the church of Lincolne, he is not accounted in number of the biſhops of Lincolne.

Moreouer king Henrie ſhortlie after his returne at this time into England, aſſembled a great armie, and went with the ſame to Caerleill, in purpoſe to haue entred Galloway, and there to haue chaſtiſed Rouland lord of that countrie, who was ſonne to Vthred the ſonne of Fergus, for the iniuries doone to his cooſine germains, namelie to Duncane ſonne to Gilbert, who was ſonne to the ſame Fergus, in ſpoiling him and the reſidue (after the deceaſſe of the ſaid Gilbert) of their parts of inheritance, vſurping the whole to himſelfe. But as the king was now readie to inuade his countrie, Rouland came to him, and vſed ſuch meanes vnder pretenſe of ſatiſfaction, that he made his peace with the king, who therevpon brought backe his armie, and did no more at that time.

Hugh Lacie ſlaine.

About the ſame time came newes to the king, that Hugh Lacie was ſlaine in Ireland by an Iriſh gentleman that was his confederate (or rather by a labourer, as in the Iriſh hiſtorie you may read) whereof the king was nothing ſorie, bicauſe the ſame Hugh was growne to ſo high degree of puiſſance in that countrie, that he refuſed to obeie the kings commandement when he ſent for him.

¶ It is to be noted, that when king Henrie had conquered the moſt part of Ireland, and ſet the countrie in ſome good order, after his comming from thence, ſuch capteines as he left there behind him, were not idle, but ſtill did what they could to inlarge the confines which were committed to their gouernance: but amongſt them all this Hugh Lacie was the chéefeſt, in ſomuch that after the death of Richard earle of Striguile, the king made him gouernour of the countrie in place of the ſaid earle, by reaſon whereof he ſo inlarged his poſſeſſions, that within a while he became dreadfull, not onelie to the enimies, but alſo to his aſſociats, as to ſuch Engliſh capteins as were abiding in Ireland vpon gard of the Engliſh frontiers. For if any of them diſobeied his commandement, he would not ſticke to chaſtiſe them at his pleaſure, ſo that by ſuch meanes he ſéemed rather to conquer the countrie to his owne vſe, than to the kings. Wherein he dealt not ſo directlie or diſcréetlie as he might; for,

Hugh Lacies diligence to inlarge his poſſeſſions in Ireland.

Homines volunt allici non impelli.

He had alſo ioined himſelfe in mariage with a daughter of the king of Vlneſter, not making king Henrie priuie to the ſame. Wherevpon the king hauing ſundrie informations preſented to him of ſuch his preſumptuous demeanour, commanded him by his letters to returne home, and come before his preſence, which to doo (as before I haue ſaid) he refuſed, by reaſon whereof he confirmed the ſuſpicion which was conceiued of him, to riſe vpon no vaine coniectures, and therefore the euill that came to him was nothing lamented of king Henrie, who with good cauſe was highlie offended towards him for the contempts and conſiderations aforeſaid.

King Henrie not ſorie for the death of Lacie.

This yeare Geffrey the kings ſon who was earle of Britaine died at Paris, and was buried in the ſame citie, leauing behind him (beſides two daughters) one onlie ſonne as then in his mothers wombe, of whom ſhe was deliuered in the night of the feaſt of Eaſter next inſuing hir huſbands death: he was named Arthur, and ſucceeded his father in the earledome of Britaine. His fathers death was occaſioned (as men iudge) by a fall which he caught at a tourneie, for he was ſore bruiſed therewith, and neuer had his health, but finallie fell into a ſir and ſo died.

The death of Geffrey the kings ſonne.

About this ſeaſon pope Vrbane wrote vnto Baldwin archbiſhop of Canterburie, granting him licence to build a church at Akinton, in honour of S. Stephan and Thomas Becket now reputed a martyr, and that the fourth part of the offerings which came to the box of Thomas the martyr ſhould be aſſigned to the vſe of the monks, & an other fourth part to the buildings of that church, and an other fourth part to be giuen to the pope, and the other fourth part remaining he might reſerue to himſelfe to beſtow at his pleaſure. But within a while after, at the ſuit and ſupplication of the prior and couent of Canturburie (who liked nothing of the former partition) the pope ſent letters of prohibition to the ſaid archbiſhop, that he ſhould ceaſſe from building of the forementioned church, bicauſe the building therof would be preiudiciall to the church of Canturburie.

About the ſame time alſo king Henrie gaue his coſen the ladie Ermengard (who was daughter to Richard Vicount Beaumount) in marriage vnto Willam king of Scotland, cauſing the archbiſhop of Canturburie to ioine them togither in the bond of matrimonie within the chappell at Woodſtocke, where he kept great chéere in honour of that marriage for the ſpace of foure daies togither. And further he gaue at the ſame time vnto the king of Scots the caſtell of Edenbourgh: and the king of Scots ſtreitwaies gaue it vnto his wife the forſaid Ermingard, as a portion of hir dower, augmented with an hundred pounds of lands by the yeare, and 40. knights fées.

The ladie Ermengard the vicount Beaumonts daughter, maried to William king of Scots.

Caſtell of Edenbourgh.

The French king required to haue the cuſtodie of the infant Arthur, heire to Geffrey earle of Britaine: but king Henrie would in no wiſe grant therevnto. Wherefore he ſent Walter archbiſhop of Rouen, William de Mandeuille earle of Albemarle, and Ranulfe de Glanduille lord chéefe iuſtice of England to the French court, to talke with king Philip about that matter, ſo that king Philip hauing heard them, was contented to ſtaie from attempting force till the feaſt of S. Hilarie. But in the meane time it chanced, that one ſir Richard de Walles a knight of the realme of France went about to fortifie a caſtell in a village that belonged to him called Walles, ſituated betwixt Trie & Giſors. Wherevpon Henrie Vere (conſtable of Giſors vnder William earle of Albemarle) was nothing content therewith, and therefore got a companie togither, & went forth to diſturbe the worke. Vpon this occaſion the ſeruants of the ſaid ſir Richard de Walles came forth, and encountred with him in the field, in ſomuch that Rafe the ſonne of ſir Richard de Walles was ſlaine, and the reſidue that were with him fled, many of them being ſore beaten and wounded.

Ambaſſadours ſent to the French king.

Sir william de walles.

When the French king was informed hereof, he cauſed all the kings of England his ſubiects, that could be found within his countries and dominion of France to be apprehended, and their goods ſeized. The ſtewards, bailiffes, & officers then of king Henrie, did the like by the French kings ſubiects that chanced to be at that preſent within the king of Englands countries, on that further ſide of the ſea. But within a little while after, the French king ſet the Engliſh ſubiects at libertie, and ſo likewiſe did the K. of Englands officers releaſe the French ſubiects.

The king of Englands ſubiects arreſted in France.

The French ſubiects arreſted in Normandie.

At this time king Henrie held his Chriſtmaſſe at Gilford, and ſhortlie after came one Octauianus a ſubdeacon cardinall, and Hugh de Nonant from the court of Rome, ſent as legats from pope Vrbane into Ireland, that they might crowne earle Iohn the kings ſonne king of that land. But king Henrie made a delaie therein, taking the legats with him into Normandie, whither he ſailed at the ſame time, and landing at Whitſand, he went from thence into Normandie, and ſhortlie after came to a communication with the French king, at a place called Vadum Sancti Remigij, where after much talke they could not agrée, by reaſon the French king demanded things vnreaſonable, and ſo they departed without any thing concluded [ſauing a truce] till after Whitſuntide.

About the ſame time, the citie of Ieruſalem was taken by Saladine the chéefe prince of the Saracens. Wherevpon much conference was had among the chriſtian princes for the ſuccoring of thoſe chriſtians, which as yet held and defended other péeces in the holie land, ſo that by publiſhing of the popes buls, manie toke on them the croſſe: and amongſt other Richard the ſonne of king Henrie (without anie licence obteined of his father) receiued the ſame, vowing to go thither out of hand, and to fight againſt Gods enimies to the vttermoſt of his power.

Ieruſalem taken.

In the meane time the grudge ſtill increaſed betwixt king Henrie and Philip the French king, partlie for one cauſe, and partlie for an other, but ſpeciallie one chéefe occaſion was for that earle Richard deferred the doings of his homage vnto king Philip for the dutchie of Poictou, which by his fathers appointment he now inioied and held. The French king to preuent his enimies, immediatlie vpon the expiring of the truce raiſed a power, and entring into the dominions belonging to king Henrie, waſted the countrie till he came vnto Chateu Raoul: about which caſtell alſo he forthwith planted his ſiege.

Out of the annales of France written by Nicoll Gillis.

When king Henrie was aduertiſed hereof, he raiſed his power alſo, and togither with his ſonne earle Richard came with all ſpéed to ſuccour his people, Ger.Dor.

A truce granted.

ple, and to ſaue his caſtell from the hands of his enimies. Now when he approched néere vnto the place, he pitcht downe his tents ouer againſt the one ſide of the French campe, and earle Richard on the other, ſo that they were readie to aſſaile the French king on both ſides at once, but before they came to ioine battell, by the mediation of a cardinall (as ſome write) or (as other ſaie) through meanes made by the earle of Flanders, the matter was taken vp. For earle Richard through perſuaſion of the ſaid earle of Flanders came to the French king, and agréed with him, before that his father king Henrie was reſolued of any ſuch matter for his part, ſo that he was now in a maruellous perplexitie, & almoſt to ſéeke what was beſt to doo, as a man fearing his owne ſuertie, by reaſon of miſtruſt which he had in his ſonne Richard: but yet at the length through humble ſuit made by his ſaid ſonne vnto the French king, a truce was granted by the ſpace of two yeares.

Earle Richard, after the matter was thus taken vp, went into France with the French king, of whom he was ſo honoured whileſt he was there, that they kept one table at dinner and ſupper in the daie time, and (as was ſaid) one bed ſerued them both to ſléepe on in the night.

Erle Richard giueth his father faire words.

He ſetzeth vpon his fathers treaſure.

In the meane time king Henrie hearing of all this, fell into great ſuſpicion whereto this great familiaritie betwixt the French king and his ſonne would tend, and doubting the likelieſt, ſent for him to returne vnto him. But earle Richard perceiuing his father to miſtruſt his loialtie, gaue faire words, and promiſed to returne with all conuenient ſpéed. Howbeit he ment an other matter, and ſo departing from the French court, came to Chinon, where he got into his hands a great portion of his fathers treaſure that was kept there, againſt the will of him that had the cuſtodie of it, and taking it thus awaie with him, he began to fortifie his caſtels and townes within his countrie of Poictou, and clearlie refuſed to come backe to his father for a time, although at length forſaking the counſell of naughtie men, he turned home vnto him, and humblie ſubmitted himſelfe, in ſuch wiſe as to his dutie apperteined. And for the more aſſurance therof, he renewed his fealtie, in receiuing an oth vpon the holie euangeliſts. Which doone, king Henrie went into Britaine with an armie, and wone the caſtell of Mountreleis by ſiege, which one Henrie de Lions, and one Odinemer his brother had gotten into their hands, after the deceaſſe of Geffrey earle of Britaine.

This yeare the twentie of October, the citie of Chicheſter was almoſt wholie conſumed to aſhes by miſchance of fire. The head church with the biſhops palace, and the houſes of the canons were burnt euen downe to the ground. After this king Henrie held his Chriſtmaſſe at Caen, from whence he went to Harflet, and there taking the ſea paſſed ouer into England. The French king hearing by and by of his departure, aſſembled a great armie, and threatned to deſtroie the countrie of Normandie, and other lands on that ſide the ſea, except king Henrie would deliuer into his hands the towne of Giſors, with the appurtenances, or cauſe his ſonne Richard earle of Poictou to take to wife his ſiſter Alice, according to his promiſe.

King Henrie paſſeth againe into Normandie.

Heauie newes from the eaſt parts.

An enterview betwixt the two kings.

The two kings receiue the croſſe.

The French ware red croſſes, The Engliſh white, The Flemings gréene.

When king Henrie was aduertiſed hereof, he turned with all ſpeed into Normandie, that he might prouide for timelie reſiſtance, if the French king came forward to inuade his dominions. About the ſelfe ſame time came newes out of the holie land, that Saladine after the winning of Ieruſalem, purſued his victorie with ſuch ſucceſſe, that he had taken from the chriſtians the more part of all other towns and ſtrengths within the land. Theſe newes were nothing pleaſant to the chriſtian princes, and namelie the two kings Henrie and Philip ſéemed ſorowfull for the ſame, and therefore came to an enterview togither on the 21. day of Ianuarie betwixt Trie and Giſors, where the archbiſhop of Tire was preſent, through whoſe earneſt exhortation the two kings were made fréends, and the ſame day receiued the croſſe at his hands in purpoſe to make a iournie togither againſt thoſe Saracens that had doone ſuch iniuries to the chriſtian name. And for a difference that one nation might be knowne from an other, the French king and his people tooke vpon them to weare read croſſes, the king of England and his ſubiects white croſſes: but the earle of Flanders and his men ware gréene.

An aid granted to them in the holie land.
Wil. Paruus.

Herewith they departed aſunder, each one repairing to their countries to prouide their armies, and make them in a readineſſe to ſet forward by a day towards this neceſſarie iournie. King Henrie comming to Chinon, by aduiſe of his councell, ordeined that euerie one of his ſubiects ſhould yéeld a tenth part of his reuenues and moueable goods for that yeare towards the aid of them in the holie land (corne of that yeares growth excepted, and alſo all armour, horſſes, bookes, apparell, ornaments of chappels, and pretious ſtones, which ſhould not come in the rate of goods now taxed, nor be charged with this paiment.) Moreouer thoſe knights and men of warre that were appointed to go in this iournie paied nothing, but had that monie alſo towards their furniture, which were gathered of their tenants and farmers, howbeit burgeſſes and others that tooke vpon them the croſſe without licence of their lords, paied his tenth, ſo that none of them went frée.

Good orders and diſcipline inſtituted.

The king returneth into England.

A councell holden at Gaitington.
Ger.Dor.

There were alſo good orders deuiſed, both for the aduancement of Gods glorie, and the releefe of the common-wealth, as that no man ſhould ſweare in any outragious maner, that no man ſhould plaie at cards, dice or tables, and that no maner of perſon after Eaſter ſhould weare any coſtlie furs or cloth of ſcarlet, nor that men ſhould vſe to haue their tables ſerued with more than two diſhes of meat at one meale, nor ſhould haue their apparell cut, iagged, or laced: and further, that none of them ſhould take any women forth with them in this iournie, except ſuch a landreſſe, of whome there might not growe anie ſuſpicion of wanton life. It was alſo ordeined, that the monie of ſuch as died in this iournie, ſhould go towards the finding and maintenance of their ſeruants and of poore people, and towards the aid of the chriſtians in the holie land. Moreouer, the pope granted that all thoſe that went forth in this iournie, repenting and confeſſing their ſinnes, ſhould be abſolued and pardoned of the ſame. The king hauing thus taken order for his buſineſſe in the parts on the further ſide the ſea, came now ouer into England againe, landing at Winchelſey on a ſaturday the thirtith day of Ianuarie, and calling a councell togither at Gaitington, which is eight or nine miles from Northampton, he there declared what orders he had taken for his iournie into the holie land. Wherevpon the biſhops of Norwich and Lincolne, and a great number of other people tooke vpon them the croſſe at the preaching of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the biſhop of Rocheſter.

A tenth leuied.

The king of Scots.

This doone, king Henrie tooke order alſo for the leuieng of the tenth, as well here in England, as he had doone in the parts ſubiect to him on the further ſide the ſea. He alſo ſent Hugh biſhop of Durham, and other both ſpirituall and temporall perſons, vnto William king of Scots, to gather the tenth likewiſe within his countrie, but he met them betwixt Wark and Brightham, and would not ſuffer them to enter into Scotland, but he offered to giue vnto the king of England in recompenſe of the tenths, and for to haue againe his caſtels, the ſumme of 5000. marks of ſiluer, which could not be accepted. The French king likewiſe gathered the tenths in his countrie towards this intended iournie. But by the working of ſome wicked ſpirit (as we may well thinke) which enuied the aduancement of the chriſtian commonwealth, that good meaning of the two kings was broken and diſappointed: for the peace latelie concluded betwixt them continued not long vnuiolated.

The good meaning of the two kings diſappointed. Polydor.

The French writers impute the fault thereof vnto Engliſh men, and the Engliſh writers laie it to French men. The French writers ſay, that earle Richard the ſon of king Henrie in breach of the league, made warre vpon Reimond earle of Tholouze. The Engliſh writers reproue the French king as a wicked man, in that he ſhould of purpoſe breake the peace and moue warre againſt king Henrie, to withdraw him from going to make warre againſt the Saracens, to the which enterpriſe he was wholie bent and inclined. Such is the maner of manie writers, who more affectionat to the loue of their countrie than to the truth, doo not obſerue the law of hiſtories in their writings, but rather inueie one againſt another in a bralling and reprouing maner.

Reimond erle of Tholouze.

¶ Examples hereof are more than by any poſſibilitie may be remembred, and namelie for breuitie ſake George Bucchanan in the 8. booke of his Scotiſh hiſtorie verie reprochfullie ſpeaketh of Richard Grafton (a right reuerend man whiles he liued and of entier name alſo being dead) charging him with ignorance, and the report of a ſhameleſſe lier. Whoſe caſe, bicauſe it is not ſo conuenient to be handled in this place as els where, we will remit to the reigne of * Edward the third, in whoſe time John Balioll was king of Scots, and cleere him (as well as we can) from a Scotiſh ſlander. Another example alſo we haue, and that moſt notorious, of Gabriel Prateolus the Jeſuit, who hauing neuer beene in England, nor yet vnderſtanding the Engliſh tong, bluſheth not to ſay that the tranſlation of the Engliſh bible hath in it a thouſand faults. O ſingular and inſufferable impudencie, when men paſſe not what they vomit and caſt vp out of a full gorge ſurfetting with malice and rancour! But what ſhall we ſay,

In deed (as Roger Houeden and other doo witnes) the foreſaid earle Reimond, and alſo Aimer earle of Angoleſme, Geffrey de Racon, and Geffrey de Luſignan, with the moſt part of all the Nobles of Poictou, made warre againſt earle Richard, and he held tacke againſt them all, and in the end ouercame them. Amongſt other of earle Reimonds part whom he tooke, was one Peter Seille, by whoſe counſell earle Reimond had taken diuerſe merchants of Poictou that were ſubiects to earle Richard, & doone manie other diſpleaſures to him and to his countrie, wherefore earle Richard kept this Peter in verie cloſe priſon, and would not put him to his ranſome: inſomuch that earle Reimond tooke two of the king of Englands knights, ſir Robert Poer, and ſir Richard Fraſer, as they were returning from Compoſtella, where they had beene to viſit the bodie of S. James, but they were quicklie ſet at libertie by the French kings commandement, for the reuerence of S. James whoſe pilgrims they were.

After this, earle Richard entred with a great armie into the lands of earle Reimond, waſted the ſame, and tooke by ſiege a caſtell of his ſituate neere vnto Tholouze, called Moiſac: whereof the French king hearing, ſent out of hand to the king of England, requiring to know if the damages doone by his ſonne earle Richard vnto him & his people in Tholouze, were doone by his commandement, for the which he demanded reſtitution. Herevnto the king of England anſwered, that his ſonne earle Richard did nothing in that behalfe, either by his knowledge or commandement: but that as he had ſignified to him by the archbiſhop of Dublin, what ſoeuer he did therin, was doone by the counſell of the French king himſelfe.

Erle Richard inuadeth the earle Tholouze lands.

Howſoeuer this matter went, certeine it is, that king Philip taking weapon in hand, vpon a ſudden entred into Berrie, and tooke from king Henrie Chaſteau Raoull, Brezancois, Argenton, Mountrichard, Mountreſor, Vandoſme, Leproſe, Blanc en Berrie, Culan and Molignon. Wherfore king Henrie (who was at this time in England about to prepare an armie to go therewith into the holie land) when he heard thereof, with all ſpeed poſſible he ſent Baldwin archbiſhop of Canturburie, and Hugh biſhop of Durham ouer into France, to appeaſe the French kings diſpleaſure with courteous words and reaſonable perſuaſions if it might be: but when that could not be brought to paſſe, he ſailed ouer into Normandie himſelfe, with an armie of Engliſhmen and Welſhmen, landing with the ſame at Herflue the 10. daie of Julie, after he had beene ſore toſſed by a cruell tempeſt that roſe as he was on the ſea, to the great danger of his perſon, & all that were with him.

Now after his comming to land, he repaired vnto Alencon, increaſing his power by gathering vp ſouldiers and men of warre out of Normandie and other his countries on that ſide the ſea. In the meane time his ſonne Richard earle of Poictou entred into Berrie with a mightie armie, and the French king deliuering Chateau Raoull vnto the keeping of ſir William de Berres returned into France, ſo that earle Richard ſpoiled and waſted the lands of thoſe earls and barons which tooke the French part exceedinglie. The French king kept him as yet within France, and durſt not come forth now after the arriuall of king Henrie, but manie enterpriſes were atchiued by the capteines on both ſides. Philip biſhop of Beauuois inuading the frontiers of Normandie, burned Blangeuille, belonging to the earle of Augi, and the caſtell Albemarle (that belonged to William de Mandeuille, whereof he bare the title of earle) and waſted the countrie round about. The French king alſe came to the towne of Trow, and burned it, and tooke 40. men of armes there, but the caſtell he could not win. On the other part, Richard earle of Poictou tooke a ſtrong place called Les Roches, beyond Trow towards Vandoſme, with 25. men of armes, and 60. yeomen.

Chateau Roux it is called in the French annales: but ẏ chronicles of Aniou name it Chaſteau Raoul, and rightlie as I thinke.

Sergeants.

About this time king Henrie ſent ambaſſadours vnto the French king, as Walter the archbiſhop of Rouen, John biſhop of Eureux, and William Marſhall, to require reſtitution for the damages doone to him and his people. And furthermore, that if the French king refuſed to make reſtitution, then had they in commandement to declare defiance againſt him. Wherevnto the French king anſwered, that he would not giue ouer to make warre till he had Berrie, and the countrie of Veuxin or Veulgeſine wholie in his poſſeſſion. Wherefore king Henrie with a mightie armie (on the tueſdaie after the feaſt of the decollation of S. John) entred into the realme of France, and burned manie townes and villages, approching the ſame day neere to the towne of Maunt, where the French king was thought to be. Now as it chanced, William de Berres and Drogo de Merlo encountred with Richard earle of Poictou and William de Mandeuille earle of Albemarle, ſo that William de Berres was taken by earle Richard, but by negligence of them that ſhould haue taken heed to him, he eſcaped awaie vpon his pages horſſe. The morrow after alſo, earle Richard departed from his father towards Berrie, and vpon the thurſdaie the Welſhmen burned manie villages, with the caſtell of Danuille that belonged to Simon Daneth, and tooke manie rich preies and booties. Alſo William Mandeuille earle of Albemarle burned a place called ſaint Clare, that was belonging vnto the demaine of the French king.

The welſhmen.

But ſée, when the Engliſh were fullie bent to proſecute the warres (with all extremitie) now in hand, there came meſſengers vnto king Henrie from the French king, requiring him that he would grant a peace to be had betwixt them, with promiſe that if he would condeſcend therevnto, that he ſhould receiue by way of reſtitution all that the French king had now taken from him in Berrie. Herevpon they came to a communication betwixt Trie & Giſors, and when they could not agrée, the French king cauſed a great elme ſtanding betwixt thoſe two places to be cut downe, at which the kings of England and France were accuſtomed to méet when they treated of matters in controuerſie betwixt them, ſwearing that from thenceforth there ſhould neuer be anie more méetings holden at that place.

The two kings come to a treatie.

An elme cut downe.

Afterward, when the earle of Flanders and the earle of Blois with diuerſe other earles and barons of the Realme of France, laid their armor aſide, proteſting openlie that they would not put on the ſame againe to make warre againſt any chriſtian, till they ſhould returne from their iournie which they had vowed into the holie land, the French king deſtitute of men to ſerue him, made ſute once againe to king Henrie, that they might méet and talke of peace, which was hardlie granted, and ſo they met on the morrow after ſaint Faithes daie, or the ſeauenth of October, at Chatellon, where they entreated of a forme of peace, ſo that the French king ſhould haue reſtored all that he had taken within the countries belonging to king Henrie, and likewiſe Richard earle of Poictou ſhould deliuer vp vnto the earle of ſaint Giles (otherwiſe called earle of Tholouſe) all that he had taken from him ſince the breach of the laſt truce. But when king Henrie would not deliuer the caſtell of Paſcie in pledge to the French king, they departed in ſunder (as before) without any thing concluded. The king of France after this tooke the caſtell of Paluell.

A commendable proteſtation and worthie to be noted.

Caſtellium.

Vpon the eightéenth day of Auguſt the two kings came againe togither about a new treatie of peace betwixt Bonſemblance and Sukennie, where the French king offered king Henrie, to reſtore to him all that he had taken by his laſt warres, if his ſiſter Alice might be ioined in marriage with Richard erle of Poictou, now eldeſt ſonne aliue to king Henrie, and that all king Henries ſubiects might doo homage and ſweare fealtie to the ſame Richard. But king Henrie after the old prouerbe, Ictus piſcator ſapit, hauing bought his experience with the féeling of ſmart, & bearing in memorie the iniuries done to him by his ſonne Henrie, after ſuch his aduancement to kinglie degrée, would not grant the French kings requeſt herein. Wherevpon a further miſchéefe happened, for his ſonne earle Richard (taking diſpleaſure that his father ſhould denie him that honour, which made altogither for his more aſſurance to ſucceed him as king) fell from his ſaid father manifeſtlie, and became the French kings man, dooing homage to him alſo without conſent of king Henrie, for all thoſe lands that belonged to his ſaid father on that further ſide the ſea. The French king for his homage and fealtie gaue him Chateau Raoull and Yſoldun, with all the honour thereto belonging.

An other treatie betwixt the two kings

Erle Richard reuolteth from his father to ſerue the French king.

¶ Some write, that the chéefeſt cauſe which mooued king Henrie to refuſe to ioine his ſonne earle Richard and the ladie Alice, daughter vnto the French king in marriage togither, was, for that he was linked in the comberſome chaine of hot burning loue with the ſame ladie, and therefore he ſought all the ſhifts of excuſes & delaies that might be imagined; ſo that it appeared he had no mind to part with hir. The truth was (as writers affirme) he had alreadie perſuaded hir to ſatiſfie his luſt, inſomuch that he liked hir ſo well, that he ment to be diuorſed from his wife quéene Elianor, and to marrie this yoong ladie, which if he might bring to paſſe, and haue children by hir, he purpoſed to diſherit thoſe which he had by Elianor, and to make the other which he ſhould haue by Adela his legitimat and lawfull heires. Yet before they departed from this communication, a truce was taken to endure till the feaſt of S. Hilarie. And Henrie biſhop of Alba a cardinall that was ſent from the pope to end this controuerſie betwixt theſe two mightie princes, accurſed Richard earle of Poictou, for that by his meanes the troubles roſe and were continued betwixt them.

The towne of Beuerley, with the church of ſaint Iohn the archbiſhop, was in maner wholie conſumed with fire, on the 20. of September. Alſo the ſame yeare died William of Sempringham, the author and firſt founder of the religious order of Sempringham. Moreouer Gilbert de Ogerſtan a knight templer put in truſt by king Henrie, with others, to gather the tenths towards the reléefe of the holie land, was prooued to vſe falſhood in the receipt, and ſo was deliuered vnto the maiſter of the temple at London to be puniſhed according to the ſtatutes of his order. Alſo this yere in the vigill of S. Laurence, there was ſéene at Dunſtable by diuerſe perſons a figure of the croſſe verie long and large in the aire, with the ſhape of a crucifix thereon, and ſtreames of blood to their ſight ſéemed to run out of the wounds of the féet, hands and ſides. ¶ Some will déeme this a méere fable, and ſaie it ſauoureth of groſſe ſuperſtition and idolatrie, wherevpon they will conclude that no ſuch fragments powdered with papiſtrie ſhould be inſerted into a chronicle. But (to auoid all ſuſpicion of iuſtifieng the fanſies of men) note you this, that in the eccleſiaſticall hiſtorie, no ſmall number of things no leſſe ſtrange and true than this ſéemeth vaine and falſe, are recorded; yea euen touching the verie croſſe. But conſidering that this our age is verie nice and deintie in making choiſe of matter pleaſing their owne humor we will not wade too farre in this kind of argument, which we know may as ſoone offend as it is taken, as a thorne may pricke, or a netle ſting when it is touched. Neuertheleſſe, we would not wiſh that the forme of a thing ſhould be quite condemned for ſome ſcandalous peoples pleaſures, whome nothing will pleaſe, vnleſſe it come out of their owne drienat or caſket of conceits.

King Henrie held his Chriſtmas at Saumur in Aniou, but manie of his earles and barons were gon from him, and tooke part with the French king, and with his ſonne Richard earle of Poictou. Now when the day was come, in which the truce expired, the Britains (which had a charter of couenants of the French king and earle Richard, that if they concluded any peace with king Henrie, the Britains ſhould be partakers in the ſame) entred into the confines of thoſe countries, which ſtill continued their due obedience towards king Henrie, ſpoiling and waſting the ſame on each ſide with barbarous crueltie. At which time alſo a legat came from the pope named Iohn de Anagnia, who aſſaied both by courteous meanes and alſo by threats and menacings to reduce the parties vnto peace and concord: inſomuch that by his procurement they met this yeare after Eaſter néere vnto Fiert Bernard, twiſe within a few daies togither, to trie if by talke they might ſort to ſome reaſonable conditions of agréement.

Math. Paris.

The laſt time of thoſe their méetings was in the Whitſunwéeke, at what time the French king required not onelie to haue his ſiſter Alice deliuered vnto earle Richard for wife, according to the former couenants, but alſo ſome aſſurance giuen vnto the ſame earle Richard, that he ſhould inherit his fathers lands after his deceaſſe. Alſo he required that earle Iohn might take vpon him the croſſe to paſſe ouer into the holie land alſo, for otherwiſe earle Richard would not go. Howbeit king Henrie would in no wiſe conſent to any of theſe demands: but yet as ſome write, he offered thus much vnto king Philip, that if he could be ſo content, his ſonne Iohn ſhould marrie his ſiſter Alice, and inioy with hir all ſuch things as he demanded in preferment of his ſonne Richard, and that in more large maner than he had requeſted the ſame. But king Philip would none of that.

R. Houed.

Thus how ſoeuer it was, whileſt the one demanded that which the other thought no reaſon to grant, they departed without concluding any agréement, ſo that king Philip hauing got by this meanes a good occaſion to further his enterpriſes, with all his whole puiſſance entred into Maine, where he deſtroied a great part of that countrie, and approched to the citie of Mauns, where king Henrie as then laie, in purpoſe to beſiege it. But king Henrie being warned of his comming ſet the ſuburbs on fire, bicauſe his enimies ſhould haue no ſuccour in them. Howbeit the flame of the fire was by force of the wind driuen ſo directlie into the citie, that what with heat and aſſault of the enimie, the king being without any ſtore of ſouldiers to defend it longer, was conſtreined to forſake it. Herewith he was ſo moued, that in departing from the citie, he ſaid theſe words of his ſonne Richard to himſelfe: Sith thou haſt taken from me this daie the thing that I moſt loued in this world, I will requite thée, for after this daie, I ſhall depriue thée of that thing which in me ſhould moſt pleaſe thée, euen mine owne hart.

King Philip entereth the countrie of Maine.

The words of king Henrie in his diſpleaſure towards earle Richard.

Being thus driuen to leaue the defaced citie of Mauns, he repaired vnto Chinon, the citizens whereof being left deſtitute of aid, yéelded themſelues to the French king, who taking a great pride in his doings for that victorie, paſſed ouer Loire, and wan the citie of Towrs, wherein he placed a gariſon, and ſo hauing ſped his buſineſſe with good ſucceſſe, brought home his armie laden with preies & booties. King Henrie being thus put to the worſſe, and not perceiuing anie readie meane how to recouer his loſſes, began to deſpaire in himſelfe, and therefore of neceſſitie thought it beſt to ſéeke for peace, but his ſuit was in vaine: for the enimie hauing now the aduantage, would not grant to agrée vpon any reaſonable conditions.

The earle of Flanders ſéeketh to agrée the parties. Math. Paris.

At the laſt Philip the earle of Flanders and William archbiſhop of Reimes, with Hugh duke of Burgoine, came to king Henrie to moue waies of agréement, and to conclude the ſame betwixt him on the one partie, and the French king and earle Richard on the other partie. Earle Richard had the Britaines and them of Poictou confederate with him, vnder ſuch conditions, as he might not agrée with his father, vnleſſe they might be compriſed in the agréement. At length they agréed vpon conditions, not altogither aduantageable to the king of England, yet in the end, Chateau Raoul was reſtored to king Henrie with all that had béene taken from him ſince the time that the French king & he tooke vpon them the croſſe: on the other part king Henrie did homage to the French king, which in the beginning of this warre he had ſurrendred and renounced. He was bound alſo to paie to the French king 20. thouſand markes for the aid which earle Richard had receiued of him: moreouer to reſigne and acquite vnto the French king, all that which either he or his predeceſſours held or poſſeſſed within Aluergne. Other articles there were which king Henrie agréed vnto ſore againſt his will, as the deliuerie of the ladie Alice or Adela, and ſuch other, which (as not much materiall) we paſſe ouer.

A peace concluded.

Thirtie thouſand to the K. and twentie to the barons of France, ſaith Ger. Dor.

This peace was concluded not farre from Towrs, in a place appointed conuenient for both the kings to méet in, about the feaſt of the apoſtles Peter and Paule. And (as writers record) there chanced great thunder and lightening at the verie time when the two kings came to enteruiew and talke togither, ſo that the thunderbolt did light betwixt them two: & yet (notwithſtanding ſuch thunder & lightening) the aire was cleare and nothing troubled. The two kings parted a ſunder through feare thereof for that day, and on the next day the like chance happened, greatlie to the terrour of them both. Which moued king Henrie the ſooner to condeſcend to the agréement.

Rog. Houed. At Giſors ſaith Ger. Dor.

Strange thunder & lightning.

Moreouer this is not to be forgotten, that when all matters were quieted and accorded amongſt them, king Henrie required to haue all their names deliuered vnto him in writing, which had promiſed to take part (and were ioined as confederates) with the French king and earle Richard. This was granted, and when the roll was preſented vnto him, he found his ſonne Iohn the firſt perſon that was named in that regiſter, wherewith he was ſo troubled and diſquieted in his mind, that comming to Chinon he felt ſuch gréefe hereof, that he curſſed euen the verie daie in which he was borne, and as was ſaid, gaue to his ſonnes Gods curſſe and his, the which he would neuer releaſe, although he was admoniſhed to doo it both of ſundrie biſhops and other religious and godlie men. Thus ſaith Houeden.

Howbeit, it is not like that earle Richard at this time had procured his brother Iohn to be confederate with him in his rebellious dealings, but rather bicauſe earle Richard had ſome ſuſpicion, leaſt his father would make Iohn his heire and ſucceſſour in the kingdome, it might be a policie wrought by the French king and earle Richard, to alienate his fathers mind from the ſaid Iohn.

¶ Theſe euils were eſtéemed to fall vnto king Henrie by the iuſt iudgement of God, for that being admoniſhed diuerſe waies, as well by diuine reuelation, as by the wholeſome aduiſe of graue men, as Hugh biſhop of Lincolne and others, he would not reforme his licentious appetite of heaping vp ſinne vpon ſinne, but ſtill wallowed therein to his owne deſtruction. Wherevpon being brought to ſuch an extremitie as ye haue heard, he was taken with a gréeuous ſickneſſe, which bringing him to vtter deſperation of recouering of health, he finallie departed this life, though more through verie anguiſh and gréefe of his late loſſe and troubles ſuſteined, than by the force of his bodilie diſeaſe (as writers haue affirmed.) But howſoeuer it was, he ended his life the ſixt of Iulie in the 61. yeare of his age, and after he had reigned 34. yeares, nine moneths, and two daies, which was in the yeare after the birth of our ſauiour 1189. and of the creation of the world 5155. His bodie was buried at Founteuerard, which is an abbeie ſituate not farre from the towne of the eagle within the dutchie of Alanſon.

King Henrie departeth this life.

Immediatlie vpon his death, thoſe that were about him, applied their market ſo buſilie in catching and filching awaie things that laie readie for them, that the kings corps laie naked a long time, till a child couered uered the nether parts of his body with a ſhort cloke, and then it ſeemed that his ſurname was fulfilled that he had from his childhood, which was Shortmantell, being ſo called, bicauſe he was the firſt that brought ſhort clokes out of Aniou into England. As his ſonne Richard met the corps going towards the buriall, ſuddenlie there iſſued bloud out of the dead bodies noſthrilles, which was taken for a ſignification that it abhorred the preſence of ſo wicked a ſon, which in his life time had ſo perſecuted the father. His death was ſignified by a maruellous ſtrange wonder, for a few daies before he died, all the fiſhes in a certeine meere or poole in Normandie, leapt forth on land in the night ſeaſon, and fought togither with ſuch a noiſe, that a great multitude of men came running thither to behold the wonder, and could not find on fiſh aliue in the meere.

The iſſue of Henrie the ſecond. His ſonnes.

His daughters.

His baſe ſons.

The conſtitution of his bodie.

His ſtature.

His qualities and conditions of mind.

He had iſſue by his wife queene Elianor (as may appeare by that which alreadie is rehearſed) foure ſonnes, Henrie, Richard, Geffrey, and Iohn, beſides two other that died yoong, as ſome authors haue recorded: alſo three daughters, Maud, married vnto Henrie the duke of Saxonie; Elianor the wife of Alfonſe the eight of that name king of Caſtile, and Ioane giuen in marriage vnto William king of Sicill. He had alſo two baſtard ſonnes by a concubine, the one named William, & the other Geffrey. He was of bodie fleſhie and ſtrong, and could abide verie patientlie the diſpleſures both of cold and heat, he had a large head, a broad breaſt, a broken voice, and was furthermore verie ſpare of diet, cheefelie bicauſe he would not be too fat; and therefore when he was at quiet without any trouble of warres, he would exerciſe himſelfe in hunting or trauelling abroad. He was of a good ſtature and verie well formed, of a comelie countenance, partlie red heared, with graie eies, of wit quicke, and of a perfect good memorie, ſo that he would long remember thoſe things which he had either read, heard, or ſeene. He was ſtout of ſtomach, and more conſtant in time of aduerſitie than in time of proſperitie, except at the time of his death, when being deſtitute in maner of all his freends, he ſhewed himſelfe almoſt in deſpaire. He was liberall towards all men, oftentimes giuing rewards to his ſouldiers ouer and beſides their wages.

Radulphus de Diceto.

Moreouer, of nature he was pitifull towards the poore, as it well appeared by diuerſe his charitable deeds; as for example. When in the yeare 1176. there was a great dearth & ſcarſitie of bread in the parts of Aniou & Maine, he fed euerie daie with ſufficient ſuſtenance ten thouſand perſons, from the begining of Aprill, till the time that new corne was inned: and what prouiſion ſoeuer was laid vp in garners, cellers and ſtorehouſes, for the kings neceſſarie vſes, he cauſed the ſame to be imploied towards the releefe of religious houſes, and poore people. He tooke of his ſubiects but ſildome times any great tributes. He was verie expert in feats of warre, and right fortunate therein. He praiſed his capteins and men of warre when they were dead, and lamented their loſſe more than he ſhewed to loue them when they were aliue. And this did he of policie, that they might vnderſtand that they ſhould be honoured after death, and therefore feare it the leſſe. He was ſomwhat learned, and alſo knowne to be wiſe.

Radulphus de Diceto,

His care to haue iuſtice dulie miniſtred in his realme was exceeding great, inſomuch that finding how the ſhirifes were rather inclined to ſeeke their owne gaine, than to deale vprightlie with his ſubiects, he appointed other officers to haue a regard to their doings, as if they had beene controllers, that they knowing how there were ſuch appointed to haue a ſound ouerſight in their dealings, might be the more circumſpect in their duties. He ordeined alſo puniſhments for hunters in forreſts and grounds of warren, either by fining them, or by impriſonment.

Moreouer, he ordeined that murtherers ſhould ſuffer death by hanging: and ſo for other tranſgreſſours he appointed other kinds of puniſhments, as ſome to be condemned to exile, and other to loſſe of lims, &c: according to the qualitie of the offenſe committed. And to haue the lawes dulie executed, and iuſtice vprightlie miniſtred on all hands, he was ſo carefull that he tried all orders of men, in placing them in roomes of iuſtice. And laſtlie, truſting to find among the cleargie ſuch as would not be corrupted with bribes, nor for reſpect of feare or freendſhip decline from right iudgement, he choſe forth the biſhops of Wincheſter, Elie, and Norwich to be principall iuſtices of the relme, ſo as they might end and determine all matters, except in certeine caſes reſerued to the hearing of the prince himſelfe.

Biſhops choſen principall iuſtices.

The vices of K. Henrie.

His vices were theſe, as they are remembred. In time of aduerſe fortune no man could ſhew himſelfe more courteous, gentle, meeke, and promiſing more largelie than he would. But when fortune once began to ſmile, no man was more ſharpe, hard to deale with, nor more redie to breake his promiſe and faith. He was alſo partlie noted of couetouſneſſe: for although he was liberall towards ſouldiers and ſtrangers, yet was he ſtreict inough towards his owne people, and namelie towards his ſonnes, which cauſed them to eſtrange themſelues and their good wils from him. He was not ſo zealous toward the execution of right and equitie as to the furtherance of his owne priuat commoditie.

His incontinencie.

Roſamund his concubine.

He was out of meaſure giuen to fleſhlie luſt, and ſatiſfieng of his inordinate concupiſcence. For not contented with the vſe of his wife, he kept manie concubines, but namelie he delited moſt in the companie of a pleaſant damſell, whom he called the Roſe of the world (the common people named hir Roſamund) for hir paſſing beautie, properneſſe of perſon, and pleaſant wit, with other amiable qualities, being verelie a rare and peereleſſe peece in thoſe daies. He made for hir an houſe at Woodſtocke in Oxfordſhire, like a labyrinth, with ſuch turnings and windings in & out as a knot in a garden called a maze, that no creature might find hir nor come to hir, except he were inſtructed by the king, or ſuch as were ſecret with him in that matter. But the common rereport of the people is, that the queene in the end found hir out by a ſilken thread, which the king had drawne after him out of hir chamber with his foot, and dealt with hir in ſuch ſharpe and cruell wiſe, that ſhe liued not long after. She was buried in the nunrie of Godſtow beſide Oxford, with theſe verſes vpon hir toome:

Hîc iacet in tumulo, Roſa mundi non Roſa munda,
Non redolet ſed olet, quæ redolere ſolet.

The meaning whereof may be found in Graftons large chronicle, page 77. in an Engliſh ſeptenarie.

Ran. Higd.

Long time after the death of this damſell, in the ſaid abbeie was ſhewed a cofer, that ſometimes was hirs, of the length of two foot, in the which appeared giants fighting, ſtartling of beaſts, ſwimming of fiſhes, and flieng of foules, ſo liuelie, that a man might wonder at the fine deuiſe thereof.

Moreouer, king Henrie was noted not to be ſo fauourable to the liberties & freedoms of the church as he might haue beene. For beſides the perſecuting of the foreſaid Thomas archbiſhop of Canturburie, he would not ſuffer the legats ſent from the pope, to enter within the bounds of his dominion, till they had ſworne that they ſhould doo nothing preiudiciall to the cuſtoms of his kingdome, neither by preſcribing orders, nor any other maner of act or meanes. He was thought to be negligent in aiding the chriſtian common-wealth in the holie land. For though he had appointed twice or thrice to go thither in perſon, yet being letted by light occaſions, he ſtaied at home, and ſent ſmall reléefe thither, though he was earneſtlie called vpon for the ſame. His eſtimation was ſuch amongſt forren princes, that Philip king of France being newlie entred into the gouernement of that realme after his fathers deceaſſe, committed himſelfe and his kingdome to the diſpoſition and order of king Henrie, as if he had béene regent of his realme, and gouernour of his perſon.

His negligẽce in aiding the Christians againſt the Saracens.

There liued in the daies of this king Henrie the ſecond, diuerſe honourable perſonages and capteins of great fame, for their approued valiancie and experience in warlike enterpriſes, as Robert earle of Leiceſter, Hugh Bigot earle of Northfolke, Reignold earle of Cornewall, Robert Ferreis earle of Darbie, Richard Lacie, Roger Mowbray, Raſe de Fulgiers, Humfrey Bohun coneſtable of England, Ranulfe Glandeuille, William Veſey, & Bernard de Ballioll. Alſo there flouriſhed in his time here in this land, men of ſingular learning in arts and ſciences, as Nicholas Breakeſpeare, Serlo ſurnamed Grammaticus, William Rheualenſis, Adam de Eueſham, Thomas of Munmouth, Adelbertus Leuita, Geruaſius Ciceſtrenſis, Odo Cantianus, Ealred Rhieuellenſis, Johannes Sariſburienſis, Clemens Lanthonienſis, Walter Daniell, Robert Knought aliàs Camtus, Robert Folioth, William Ramſey, Senatus Brauonus, Robert the Scribe, Odo Miremuth, Hugh of Reading, Richard of Douer, William of Peterburough, Cicercienſis, Bartholomew Iſcanus, and Gilbert de Sempringham, with others.

¶ Here may be thought that the reigne of the Normans and French men ouer the realme of England tooke end, a hundred twentie two yeares after the comming in of the Conquerour; for thoſe that reigned after this Henrie the ſecond, we may rightlie eſtéeme to be Engliſhmen, bicauſe they were borne in England, and vſed the Engliſh toong, cuſtomes, and maners, according to the nature and qualitie of the countrie.

Thus farre the ſucceſſion and regiment of the Frenchmen

Richard the firſt, ſecond ſonne to Henrie the ſecond.

Anno Reg. 1.

1189

Wil. Paruus.

RIchard the firſt of that name, and ſecond ſonne of Henrie the ſecond, began his reigne ouer England the ſixt day of Julie, in the yere of our Lord 1189. in the ſeauen and thirtéeth yeare of the emperour Frederike the firſt, in the eleuenth yere of the reigne of Philip the ſecond king of France, and king William ſurnamed the Lion as yet liuing in the gouernement of Scotland.

Matt. Paris.

This Richard, immediatlie after the ſolemnities of his fathers funerals were ended, made haſt to Rouen, where he was ioifullie receiued, and proclamed duke of Normandie, receiuing the inueſture according to the cuſtome, on the twentith day of Julie. Then ſtudieng to ſet all things in good order on that ſide the ſea, he made ſearch where his fathers treaſure was preſerued, and therevpon attached Stephan de Turnham, who was ſeneſchall or gouernour (as we may call him) of Aniou, and committing him to priſon, compelled him to make deliuerie of all ſuch ſummes of monie as he had hid and laid vp in certeine caſtels by the commandement of the late king his father.

Stephan de Turnham committed to priſon.

Matth. Paris. Polydor.

Whileſt he was thus occupied, his brother John came to him, to whom he ioifullie gaue the welcome, and beſides all other things which his father had bequeathed vnto him by his teſtament in England, amounting to the value of foure thouſand pounds of yearelie rent, with the earledome of Mortaigne, he procured a marriage for him (being now a widower) for his further aduancement with the ladie Iſabell, daughter to Robert earle of Gloceſter, which earle had appointed the ſaid John to be his heire as before is mentioned, although Baldwine the archbiſhop of Canturburie forbad the mariage, bicauſe they were coſens in the third degrée of conſanguinitie. To Robert earle of Leiceſter alſo he reſtored all his lands which had béene taken from him, and ſuch perſons as his father had diſherited, he reſtored likewiſe to their former rights and poſſeſſions, howbeit thoſe had forſaken his father, and taken part with him againſt his ſaid father, he ſéemed now ſo much to miſlike, that he remoued them vtterlie from his preſence, and contrariwiſe preferred ſuch as had continued faithfull vnto his father in time of the troubles.

She is named by diuerſe authors Hauiſia. Matth. Paris. R. Houed.

Matt. Paris.

The kings mother ſet at libertie.

At length, king Richard remembring himſelfe of his mother quéene Elianor, who had béene ſeparated from the bed of hir huſband for the ſpace of ſixtéene yeares, and was as yet deteined in priſon in England, wrote his letters vnto the rulers of the realme, commanding them to ſet hir againe at libertie, and withall appointed hir by his letters patents, to take vpon hir the whole gouernment of the kingdome in his abſence. The quéene being thus deliuered, and hauing now the chéefe authoritie & rule in hir hands, rode in progreſſe about the realme, to ſée the eſtate thereof; and as ſhe paſſed from place to place, ſhe ſhewed gladſome countenance to the people whereſoeuer ſhe came, dooing alſo what ſhe could to pleaſure them, that ſhe might thereby win their good willes to hir, and to hir ſonne: but ſpeciallie remembring by hir late experience and taſt thereof, what an irkſome & moſt gréeuous thing impriſonment was, ſhe cauſed the gailes to be opened, and forthwith ſet no ſmall number of priſoners at libertie by the way as ſhe paſſed through the countries, according to the verſe of Virgil,

> Non ignara mali miſeris ſuccurrere diſco.

In the meane time, king Richard concluding a league with Philip king of France, receiued all thoſe places againe which were taken from his father by the ſame Philip, togither with his wife Adela, whom vpon ſuſpicion that ſhe had béene diſhoneſted in hir perſon before, without anie ſufficient proofe thereof had, he forſooke, & ſent hir home with hir dowrie, and otherwiſe with great and princelie gifts, moſt bountifullie inriched, hauing alreadie concluded a marriage with the ladie Berengaria, daughter to Garſias king of Nauarre, who was ſent into Sicill vnto hir ſiſter Joane, that he might marrie hir there, as he paſſed that waie towards the holie land.

The 2. kings of England & France determine to go into the holie land.

Whileſt theſe things paſſed thus in theſe parties, the chriſtians in the holie land dailie ſent hither for aid, wherevpon the two kings of France and England tooke counſell togither, and determined with all conuenient ſpéed to ioine their powers, & with ſhips prepared for that purpoſe to ſaile into Syria. Hauing thus concluded, they went about to prepare themſelues of neceſſarie prouiſion for ſo long a iournie. Now when king Richard had ſet in order his affaires in Normandie and France, he came ouer into England, landing at Porteſmouth the 13. of Auguſt. With him alſo came his brother John, vnto whom he aſſigned the caſtels of Marlebridge, Luteгareſhall, Peake, Bolleſour, the honor of Wallingford, Tikehill and Eie, with the earledoms of Mortaigne, Dorſet, Sumerſet, Notingham, Derbie, Deuonſhire, and Cornewall, with the earledome of Lancaſter, intituling him earle of the ſame, whereby he was ſo exalted in ſtate and degrée, that he ſéemed in manner of a tetrarch, hauing as it were a fourth part of the realme in gouernance: but yet the king held ſome of the caſtels (in thoſe counties and honors thus giuen to his brother) in his owne hands. Moreouer, vnto William Marſhall he gaue in marriage the daughter of Richard earle of Chepſtow, togither with the earledome which hir father poſſeſſed; and to Gilbert Fitz Roger the ſonne of Rainfrey he gaue the daughter of William de Lancaſter. After he was landed (as before ye haue heard) he haſted to Wincheſter, where his mother quéene Elianor with the moſt part of the Engliſh nobilitie had laine a good ſpace to attend his comming, and there on the euen of the aſſumption of our ladie, the king was by them receiued with great ioy and triumph.

At Southhampton the 21 of Auguſt ſaith Ger. Dor.

Rog. Houed. Matth. Paris.

¶ Here is to be noted, that whileſt the quéene and lords laie in Wincheſter waiting for the kings arriuall, Geffrey Riddle the biſhop of Elie departed this life. He is named by Geruaſius Dorobernenſis the proud biſhop of Elie: but he might rather haue named him the rich biſhop, for he left in his cofers no ſmall quantitie of treaſure, of the which thrée thouſand and two hundred marks came to the kings part towards the charges of his coronation. No maruell though Geruaſius ſpake ſomewhat in his diſpraiſe, for (as he himſelfe confeſſeth) he was no fréend but an enimie to moonks.

But to let this paſſe, ſoone after the kings comming into England, he was informed that the Welſhmen had broken into the Engliſh marſhes, and deſtroied certeine townes; to repreſſe whoſe preſumptuous attempts he made towards them, but was yet ſtaied for that time, & reuoked by his mother. At Saliſburie he found his fathers treaſure, highlie reioiſing, for that the ſumme was far greater than he thought it would haue prooued, for beſides the pretious ſtones, apparell, and iewels, it was reported he had there the ſum of nine hundred thouſand pounds in readie coine. With this good hap king Richard not a little aduanced, came to London on the firſt of September, where he had appointed prouiſion to be made for his coronation, and ſo calling a councell of the Nobles of the realme, he receiued the crowne with all due and accuſtomed ſolemnitie, at the hands of Baldwin the archbiſhop of Canturburie, the third daie of September.

At his coronation, firſt the archbiſhops of Canturburie, Roan, Trier, and Dublin, which were preſent, with all the other biſhops, abbats and cleargie, apparelled in rich copes, and hauing the croſſe, holie water and cenſures carried afore them, came to fetch him vnto the doore of his priuie chamber, and there receiuing him, they led him vnto the church at Weſtminſter, till he came before the high altar with a ſolemne proceſſion. In the middle of the biſhops and cleargie went foure barons, bearing candleſticks with tapers, after whom came Geffrey de Lucie bearing the cap of maintenance, and Iohn Marſhall next to him, bearing a great and maſſiue paire of ſpurs of gold: then followed William Marſhall earle of Striguill alias Pembroke, who bare the roiall ſcepter, in the top wherof was ſet a croſſe of gold: and William de Patrike earle of Saliſburie going next him, bare the warder or rod, hauing on the top thereof a doue. Then came thrée other earles, Dauid brother to the king of Scots, the earle of Huntington, Iohn the kings brother earle of Mortaigne, and Robert earle of Leiceſter, ech of them bearing a ſword vpright in his hand with the ſcabberds richlie trimmed and adorned with gold.

The earle of Mortaigne went in the midſt betwixt the other two. After them followed ſix earles and barons, bearing a checker table, vpon the which was ſet the kings ſcochens of armes, and then followed William Mandeuill earle of Albemarle, bearing a crowne of gold a great heigth before the king, who followed the ſame, hauing Hugh biſhop of Durham on the right hand, and Reignold biſhop of Bath on the left, ouer whom a canapie was borne: and in this order he came into the church at Weſtminſter, where before the high altar in the preſence of the cleargie & the people, laieng his hand vpon the holie euangeliſts and the relikes of certeine ſaincts, he tooke a ſolemne oth, that he ſhould obſerue peace, honour, and reuerence to almightie God, to his church, and to the miniſters of the ſame all the daies of his life. Alſo that he ſhould exerciſe vpright iuſtice to the people committed to his charge, and that he ſhould abrogate and diſanull all euill lawes and wrongfull cuſtomes, if anie were to be found within the precinct of his realme, and mainteine thoſe that were good and laudable.

This doone, he put off all his garments from the middle vpwards, his ſhirt excepted, which was open on the ſhoulders, that he might be annointed. The archbiſhop of Canturburie annointed him then in thrée places, to wit, on the head, on the ſhoulders, and on the right arme, with praiers in ſuch caſe accuſtomed. After this, he couered his head with a linnen cloth hallowed, and ſet his cap aloft thereon; and then when he had put on his roiall garments and vppermoſt robe, the archbiſhop tooke vnto him the ſword wherewith he ſhould beat downe the enimies of the church; which doone, two earles put his ſhooes vpon his féet, and hauing his mantell put on him, the archbiſhop forbad him on the behalfe of almightie God, not to preſume to take vpon him this dignitie, except he faithfullie meant to performe thoſe things which he had there ſworne to performe. Wherevnto the king made anſwer, that by Gods grace he would performe them. Then the king tooke the crowne beſide the altar, and deliuered it to the archbiſhop, which he ſet vpon the kings head, deliuering to him the ſcepter to hold in his right hand, and the rod roiall in his left hand, & thus being crowned he was brought backe by the biſhops and barons, with the croſſe and candleſticks, and thrée ſwords paſſing forth before him vnto his ſeat. When the biſhop that ſang the maſſe came to the offertorie, the two biſhops that brought him to the church, led him to the altar, and brought him backe againe.

Finallie when maſſe was doone, and all things ended in order as was requiſit, he was brought with ſolemne proceſſion into his chamber, where he put off his heauie rich apparell, and put on a crowne and other garments more light and eaſie, and ſo went to dinner, whereat wanted no ſtore of meats & drinks, which were ſerued out in moſt princelie and bountifull wiſe.

Wil.Paruus.

The Iewes meant to preſent him with a rich gift.

Vpon this daie of king Richards coronation, the Iewes that dwelt in London and in other parts of the realme, being there aſſembled, had but ſorie hap, as it chanced. For they meaning to honour the ſame coronation with their preſence, and to preſent to the king ſome honorable gift, wherby they might declare themſelues glad for his aduancement, and procure his fréendſhip towards them, for the confirming of their priueleges & liberties, according to the grants and charters made to them by the former kings: he of a zealous mind to Chriſtes religion, abhorring their nation (and doubting ſome ſorcerie by them to be practiſed) commanded that they ſhould not come within the church when he ſhould receiue the crowne, nor within the palace whileſt he was at dinner.

Matt.Paris.

A Iew ſtriken.

The people fall vpon the Iewes and beat them.

Their houſes are ſet on fire.

But at dinner time, among other that preſſed in at the palace gate, diuerſe of the Iewes were about to thruſt in, till one of them was ſtriken by a chriſtian, who alledging the kings commandement, kept them backe from comming within the palace. Which ſome of the vnrulie people perceiuing, and ſuppoſing it had béene doone by the kings commandement, tooke lightlie occaſion thereof, and falling vpon the Iewes with ſtaues, bats and ſtones, beat them and chaſed them home to their houſes and lodgings. Héerewith roſe a rumor through the citie, that the king had commanded the Iewes to be deſtroied, and therevpon came running togither, to aſſault them in their houſes, which when they could not eaſilie breake vp nor enter, by reaſon the ſame were ſtrongly builded, they ſet fire on them, ſo that diuers houſes were conſumed, not onelie of the Iewes, but alſo of their neighbours, ſo hideous was the rage of the fire. Here we ſee that

Regis ad exemplum totus componitur orbis.

The king being aduertiſed of this riotous attempt of the outragious people, ſent ſome of his councellours, as Ranulfe de Glanuille lord iuſtice, and other officers to appeaſe the tumult: but their authoritie was nothing regarded, nor their perſuaſions any whit reuerenced, but their thretnings rather brought themſelues in danger of life among the rude ſort of thoſe that were about to ſpoile, rob, and ſacke the houſes and ſhops of the Iewes: to the better accompliſhment of which their vnlawfull act, the light that the fire of thoſe houſes which burned, gaue after it was once night, did miniſter no ſmall helpe and occaſion of furtherance. The Iewes that were in thoſe houſes which were ſet on fire, were either ſmoldred and burned to death within, or elſe at their comming foorth moſt cruellie receiued vpon the points of ſpeares, billes, ſwords and gleaues of their aduerſaries that watched for them verie diligentlie.

Iewes burnt to death.

This outrage of the furious and diſordered people continued from the middeſt of the one day, till two of the clocke on the other; the commons all that while neuer ceaſſing their furie againſt that nation, but ſtill killing them as they met with any of them, in moſt horrible, raſh and vnreaſonable maner. At length, rather wearied with their cruell dooings, than ſatiſfied with ſpoile, or mooued with reſpect of reaſon or reuerence of their prince, they withdrew themſelues from their riotons enterpriſe, after they had executed manie vnlawfull and horrible enormities. This great riot well deſerued ſore and gréeuous puniſhment, but yet it paſſed ouer without correction, in reſpect of the great number of the tranſgreſſors, and for that the moſt part of men for the hatred generallie conceiued againſt the obſtinate frowardneſſe of the Iewes, liked the dooings hereof well inough, interpreting it to be a good token, that the ioifull daie of the kings aduancement to the crowne ſhould be dolefull vnto the Iewes, in bringing them to ſuch ſlaughter and deſtruction. Finallie, after that the tumult was ceaſſed, the king commanded that no man ſhould hurt or harme any of the Iewes, and ſo they were reſtored to peace, after they had ſuſteined infinit damage.

¶ The occaſion of this tragedie and bloudie tumult (redounding to the Iewes great vexation and pitifull diſtreſſe, but to the ſatiſfieng of the peoples furious and vnbridled proneſſe to crueltie) ſprang principallie from the king, who if he had not ſo lightlie eſtéemed of the Iewes when they repaired vnto him with their preſent, in ſigne of ſubmiſſion and hope of obteining their ſute then purpoſed to be exhibited; this hurlie burlie had not inſued. For it was a violent example & a mightie motiue to the people to maligne the Iewes; as alſo a hart-gréefe to them in reſpect of their reiection, when the prince gaue them ſo diſcourteous a repulſe. Here therefore is to be obſerued, that the people is the princes ape, as one verie well ſaith. For looke whereto he is inclined, note wherein he delighteth; the ſame is the practiſe of the people: in conſideration whereof the mightie ones of the world haue ſpeciall cauſe to haue an eie to their courſe of life, & to ſet caueats before their actions, that the people may in them ſée none but good ſignes of commendable & vertuous imitation. A councell at Pipewell.

Shortlie after, to wit, the 15. day of September, a councell was holden at Pipewell, where the biſhops and abbats being aſſembled, there were in preſence of the king and of the archbiſhop of Canturburie elected certeine biſhops and abbats to ſuch places as then were vacant: and amongſt other, William de Longchampe the kings chancellor was elected to the ſée of Elie, Geffrey the kings baſtard brother vnto the archbiſhoprike of Yorke, who was the 32. in number that had gouerned the ſame, Geffrey de Lucie to Wincheſter, one Hubert Walter to Saliſburie, and Richard archdeacon of Elie, and the kings treaſurer to the ſée of London. The abbeies that were prouided of abbats were theſe, Glaſtenburie, Shirborne, Perſore and Feuerſham. In like maner, Iohn the elect of Whitherne was conſecrated biſhop of that ſée, by the hands of the archbiſhop of Dublin. Alſo in this councell the king ordeined Hugh biſhop of Durham, and William Mandeuille earle of Albemarle, lord chéefe iuſtices of England, hauing depoſed Ranulfe de Glanuille from that roome.

Moreouer, the king being thus eſtabliſhed in the eſtate of the kingdome, did not forget his iournie which he had promiſed into the holie land, but with all diligence made his prouiſion, and namelie he ſought to gather monie to furniſh his charges, and ſo therevpon leuied a tax, engaged, ſold, and let to farme his lands, tols, cuſtoms, and other his reuenewes, with certeine counties and offices, ſo that he made an excéeding ſumme of monie. He alſo found, that Ranulfe de Glanuille lord chéefe iuſtice, and other of the head magiſtrates had not behaued themſelues vprightlie in the adminiſtration of their offices; ſo that he both depoſed the ſaid lord chéefe iuſtice as is aforeſaid, and almoſt all the ſhiriffes and their deputies within the realme of England, putting them to gréeuous fines for their offenſes and tranſgreſſions, and ſo by that meanes he got no ſmall deale of monie.

Matt. Par.

¶ Here note by the waie, how William Paruus affirmeth, that where this Ranulfe Glanuille, being a man of high wiſedome and ſtept into age, ſaw that manie things were doone by the new king, not ſo aduiſedlie, nor with ſuch foreſight as they ought to be, ſought of his owne accord to be diſcharged of his office, that he might the better prepare himſelfe to go in that iournie to the holie land, as by taking vpon him the croſſe he had vowed in the daies of king Henrie, and ſo he ſolemnelie renounced his office, which other (nothing ſo worthie of it) did afterwards inioy.

Wil. Paruus.

Moreouer, the king vnderſtanding that Hugh Putſey or Pudſey biſhop of Durham, being a verie aged man, had much monie, he ſold to him the manour of Seggeſfield or Sadberge, with the wapentake belonging to the ſame, and alſo found meanes to perſuade him to buy his owne prouince, which he did, giuing to the king an ineſtimable ſumme of monie, and was therevpon created an earle by the king for the ſame: wherevpon he was intituled both biſhop and earle of Durham, whereat the king would ieſt afterwards and ſaie; What a cunning craftesman am I, that haue made a new earle of an old biſhop?

The biſhop of Durham.

The biſhop of Durham made an earle.

Furthermore, the ſame biſhop gaue to the king a thouſand markes to be made chéefe iuſtice of England, and that he might tarrie at home, and not go into the holie land. And bicauſe he would not be reprooued of any perſon, he obteined of the apoſtolike ſée (which faileth no man that is ſurcharged with white or red mettall, and would be eaſed) a licence for a ſumme of monie to be diſpenſed with for that iournie. The king thus being earneſtlie bent to make commoditie of thoſe things, for the which he might get any monie at all, the citizens of London preſented vnto him a great ſumme towards the furniſhing foorth of his enterpriſe. Wherevpon to acquite their courteſie, he granted them large priuileges, and ordeined that the citie ſhould be ruled by two head officers, which they ſhould chooſe amongſt themſelues remoueable from yeare to yeare by the name of bailiffes. by force of that ordinance, were Henrie Cornehill, and Richard Fitz Reiner.

Port Greues.

The citie before thoſe daies euer ſince the comming in of William Conquerour, and a good while before his time, was gouerned by certeine officers or rulers named Port Greues (which word is deriued of two Saxon words, as Port and Greue. By Port is meant a towne, and by Greue a gardian or ruler, as who ſhould ſaie, A kéeper or ruler of a towne.) Theſe rulers with the lawes & cuſtomes then vſed within this citie, were regiſtred in a booke called (as ſome haue ſaid) Doomeſdaie, but through negligence after theſe lawes and cuſtomes were changed and altered, the booke was loſt, ſo that the remembrance of ſuch rulers as were before the daies of this Richard the firſt, are not to be had. Theſe bailiffes euer entred at Michaelmaſſe, and ſo continued forth their yeare.

Thus began the citie firſt to receiue the forme and ſtate of a common-wealth, and to be diuided into fellowſhips, which they call crafts or corporations. Such alſo are admitted to the fellowſhips of theſe companies, as haue truelie ſerued as apprentiſes a certeine number of yeares, as ſeuen at the leaſt, vnder which time of ſeruice expired, there is none made frée, nor ſuffered to inioy the liberties of that citie, ſauing ſuch as are borne frée, that is to ſaie, of fréemen within the citie, of whome at this time, it is not much materiall to make any further report. The citie thus conſiſting of the ſaid craftes or occupations, chooſeth out of the ſame a ſenat or companie of graue councellours, whom they name Aldermen (E) changed into (A) according to the old Saxon pronuntiation. It is alſo diuided into 26. tribes or wards, of the which euerie one hath his ſeuerall Alderman, or ouerſéer, who haue both authoritie ſufficient, and large priuileges to mainteine the good gouernement of their portions withall. Out of the number of theſe, there is another officer yearelie choſen and appointed, called the Maior, who ruleth all the reſt.

But now to returne vnto the further doings of king Richard before his departure out of England towards his iournie into the land of Paleſtine, commonlie called Holie land, it is ſaid, he made ſuch ſale of things apperteining to him, as well in right of the crowne, as otherwiſe, that it ſéemed to diuerſe he made his reckoning neuer to returne againe, in ſo much that ſome of his councellours told him plainelie, that he did not well in making things alwaie ſo fréelie, to the diſhonoring of his maieſtie, and preiudice of his ſucceſſour; vnto whom he anſwered, that in time of néed it was no euill policie for a man to helpe himſelfe with his owne, and further ioined hereto theſe words, that if London at that time of néed would be bought, he would ſurelie ſell it, if he might méet with a conuenient merchant that were able to giue him monie inough for it.

Another way he had alſo to gather riches, and that was this. He had a licence of pope Innocent the third, to diſpenſe with ſuch as pleaſed him within his realme, for their vowes made to go into the holie land, although they had taken on them the croſſe for that purpoſe, namelie ſuch as he ſhould appoint to remaine behind him for the defenſe of his countrie: and of theſe alſo he tooke abundantlie, and diuerſe other he compelled to fine, namelie, to the end that he might get their monie likewiſe, that hereby he obteined no ſmall ſumme toward the furniture of his iournie. But both pope & prince forgat in the meane while, that

This yeare alſo in the moneth of Nouember, as Matthew Paris ſaith, Johannes de Anagnia a cardinall and legat from the pope arriued here in England, comming on land at Douer, and bicauſe the king was as then in the north parts, the ſame cardinall was prohibited on the behalfe of the kings mother queene Elianor, to paſſe any further without the kings commandement. And ſo he staied there thirtéene daies at the charges of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, till the king came to thoſe parties, by whoſe wiſedome a direction was taken for the quieting of the controuerſie betwixt the archbiſhop, and the moonkes of Canturburie, for the chappell church of Hakinton now called S. In the ſame moneth of Nouember, by the kings appointment, Geffrey the elect of Yorke, who was the kings brother, with other barons and lords of Yorkeſhire, receiued William king of Scotland at the water of Tweed, and from thence with all due reuerence and honour they brought him vnto Canturburie, where the king had called a councell of the lords of his realme both ſpirituall and temporall, in the which euerie of them tooke an oth to be true to the king, and to continue in due obedience vnder him and his lawes, which oth alſo the king of Scots receiued, being there preſent, and likewiſe king Richards brethren earle John and Geffrey the archbiſhop of Yorke.

The king of Scots therefore hauing receiued this oth, and thinking the time to ſerue his purpoſe for redéeming of thoſe caſtels, which were deliuered to king Henrie as gages for his ranſome, paid now vnto king Richard ten thouſand markes, and had reſtitution of the ſame, that is of Berwike, Roxburgh, Sterling, and Edenburgh. But William Paruus ſaieth, that Edenburgh was reſtored to him in the daies of king Henrie, by reaſon of his wife which he tooke in the parties beyond the ſeas: and herewith agréeth the Scotiſh chronicle. King Richard alſo aſſigned to queene Elianor his mother, the accuſtomed dower, with manie lordſhips and honours beſide, as an augmentation thereof. About which time died William de Mandeuille earle of Albemarle at Rouen, and Hugh de Putſey the nephue of the biſhop of Durham died at Aclet, and was buried at Durham. Alſo Formalis archbiſhop of Trier died at Northampton, and was there buried in the church of S. Andrews.

Matth. Paris.

In the meane time, king Richard ſtill deſirous to furniſh himſelfe with monie, deuiſed yet another ſhift, and feigned that he had loſt his ſeale; wherefore he commanded a new to be made, which being doone, he cauſed it to be proclaimed and publiſhed in euerie countrie, that thoſe to whome he had granted any thing by his déed or charter, meaning to inioy the ſame in ſuertie, ſhould not thinke it much to come and haue it confirmed by his new ſeale, leaſt afterward the other being loſt, their lawfull titles might be called into queſtion. Whervpon manie that could not come to him whileſt he was in England, were glad to follow him, and ſaile ouer into Normandie, and there to fine at his pleaſure for the new ſeale, to the end that their writings might be confirmed thereby, and made ſo much the more ſure to them and their ſucceſſours. For the ſame buſineſſe alſo Remigius the prior of S. Albons, and manie other went ouer to their great coſts, charges, and trauell, after he was tranſported into France.

I find moreouer about the ſame time, that the kings brother earle John exhibited a ſore complaint againſt the Romane legat and other biſhops, for that the archbiſhop of Canturburie, after the appeale made vnto the apoſtolike ſea, had put his lands vnder interdiction for his mariage made with the earle of Glocesters daughter: which when the legat heard, he forthwith confirmed the appeale, and releaſed the earles lands of the aforeſaid interdiction. The ſame time alſo, the tenth part of all the moueable goods through the realme of England was leuied to the aid of the warres in the holie land. And this collection, paſſing vnder the name of an almes, was extended vpon the goods as well of the ſpirituall men as temporall.

William Lōgchampe biſhop of Elie.

After all this, K. Richard deſirous to ſet order in the gouernment of his realme, appointed Hugh biſhop of Durham to haue the rule of the north parts as cheefe iuſtice from Humber northwards toward Scotland, deliuering vnto him alſo the keeping of Wincheſter caſtell: the reſidue of the kingdome (with the cuſtodie of the towre) he aſſigned to the gouernance of William Longchampe biſhop of Elie, whome he had made cheefe iuſtice of that part, and chancellour of the realme, a man of great diligence and knowledge in the adminiſtration of things, but verie factious and deſirous of rule, honour and riches farre aboue all meaſure. And with theſe two he ioined in commiſſion Hugh Bardulfe, William Marſhall earle of Chepſtow, or rather Penbroke, Geffrey Fitz Peter, & William Brewer, men of great honour, wiſedome, and diſcretion.

King Richard paſſeth ouer into Normandie

On the fift day of December, he departed from Canturburie, and went to Douer, there to take water, and ſo on the eleuenth day of December he paſſed ouer vnto Calice, where he found Philip earle of Flanders readie to receiue him, who attended vpon him till he came into Normandie, where the king held his Chriſtmas at Burun, and immediatlie he came to an enterview with the French king at Gue S. Remige, where they concluded peace togither, to be kept betwixt them & their countries on ech part: the which was put in writing, and confirmed with their oths and ſeales in the feaſt of ſaint Hilarie.

Furthermore, about the purification of our ladie, Elianor the quéene mother, and the ladie Alice ſiſter to the French king, Baldwine archbiſhop of Canturburie, Iohn biſhop of Norwich, Hugh biſhop of Durham, Geffrey biſhop of Wincheſter, Reignold biſhop of Bath, William Biſhop of Elie, Hubert biſhop of Saliſburie, and Hugh biſhop of Cheſter, with Geffrey the elect of Yorke and Iohn earle of Mortaigne the kings two brethren, by commandement of the king paſſed ouer into Normandie, to commen with him before his ſetting forward.

Contention betwixt two ambitious biſhops.

¶ Some write, that now at this preſent, the king ſhould ordeine or rather confirme the biſhop of Elie his chancellour to be lord chéefe iuſtice ouer all England, and the biſhop of Durham to be lord iuſtice from Trent northwards. But whenſoeuer they were thus aduanced to ſuch dignities, howſoeuer they came by them, directlie or indirectlie, true it is, that immediatlie therevpon, ſtrife and diſcord did ariſe betwixt them: for waxing proud and inſolent, they diſdained ech other, contending which of them ſhould beare moſt rule and authoritie, inſomuch that whatſoeuer ſéemed good to the one, the other miſliked, as in caſes where parteners in authoritie are equall, it often happeneth. The like hereof is noted before betwéene the archbiſhops of Canturburie and Yorke in diuerſe kings reignes. For the nature of ambition is to delight in ſingularitie, to admit no péere, to giue place to no ſuperior, to acknowledge no equall. Hereto alludeth the poet verie neatlie, and exemplifieth it in the old Romans, the order of whoſe actions is continued at this day, as by the words inſuing may be gathered, and ordinarilie obſerued, both here and elſewhere;

Moreouer, at the ſame time he cauſed his two brethren, earle Iohn, and Geffrey the elect archbiſhop of Yorke to take an oth not to returne into England during the terme of thrée yeares next inſuing, without his conſent and licence firſt had. This he did, foreſéeing what might happen, prouiding as it were againſt ſuch practiſes as his brethren might happilie attempt againſt him. But yet his mother quéene Elianor procured him to reuoke that decrée immediatlie, leaſt it might ſeeme to the world, that hir ſonnes ſhould ſtand in feare one of another. And ſo the earle of Mortaigne was licenced to returne into England at his pleaſure, ſwearing an oth at his departure to obeie the kings beheaſt, and truelie to ſerue him, according to the dutie of a good and loiall ſubiect. The biſhop of Elie lord chancellour and chéefe iuſtice of England was alſo ſent backe hither into this realme, to ſet forward things behouefull for the kings iournie.

Earle Iohn licenced to returne into England.

The biſhop of Elie returneth.

In like maner the king ſent to Rome to obteine that the ſaid biſhop of Elie might be conſtituted the popes legat through both the prouinces of Canturburie and Yorke, and likewiſe through Wales and Ireland. Which was ſoone granted by the bulles of pope Clement the third, bearing date the 5. of Iune. For the which office the biſhops gaue him 1500. marks, to the great offenſe of the king, as he ſhewed afterward to cardinall Octauian that came to viſit him when he arriued in the riuer of Tiber, being vpon his iourneie towards Meſſina, as after may appeare. But in the meane time, calling togither the lords and peeres of thoſe his dominions on that ſide the ſea, to wit, Normandie, Britaine, Aniou, Poitou, and Guien, he conſulted with them what number of ſoldiors and how manie ſhips it ſhould be conuenient for him to take with him and furniſh into Aſia: and herewith he did command them alſo to obeie Robert earle of Leiceſter, whome he appointed to remaine amongſt them as his lieutenant or vicegerent of thoſe parts during his abſence.

The hatred borne to the Iewes.

¶ But here to leaue king Richard in conſultation for matters apperteining to his iournie, and ſhew brieflie what happened (by the waie) to the Iewes, which as then dwelt héere in England, after that king Richard was paſſed ouer into Normandie: ye haue heard how after the riot againſt them at London, when the king was crowned, he tooke order that they ſhould remaine in peace vnder his protection, and commanded that no perſon ſhould in anie wiſe moleſt them. But now after that he was gone ouer, and that the ſouldiers (which prepared themſelues to follow him) began to aſſemble in routs, the heads of the common people began to wax wild, and faine would they haue had ſome occaſion of raiſing a new tumult againſt the Iewes, whome (for their vnmercifull vſurie practiſed to the vndooing of manie an honeſt man) they moſt deadlie hated, wiſhing moſt earneſtlie their expulſion out of England. Hervpon by reaſon of a riot committed latelie againſt them, at the towne of Lin in Norfolke, where manie of them were ſlaine, other people in other parts of the realme, taking occaſion hereat, as if they had béene called vp by the ſound of a bell or trumpet, aroſe againſt them in thoſe townes where they had any habitations, and robbed and bet them after a diſordered and moſt riotous maner.

Iohn Textor.
Fiue hundred ſaith Houeden and Textor.

As at Stamford (on the faire day in Lent) at Lincolne, and at Yorke, in which citie after a number of them had béene beſieged certeine daies within a towre of the kings (whither they fled for ſuccour) one of their learned gouernours cauſed foure hundred of their companie to conſent to haue their throts cut one at an others hands, he himſelfe cutting his wiues throte firſt, whoſe name was Anna, then his childrens, one after another, and laſt of all ſlue himſelfe, onlie rather than he would fall into the hands of the chriſtians, that had thus long beſieged them. The reſt perceiuing what their great Rabbi had doone, ſet fire vpon all their goods and ſubſtance, which they had gotten into the tower with them, and ſo conſuming the ſame, would haue burnt alſo the reſidue of their fellowes which would not agree to the Rabbies counſell, in the cruell murthering of themſelues, if they had not taken a ſtrong turret hard by within that tower, and defended themſelues both from the fire and crueltie of their brethren, who had made awaie themſelues in ſuch manner as I haue ſaid: and that to the number of foure hundred, or (as ſome write) fiue hundred at the leaſt.

On the morow, thoſe that were ſaued, called out to the people, and not onelie ſhewed how and after what ſort their fellowes were diſpatched, but alſo offered to be baptiſed, and forſake their Iudaiſme, if they might haue their liues ſaued from the imminent & preſent danger wherein they ſaw themſelues to be wrapped, through the furie of the people. To be ſhort, this thing was granted, and they came forth, howbeit they were no ſooner entred into the preaſe, but they were all ſlaine, and not one man of them preſerued.

After this alſo, the people ran to the cathedrall church, and broke into thoſe places where their bonds and obligations laie, by the which they had diuerſe of the kings ſubiects bound vnto them in moſt vnconſcionable ſort, and for ſuch deteſtable vſurie as (if the authors that write thereof were not of credit) would hardlie be beleeued. All which euidences or bonds they ſolemnelie burned in the middeſt of the church. After which, ech went his waie, the ſouldiers to the king, and the commons to their houſes, and ſo was the citie quieted. This happened at Yorke on Palmeſundaie eue, being the 17. of March: and vpon the 15. of that moneth, thoſe that inhabited in the towne of S. Edmundſburie in Suffolke, were ſet vpon, and manie of them ſlaine. The reſidue that eſcaped, through the procurement of the abbat then named Samſon, were expelled, ſo that they neuer had anie dwellings there ſince that time.

Thus were the Iewes vnmercifullie dealt with in all places in maner through this realme, the firſt beginning whereof chanced at London (as before ye haue heard) and the next at Lin, of which I thinke it good to note ſome part of the maner therof, although breeflie, and ſo to returne to my purpoſe. The occaſion therefore of the tumult at Lin chanced by this meanes: it fortuned that one of the Iewes there was become a chriſtian, wherewith thoſe of his nation were ſo mooued, that they determined to kill him where ſoeuer they might find him. And herevpon they ſet vpon him one daie as he came by, through the ſtreets: he to eſcape their hands fled to the next church; but his countriemen were ſo deſirous to execute their malicious purpoſe, that they followed him ſtill, and inforced themſelues to breake into the church vpon him. Herewith the noiſe being raiſed by the chriſtians that ſought to ſaue the conuerted Iew, a number of mariners being forreners, that were arriued there with their veſſels out of ſundrie parts, and diuerſe alſo of the towneſmen came to the reſcue, and ſetting vpon the Iewes, cauſed them to flee into their houſes.

The ſlaughter made of the Jewes at Lin.

The towneſmen were not verie earneſt in purſuing of them, bicauſe of the kings proclamation and ordinance before time made in fauour of the Iewes: but the mariners followed them to their houſes, ſlue diuerſe of them, robbed and ſacked their goods, and finallie ſet their dwellings on fire, and ſo burnt them vp altogither. Theſe mariners being inriched with the ſpoile of the Iewes goods, and fearing to be called to accompt for their vnlawfull act by the kings officers, got them forthwith to ſhipbord, and hoiſing vp ſailes, departed with their ſhips to the ſea, and ſo eſcaped the danger of that which might haue beene otherwiſe laid to their charge. The towneſmen being called to an accompt excuſed themſelues by the mariners, burdening them with all the fault. But although they of Lin were thus excuſed, yet they of Yorke eſcaped not ſo eaſilie. For the king being aduertiſed of ſuch outrage, done contrarie to the order of his lawes and expreſſe commandement, wrote ouer to the biſhop of Elie his chancellour, charging him to take cruell puniſhment of the offendors.

The biſhop with an armie went to Yorke, but the cheefe authors of the riot hearing of his comming, fled into Scotland: yet the biſhop at his comming to the citie, cauſed earneſt inquirie to be made of the whole matter. The citizens excuſed themſelues, & offered to proue that they were not of counſel with them that had committed the riot, neither had they aided nor comforted them therein in anie maner of wiſe. And in deed the moſt part of them that were the offendors, were of the countries and townes neere to the citie, with ſuch as were croſſed into the holie land, and now gone ouer to the king, ſo that verie few or none of the ſubſtantiall men of the citie were found to haue ioined with them. Howbeit this would not excuſe the citizens, but that they were put to their fine by the ſtout biſhop, euerie of them paieng his portion according to his power and abilitie in ſubſtance, the common ſort of the poore people being pardoned, and not called into iudgement, ſith the ringleaders were fled and gone out of the waie: and thus much by waie of digreſſion touching the Iews.

The citizens of Yorke put to their fine for ſlaughter of the Jewes.

Now to returne vnto the king, who in this meane time was verie buſie to prouide all things neceſſarie to ſet forward on his iournie; his ſhips which laie in the mouth of the riuer of Saine, being readie to put off, he tooke order in manie points concerning the ſtate of the common-wealth on that ſide, and cheefelie he called to mind, that it ſhould be a thing neceſſarie for him, to name who ſhould ſucceed him in the kingdome of England, if his chance ſhould not be to returne againe from ſo long and dangerous a iournie. He therefore named (as ſome ſuppoſe) his nephue Arthur, the ſonne of his brother Geffrey duke of Britaine, to be his ſucceſſour in the kingdome, a yoong man of a likelie proofe and princelie towardneſſe, but not ordeined by God to ſucceed ouer this kingdome.

Matt. Weſt.

About the ſame time the biſhop of Elie, lord chancellour and cheefe iuſtice of England, tooke vp to the kings vſe, of euerie citie in England two palfries and two ſumpter horſſes, & of euerie abbeie one palfrie and one ſumpter horſſe, & euerie manour within the realme found alſo one palfrie and one ſumpter horſſe. Moreouer, the ſaid biſhop of Elie deliuered the gouernement of Yorkeſhire to his brother Oſbert de Longchampe: and all thoſe knights of the ſaid ſhire, the which would not come to make anſwer to the law vpon ſummons giuen them, he commanded to be apprehended and by and by caſt in priſon. Alſo when the biſhop of Durham was returned from the king and come ouer into England to go vnto his charge, at his meeting with the lord chancellour at Elie (notwithſtanding that he ſhewed him his letters patents of the grant made to him to be iuſtice from Trent northward) the ſaid lord chancellour taking his iournie to Southwell with him, there deteined him as priſoner, till he had made ſurrender to him of the caſtell of Windſor, & further had deliue-red to him his ſonnes, Henrie de Putſey, and Gilbert de la Ley, as pledges that he ſhould kéepe the peace againſt the king and all his ſubiects, vntill the ſaid prince ſhould returne from the holie land. And ſo he was deliuered for that time, though ſhortlie after, and whileſt he remained at Houeden, there came to him Oſbert de Longchampe the lord chancellors brother, and William de Stuteuille, the which cauſed the ſaid biſhop to find ſufficient ſuertie that he ſhould not thence depart without the kings licence, or the lord chancellors, ſo long as the king ſhould be abſent. Herevpon the biſhop of Durham ſent knowledge to the king how and in what ſort he had béene handled by the chancellor.

William de Chiſi.

In the meane time the king was gone into Gaſcoigne, where he beſieged a caſtell that belonged to one William de Chiſi, and tooke both the caſtell and the owner, whome he cauſed to be hanged for the ſpoiles and robberies which he had committed vpon pilgrims that paſſed by thoſe parts toward Compoſtella, to viſit the bodie of ſaint James. After this, the king came backe vnto Chinon in Aniou, and there tooke order for the ſetting forth of his nauie by ſea, ouer which he appointed chéefe gouernours Gerard archbiſhop of Aux, Bernard biſhop of Baieux, Robert de Sablius, Richard de Camuille, and William de Forz de Vlerun, commanding all thoſe that ſhould paſſe forth with his ſaid nauie, to be obedient vnto theſe perſons as his deputies and lieutenants. Herewith they were appointed to prouide victuals to ſerue all thoſe that ſhould go by ſea for the ſpace of 60. daies.

The king alſo made the ſame time certeine ordinances to be obſerued among the ſeafaring men which tended to this effect:

Sleiers of men.

1 Firſt, that if any man chanced to ſlea an other on the ſhipbord, he ſhould be bound to the dead bodie and ſo throwne into the ſea.

2 Secondlie, if he killed him on land, he ſhould yet be bound to him as before, and ſo buried quicke togither.

Bralers.

Puniſhment for blouddrawers.

3 Thirdlie, if any man ſhould be conuicted by lawfull witneſſe, that he drew any weapon to ſtrike any other, or chanced by ſtriking at any man to draw bloud of him that was ſmitten, he ſhould loſe his hand.

4 Fourthlie, if he gaue but a blowe with his fiſt without bloudſhedding, he ſhould be plunged thrée ſeuerall times ouer head and eares in the water.

Reuilers.

5 Fiftlie, if any man reuiled another, he ſhould for euerie time ſo miſuſing himſelfe, forfeit an ounce of ſiluer.

Theft and pickerie.

6 Sixtlie, that if any man were taken with theft or pickerie, and thereof conuicted, he ſhould haue his head polled, and hot pitch powred vpon his pate, and vpon that, the feathers of ſome pillow or cuſhion ſhaken aloft, that he might thereby be knowne for a théefe, and at the next arriuall of the ſhips to any land, be put forth of the companie to ſéeke his aduenture, without all hope of returne vnto his fellowes.

Wil. Paruus.

Theſe were the ſtatutes which this famous prince did enact at the firſt for his nauie, which ſithens that time haue béen verie much inlarged. About the ſame time John Biſhop of Whiterne in Scotland, ſuffragane to the church of Yorke, ordeined Geffrey archbiſhop of Yorke, préeſt. At the ſame ſeaſon alſo the election of the ſame Geffrey was confirmed by pope Clement, who among other things that he wrote to the chapiter of Yorke on his behalfe, at the end he addeth theſe words: “We doo therefore admoniſh you all, and by the apoſtolicall bulles command you, that you exhibit both reuerence and honour vnto him as vnto your prelat, that thereby you may appeare commendable both before God and man. Giuen at Lateran in the nones of March and third yeare of our gouernment.”

Whileſt theſe things were in dooing, there came into France legats from the ſaid Clement, to mooue the two kings to make all the ſpéed poſſible towards their iourneie, bicauſe of the great danger wherein things ſtood in Paleſtine, requiring preſent helpe. Herevpon king Richard (his men and prouiſion being readie) commanded that his ſhips ſhould ſet forward, & to coaſt about by the ſtreicts of Giberalterre to come vnto Marſeilles, where he appointed to méet them, and ſo with a choſen companie of men he alſo ſet forth thitherwards by land, and comming to Towrs, receiued the ſcrip and ſtaffe as a pilgrime ſhould, at the hands of the archbiſhop there.

After this, both the kings of England and France met at Vizeley in the octaues of the natiuitie of S. John Baptiſt, and when they had remained there two daies they paſſed forth to the citie of Lion; where the two kings departed in ſunder, and each one kept his iournie, the one toward Guenes, where his nauie was appointed to come to him, and the other to Marſeilles, there to méet with his fléet, according to his appointment. But the Engliſh ſhips being let and ſtaied by the way by contrarie winds and rigorous tempeſts, which toſſed them to and fro vpon the coaſts of Spaine, could not come in any conuenient time vnto Marſeilles, ſo that king Richard thinking long to tarrie for them, & perceiuing they could not kéepe their appointed time, he hired ſhips from all places thereabouts, and embarking himſelfe and his men in the ſame, vpon ſaint Laurence euen, ſailed forth towards Sicile, where he was appointed to méet with king Philip.

Rog. Houed.

Here is to be noted, that king Richard made not all that iourneie from Marſeilles to Meſſina by ſea, but ſundrie times comming on land, hired horſſes, and rode forth alongſt the coaſt, appointing with his ſhips and gallies where to méet him, and ſometimes he reſted certeine daies togither in one place or other as at Portdelphin, at Naples, and at Salerne, from whence there departed from him Baldwine archbiſhop of Canturburie, Hubert biſhop of Saliſburie, and the lord Ranulfe de Glanuille, the which taking vpon them to go before, with proſperous wind and weather in ſhort ſpace landed at Acon, which was then beſieged, as you ſhall heare hereafter.

At Rome the king came not, but being within the ſtreame of the riuer of Tiber, there came to him a cardinall named Octauianus, biſhop of Hoſtia, to whome he ſpake manie reprochfull words of the couetouſneſſe vſed in the court of Rome (a vice reputed the common nurſſe of all miſchéefes, as one verie well noteth,

King Richard blameth the court of Rome for couetouſneſſe.

Bicauſe they had receiued ſeauen hundred marks for the conſecration of the biſhop of Mauns, and 1500. marks for the confirming of the biſhop of Elie the popes legat. And againe no ſmall ſumme of monie they had receiued of the archbiſhop of Burdeaux, when vpon an accuſation brought againſt him by the cleargie of his prouince he ſhould haue béene depoſed. In the meane time whiles king Richard thus paſſed forward towards Meſſina, the nauie that was appointed to coaſt about Spaine and to méet him at Marſeilles, was toſſed (as before is ſaid) with wind and tempeſts, and a part thereof, that is to wit, ten ſhips driuen here and there on the coaſts of Spaine, of which number nine arriued at Liſbone and the tenth being a ſhip of London arriued at the citie of Sylua, which was then the vttermoſt citie of Spaine, that was inhabited with chriſtians.

The Saracens at that time made warres againſt the king of Portingale, ſo that the Portingales ſtood in néed of aid, in ſo much that they of Sylua did not onelie intreat the Engliſhmen to ſtaie with them for a time, but alſo got grant of them to breake their ſhip, with the timber whereof they might the better fortifie their towne, promiſing that their king ſhould recompenſe them with an other as good as theirs, and alſo further ſatiſfie them for their ſeruice, during the time of their abode there in defenſe of that citie. Likewiſe of thoſe that arriued at Liſbone there went to the number of fiue hundred vnto ſaint Iranes, where the king of Portingale then was, looking to be aſſaulted by his enimies: but by the counterfet death of the great K. of the Saracens named Bolac Almiramumoli (who feared theſe new ſuccours, and doubted the ſequele of his dooings, to the end he might depart with honour, he fained himſelfe dead) the king of Portingale was for that time preſentlie deliuered out of danger.

The king of Portingale.

Almiramumoli king of the Saracens.

Herevpon he returned to Liſbone, where he found three ſcore and three other ſhips of king Richards nauie there newlie arriued, ouer the which were chéefe capteins Robert de Sabuuille, and Richard de Camuille: which at their comming to land could not ſo gouerne their people, but that ſome naughtie fellowes amongſt them fell to breaking and robbing of orchards: ſome alſo entring into the citie, behaued themſelues verie diſorderlie. But yet by the comming of the king, their lewdneſſe was ſtaied, ſo that he ſeemed not to ſéeke reuenge of the pilgrims, but rather with courteous meanes to bridle their vnlawfull attempts: wherevnto the diligence of the Engliſh capteins not a little preuailed for a while, but yet for all that could be done on both ſides, within three daies after, a new tumult was raiſed betwixt the Engliſh pilgrims and the towneſmen, and diuerſe hurt and killed on either part.

Robert de Sabuuille. Richard de Camuille.

A mutinie betwixt the Engliſhmen and the townſmen of Liſbone. Engliſhmen committed to priſon.

Wherevpon the king cauſed the gates of the citie to be ſhut, and all thoſe that were come from the ſhips into the citie to eat and drinke (being in number about ſeauen hundred) were apprehended and committed to ward: and before they could be releaſed, ſir Robert Sabuuille and ſir Richard Camuille were glad to agree with the king, ſo as all former offenſes being remitted, and things taken by either part reſtored, the Engliſhmen promiſed to obſerue the peace againſt the king of Portingale and his people; and he likewiſe couenanted for him and his ſubiects, that they ſhould kéepe the peace againſt all pilgrims that went forth in this voiage, and vſe them like his fréends, and thus the quarell ceaſed.

Soone after, the Engliſh nauie departed from Liſbone, and came vnto the mouth of the riuer of Taie, betwéene Caperico and Belem, where the ſame daie on ſaint Iames éeue the lord William de Forzdulerun arriued alſo with thrée and thirtie other ſhips, and ſo then they were in all about an hundred and ſix ſailes verie well furniſhed and manned; and ſo from thence taking their courſe towards Marſciles, finallie they arriued there in the octaues of the aſſumption of our ladie; and ſtaieng there an eight daies (till they had repaired ſuch things about their ſhips as were néedfull) they ſet forward againe, and came to Meſſina in Sicile in the feaſt of the exaltation of the croſſe. On the ſunday following alſo came the French king thither, hauing loſt no ſmall part of his nauie by tempeſts of weather.

The Engliſh ſhips méet togither.

King Richard as then remained at Salern, and hearing that his nauie was gone towards Meſſina, he departed thence on the thirteenth day of September, and haſted forth towards Meſſina, paſſing by Melphi and Cocenza, and ſo at length comming to Faro de Meſſina, he paſſed the ſame, and on the 23. day of September arriued at Meſſina with great noiſe of trumpets and other inſtruments, to the woonder of the French king and others that beheld his great puiſſance and roiall behauiour now at his comming. The ſame time he went vnto the French kings lodging, to commen with him of their buſineſſe: and immediatlie the French king tooke the ſea, in purpoſe to haue paſſed forward on his iournie but by contrarie wind he was ſtaied and kept backe within the hauen, wherevpon both the kings determined to winter there, and in the meane time to prouide themſelues of all things neceſſarie for their iornie, againſt the beginning of the next ſpring. On the 30 of September he receiued his ſiſter the quéene of Sicile, the widow of William late king of that Ile, whome he placed in a ſtrong fortreſſe, which he tooke the ſame day, and left therein a conuenient gariſon of men of armes and demilances for the ſafegard of the place and of his ſaid ſiſter.

They arriue at Meſſina.

K. Richard arriueth at Meſſina.

¶ But now for the better vnderſtanding of the cauſe of ſuch quarelling as fell out betwixt the Engliſhmen and the Sicilians, yée ſhall vnderſtand that a little before the arriuall of the kings of England and France in thoſe parts, king William of Sicile was departed this life, leauing no iſſue behind him. Wherevpon the lords of the Ile elected one Tancred to their king, a baſtard ſonne of Roger ſometime king of that land, and grandfather to this laſt deceaſed king William. This Tancred though he receiued king Richard verie courteouſlie: yet he greatlie truſted him not, bicauſe he demanded the dowrie of his ſiſter quéene Ioane, wife to the late king William to be reſtored, whereas he had not readie monie to diſcharge it.

Furthermore to depart with the citie of Mount ſaint Angelo, with all the countrie therevnto belonging, which was indéed aſſigned to hir for hir dowrie, he thought in no wiſe profitable: but king Richard did not onelie require that citie and countie with a chaire of gold, according to the cuſtome of that kingdome in right of his ſiſter, as due to hir by way of hir dowrie, but alſo he required to his owne vſe a table of gold conteining twelue foot in length, and one foot and an halfe in breadth, & two treſſels of gold to beare vp the ſame table, with 24. ſiluer cups, and as manie diſhes of ſiluer, with a tent of ſilke of ſuch largeneſſe that two hundred knights might ſit at meat within it: alſo fortie thouſand meaſures of wheat, with as manie of barlie, and as manie of wine, beſide one hundred armed gallies, with all furniture and vittels ſufficient to ſerue the gallie-men in the ſame for the terme of two yeares. Theſe things he demanded as due to him being heire to his father king Henrie, accordinglie as was deuiſed by king William in his laſt will and teſtament, which demands ſeemed intollerable to the ſaid Tancred: ſo that if he could haue ſhifted the matter, he was loth to haue heard thereof.

A chaire of gold.

K. Richards demands for the dowrie of his ſiſter wife to K. William

Moreouer, bicauſe pope Clement in right of the church pretended a title to the realme of Sicile, now that king William was dead without heires, he doubted of ſome practiſe that might be made againſt him betwixt king Richard and the pope. Wherevpon he thought to prouide againſt all attempts that might be made, fortifieng his townes & caſtels with ſtrong gariſons, and tooke counſell with the citizens of Meſſina, by what meanes he might ſooneſt diſpatch his countrie of that preſent danger, and procure K. Richard to get him forward on his iournie.

Whileſt theſe things were in hand, there was miniſtred to the Engliſh men occaſion of diſpleaſure: for as it oftentimes chanceth (where an armie is) certeine of the vnrulie ſouldiers within Meſſina vſed themſelues ſomewhat riotouſlie, wherevpon the citizens offended therewith, got them to armour, and chaſed all the ſouldiers out of the citie. King Richard who laie in campe without the walles neere to the citie, was ſo highlie diſpleaſed herewith, that he cauſed his men to arme themſelues, and to prepare ladders and other neceſſarie things to aſſault the citie: but by the mediation of the French king & curteous excuſe of king Tancred (alledging the fault to reſt onelie in a ſort of rude citizens, whom he promiſed to puniſh) the matter was taken vp, and ſtaied for a time, till at length it was perceiued, that the Sicilians ſubtilie went about to feed king Richard with faire words, till he ſhould be readie to ſet forwards on his iournie, and ſo ſhould the matter paſſe without further puniſhment.

K. Richard aſſalteth and entreth the citie by force.

Herevpon king Richard, not minding to be ſo mocked at their hands, approched one daie to the wals and gates with his armie in good araie of battell to giue the aſſault, which was doone ſo earneſtlie, and ſo well mainteined, that finallie the citie was entred by force, and manie of the citizens ſlaine, but the ſlaughter had beene much greater, if king Richard had not commanded his men to ſpare the ſword, moued with the lamentable noiſe of poore people crieng to him for mercie and grace. The Engliſhmen hauing got poſſeſſion of the citie pight vp the banners with the armes of the king of England round about the wals, wherewith the French king was ſore diſpleaſed, and required that the ſame might be taken downe, and his ſet vp: but the king of England would not ſo agrée. Neuertheleſſe to pacifie the French kings mood, he deliuered the citie of Meſſina into the cuſtodie of the knights Templers and Hoſpitalers, till he might be ſatiſfied of ſuch things as he demanded of king Tancred.

The two kings of England and France receiue a ſolemne oth.

After this on the 8. daie of October, the two kings of England and France, before a great number of earles, barons, and others, both of the cleargie and temporaltie, tooke their ſolemne othes, that the one ſhould defend the other, and alſo either others armie in this iournie, both comming and going, without fraud or deceipt: and the like oth was receiued by the earles and barons on both parties. Then the two kings by aduiſe and conſent of both their armies deuiſed theſe ordinances.

Ordinances deuiſed.

1 That all pilgrims which chanced to die in this iournie might diſpoſe at their pleaſure all their armour, horſſes, and apparell, and halfe of thoſe things which they had with them, ſo that they ſent nothing home into their countries, and the other halfe ſhould be at the diſcretion of Walter archbiſhop of Rouen, Manſer biſhop of Langres, of the maiſter of the temple, and of the maiſter of the Hoſpitall, of Hugh duke of Burgoigne, of Rafe de Coucie, of Drogo de Marlow, of Robert Sabuill, Andrew de Chauennie, and of Gilbert Waſcoile, which ſhould imploie the ſame towards the ſupport of the wars in the holie land againſt the infidels as they thought moſt expedient.

Plaie forbidden.

2 That no man ſhould plaie at anie game within the armie for monie, except knights and chapleins, the which ſhould not looſe in one daie and night aboue 20 ſhillings, they to forfeit an 100 ſhillings ſo oft as they loſt aboue that ſumme: the perſons aforenamed to haue the ſame to be diſtributed as afore is ſaid. The two kings might plaie, and command their ſeruants in their preſence likewiſe to plaie, ſo that they exceeded not the ſumme of 20 ſhillings. And alſo the ſeruants of archbiſhops, biſhops, earles and barons, by their maiſters commandement might play, not exceeding that ſumme: but if anie ſeruants or mariners, or other of like degrée, were found to play without licence, the ſeruants ſhould be whipped naked three daies round about the campe, except they ranſomed forth themſelues, at the pleaſure of the perſons aboue named: and the mariners ſhould be plunged ouer head and eares in the ſea three mornings togither, after the vſe of ſeamen, except they redeemed that puniſhment, at the diſcretion likewiſe of the ſaid perſons: and thoſe of other like méane degrées being neither knights nor chapleins ſhould be puniſhed as ſeruants.

Borrowing.

3 That if anie pilgrime borrowed anie thing of an other whileſt he was on his iournie, he ſhould be bound to paie it: but if he borrowed it before his ſetting forth, he was not bound to anſwer it till his returne home.

Souldiers or mariners departing from their maſters.

4 That if anie mariner or ſeruant, reteined in wages with anie man in this iournie, departed from his maſter without licence, no other perſon might receiue him, and if he did, he ſhould be puniſhed at the diſcretion of the forenamed perſons.

Vittelers.

5 That no vitteler or other ſhould buy any bread to ſell againe, nor any meale within the compaſſe of the campe, except the ſame were brought by a ſtranger, neither might they buy any paaſt or other thing to ſell againe in the campe, or within a league of it.

6 That if anie man bought corne wherof to make bread, it was appointed how much he ſhould gaine in one meaſure beſide the bran.

7 That other occupiers, which vſed buieng and ſelling of wares, ſhould gaine one penie in 10 pence, neither ſhould anie man refuſe anie of the kings coine, except it were broken within the circle.

8 That no man ſhould buy anie fleſh to ſell it againe, except a liuing beaſt, which he ſhould kill within the campe.

9 That no man ſhould make bread to ſell, but after the rate of penie loaues. Wherin the penie Engliſh was appointed to go for foure pence Antouine. All theſe ordinances with other were decreed and ordeined to be obſerued and kept by the counſell, conſent, and agreement of the kings of England, France, and Sicile.

Polydor.

But to returne now to the diſſention betwixt the Engliſhmen and them of Meſſina: ye ſhall vnderſtand that the tumult being once ceaſſed, and diuerſe of the chéefe offendors in the late commotion put to death, king Tancred ſhortlie after came thither, and ſought to auoid all ſuſpicion out of king Richards head, that he might conceiue of him for béeing in anie wiſe culpable in that which his ſubiects of Meſſina had attempted againſt him, and therefore hauing recouered monie of his freends, he reſtored vnto king Richard the dowrie of his ſiſter quéene Ioane, and further offered vnto him to ioine in new alliance with him, offering his daughter in mariage vnto Arthur duke of Britaine, the kings nephue, with a great ſumme of monie for hir dowrie, if it ſo ſhould pleaſe him.

King Richard accepted the offer, and ſo ioined in peace and affinitie with the king of Sicile, receiuing of him twentie thouſand ounces of gold for the ſame mariage to be had, and an honorable dowrie aſſigned forth of the lands that belonged to the ſaid Arthur for the ſaid ladie to inioy during hir life, in caſe ſhe ſuruiued hir huſband. And if it ſo chanced, that by the death of either of them the mariage could not take place, then ſhould king Richard reſtore the ſame twentie thouſand ounces of gold againe. But beſide theſe twentie thouſand ounces of gold thus giuen by king Tancred for the mariage of his daughter, he gaue other twentie thouſand ounces to king Richard for an acquitance and quite claime of all manner of duties, rights, and demands, which either he or his ſiſter might pretend, either by reaſon of anie bequeſt, dowrie, or anie other manner of waie.

Here is to be noted, that before this concluſion of peace was had, king Richard prouided for his owne defenſe, in caſe that king Tancred and his people would haue attempted force againſt him, in ſomuch that he fortified certeine places, and built a ſtrong caſtell aloft vpon the top of an hill faſt by Meſſina, which caſtell he called Mategriffon. Alſo whereas the admirall of Sicile called Margaret, and one Iordane del Poine, men of great authoritie vnder king Tancred, fled out of Meſſina with all their families and riches, which they had either in gold or ſiluer, king Richard ſeized vpon their houſes, their gallies, and poſſeſſions, ſo that he made himſelfe as ſtrong as he could, to reſiſt all attempts that might be made againſt him by his enimies. But now to procéed.

The variance being thus appeaſed betwixt them, great diſcord chanced to ariſe betwixt king Richard and king Philip, who was much offended with king Richard, for that he had thus vſed violence againſt them of Meſſina, and compelled king Tancred to agrée with him for monie, to the great offenſe and breach of the lawes of Herberrough, ſith the Sicilians verie liberallie aided and furniſhed the chriſtians armie with vittels and neceſſarie prouiſions. The Frenchmen alſo had much enuie thereat, that ſhortlie after vpon a ſmall occaſion they picked a quarell againſt the Engliſhmen, and from words fell to ſtrokes on both ſides, ſo that there had béene much hurt & ſlaughter committed, if the two kings had not doone their beſt to appeaſe the fraie begun.

The lawes of Herberrough.

Engliſhmen and Frenchmen fought.

Diſcord in an armie the hinderer of all profitable enterpriſes.

But this buſineſſe though it was quietlie as then taken vp and ſtaied, yet bred it ſuch diſpleaſure betwixt the princes and their people, that it turned to the great hurt and hinderance of their good procéedings in their whole enterpriſe, ſo that the occaſion of a full and perfect victorie eaſilie ſlipped out of their hands, as you ſhall heare hereafter.

An other alſo of the chéefeſt cauſes of grudge betwixt the two kings was, for that king Richard in familiar talke confeſſed vnto king Philip, that he would marrie the king of Nauarres daughter, and cléerelie forſake his ſiſter Adela: which gréeued king Philip not a little, though he diſſembled the matter for a time, and rather alledged other cauſes of diſpleaſure, wherewith to defame king Richard to the world, as one that ſought his owne commoditie in ſpoiling thoſe whom he ought rather to haue defended. But to procéed.

Whileſt the Engliſh and French armies thus ſoiourned all the winter time in Sicile, notwithſtanding the troubles aforeſaid, to the hinderance of king Richards purpoſes, for the making of his prouiſions readie for his iournie, he yet cauſed engins to be framed, his ſhips to be newlie calked, rigged and repaired of ſuch hurts as they had receiued both in their long voiage which they had made, and alſo by certeine wormes, the which during the time of their lieng there, had in diuerſe places gnawne and eaten them through to the great danger of their loſſe, and vtter decaie. Moreouer at the ſame time he pardoned all wrecks by ſea through all his dominions, releaſing for euer all his right to the ſame, in ſuch wiſe that euerie perſon making wrecke by ſea, and comming aliue to land, ſhould haue all his goods frée and cleare to himſelfe. Furthermore he decréed, that if he chanced to periſh in the ſhip, then his ſons and daughters, brethren or ſiſters, that could proue themſelues to be next heires to him, ſhould haue the ſame goods; but if he had neither ſonne nor daughter, brother nor ſiſter, then ſhould the king haue thoſe goods by waie of his prerogatiue.

Wreckes pardoned.

This reſignation made by king Richard, was confirmed by his charter giuen at Meſſina in the moneth of October and ſecond yeare of his reigne. Alſo vpon a godlie repentance wherewith it did pleaſe the mercifull God to touch his hart, he called all thoſe prelates togither which were then with him at Meſſina into the chappell of Reginald de Moiac, & there in preſence of them all falling downe vpon his knées he confeſſed the filthie life which he had in lecherous luſt before that time led, and humblie receiued penance inioined him by the ſame biſhops, and ſo became a new man, fearing God, and delighting to liue after his lawes.

K. Richards confeſſion.

Furthermore hearing of the great fame of abbat Ioachim, he ſent for him ouer into Calabria, who came to Meſſina, and being aſked ſundrie queſtions by king Richard, he made woonderfull anſwer thereto: as in Houeden and other writers it may appéere, which for bréefeneſſe I paſſe ouer. About the ſame time he gaue vnto his nephue Otho, the ſonne of his ſiſter Maud, ſometime ducheſſe of Saxonie, the countie of Yorke. But although ſome were contented to receiue him as their lord, and to doo homage to him, yet other refuſed him, alledging that they would not renounce their fealties due to the king, till they might ſée him againe, & talke with him face to face. Wherevpon the king changing his purpoſe, gaue vnto the ſaid Otho the countie of Poictou in ſtéed of the ſaid countie of Yorke, as after ſhall appéere.

Abbat Ioachim.

The two kings of England and France held their Chriſtmaſſe this yeare at Meſſina, and ſtill the king of England vſed great liberalitie in beſtowing his treaſure fréelie amongſt knights and other men of warre, ſo that it was thought he ſpent more in a moneth than anie of his predeceſſours euer ſpent in a whole yeare. In the moneth of Februarie he ſent his gallies to Naples, there to receiue his mother and his wife that ſhould be, to wit the ladie Berengaria daughter to the king of Nauarre, and Philip earle of Flanders that came with them. But his mother quéene Elianor and the ladie Berengaria went to Brindize in Puglia, where they were honorablie receiued of Margaret king Tancreds admirall. Moreouer the earle of Flanders comming to Naples, and finding there the gallies of king Richard, went aboord the ſame, and ſo came to Meſſina, at the firſt following the king of England in all things, till the French king hauing enuie thereat, allured him awaie, and then he hoong altogither on his ſléeue. The firſt daie of March the king of England departed from Meſſina, to go to the citie of Cathina, there to common with king Tancred, who came thither to méet him.

The large expenſes of king Richard.

The earle of Flanders.

Here king Richard vnderſtood, that the French king had ſollicited king Tancred to ſet vpon the king of England and his armie, to chaſe them out of his realme: and for the more eaſie accompliſhment thereof, he had promiſed him his aid, whenſoeuer he would giue the aduenture. King Tancred deliuered alſo to king Richard ſuch letters as the French king had written to him concerning this matter. Wherevpon at his returne to Meſſina, king Richard ſhewed by his frowning countenance, that he was nothing pleaſed with the French king, but ſought occaſions to get him out of his companie.

K. Richard talketh with king Tancred.

The French king perceiuing it, required to vnderſtand the cauſe of this his ſudden mutation: wherevpon king Richard nothing fearing his power, declared the truth plainelie vnto him by the mouth of the earle of Flanders: and when the other denied the practiſe, he for proofe of the thing, ſhewed him the ſame letters which king Tancred had deliuered vnto him. The French king was not a little abaſhed hereat, and wiſt not well what to ſaie, nor what excuſe to make, the matter was ſo plaine. But yet at length he ſaid: ,, Well now I perceiue the king of England ſeeketh to haue ſome quarell whie he may refuſe to marrie with my ſiſter. For theſe are but forged matters, and no truth reſteth in them.

When the king of England vnderſtood this maner of anſwer, he replied in this wiſe; That as for the French kings ſiſter, he might not marrie, for as much as he was able to produce good witneſſe to proue that his father had lien with hir and got a child of hir. And as for his priuie procéeding and practiſe with Tancred, he néeded no further teſtimonie than his owne hand and his ſeale, the partie himſelfe being preſent who receiued them, the meſſenger alſo being not far off that carried them betwéene both the parties.

When the French king was throughlie informed of the firſt point, through counſell of the earle of Flanders and others, he pacified himſelfe, and was contented to releaſe the king of England of his faith giuen by oth for the contract made with his ſiſter Alice: in conſideration of which releaſement and deliuerance, the king of England couenanted to giue yearelie to the French king two thouſand marks of ſtarling coine for the terme of fiue yeares togither: and at his returne home, it was agreed, that he ſhuld alſo deliuer vnto the French king his ſiſter the ſaid ladie Alice, with the towne of Giſors, and all other things which the French king had granted to him with his ſaid ſiſter. On the other part, the French king granted, that the dutchie of Britaine ſhould apperteine to the dominion of the dutchie of Normandie, ſo as the duke of Britaine ſhould be accompted the liege man of the duke of Normandie, and that the duke of Normandie ſhould anſwer the French king for both the dutchies, as well of Britaine as Normandie. Theſe agréements were ratified and confirmed with ſolemne oths receiued, and charters giuen vnder their hands and ſeales, vpon the 30. of March.

The French king ſetteth forth from Meſſina towards the holie land.

About this time the French king (now that the ſeaſon of the yeare was come) ſet forward toward the holie land, leauing king Richard behind him in Sicile: and the two and twentith day after his ſetting forth from Meſſina, he arriued at the ſiege of Acres or Acon. The ſame day alſo that the French king departed from Meſſina, quéene Elianor the mother of king Richard arriued there, bringing with hir the ladie Berengaria the daughter of Sanctius the king of Nauarre, and the fourth day after quéene Elianor tooke leaue of hir ſonne king Richard, and departed homeward towards England, taking hir iournie by Rome about the buſineſſe of Geffrey the elect of Yorke, as to intreat the pope that he would confirme and conſecrate him archbiſhop, or to authoriſe ſome other to doo it in his name. The ladie Berengaria remained behind with the kings ſiſter Ioane quéene of Sicile.

Quéene Elianor returneth by Rome.

After this in the moneth of Aprill, on the wedneſday in the paſſion weeke, king Richard (after he had finiſhed and made an end of all concluſions with king Tancred) did alſo ſet forward with his ſiſter Ioane, who tooke with hir the ladie Berengaria daughter to the king of Nauarre, affianced to him long before, as aboue is partlie mentioned. His nauie conſiſted in thirteene mightie great ſhips with triple ſailes, an hundred carikes or rather hulkes, and fiftie gallies. He was no ſooner abroad in the maine ſea, but a great tempeſt aroſe, wherewith his whole nauie was ſore toſſed and turmoiled vp and downe the ſeas, and at length driuen on the coaſt of Cypres, where ſéeking to take harbour, & to come on land, the Cypriots would not ſuffer him, but ſhewed countenance to driue him backe, and to reſiſt his landing. Alſo whereas ſix of his ſhips were ſo driuen by force of tempeſt from the reſidue, that thrée of them periſhed, and thrée being caſt vpon the ſhoare of Cypres before the kings arriuall there, the ſouldiers and other people in the ſame were compelled to come on land for ſauing their liues, where otherwiſe they ſtood in danger of drowning, the people of the Ile aſſailing them in right cruell ſort, ſlue diuerſe, and tooke the reſidue priſoners, and ſo deteined them for a certeine ſeaſon.

Matth. Paris. 150. ſhips and 53. galies ſaith Rog. Houed.

King Richard then vnderſtanding this iniurie to him doone by the Cypriots, & perceiuing they would reſiſt his landing, prepared himſelfe and his people to enter vpon them by force. The king of Cypres Iſakius or Curſach (whome Houeden nameth emperour of Cypres) had aſſembled the moſt part of all the power of men that he might make (though few of them were armed, or had any great ſkill in feats of warre) and cauſed them to ſet boords, logs of wood, benches, formes, and great cheſts afore them, as a defenſe, and as it were in ſteed of a wall, that by ſuccour thereof they might the better kéepe off their enimie from landing.

But K. Richard ſo incouraged his men by his preſence, & hartened them with ſuch comfortable words as he vttered vnto them, that rowing to the ſhoare with their galies and ſmall botes, hauing the archers afore them, they eaſilie got to land, droue their enimies backe, and ſo farre purſued them (being but footmen, weatherbeaten, wearie, and weat) as conuenientlie they might, for the ſhortnes of time. King Richard hauing thus got foot on land, approched the towne of Limezun, which he with his ſouldiers entred, and finding it emptie of people (which were fled awaie) but full of riches and great plentie of victuals, as corne, wine, oile, and fleſh, he ſeized thervpon.

The Engliſhmen take land & chaſe their enimies.

The ſame day alſo the kings ſiſters and the ladie Berengaria with the reſidue of the kings nauie entred the hauen of Limezun. In the meane time the king of Cypres (hauing eſcaped from the battell) got togither his men which were fled and diſperſed ſundrie waies, and incamped within ſix miles of king Richard, threatning that the next day he would effſoones giue battell: which when king Richard vnderſtood, he cauſed his people to be armed the next morning long before day, and ſo comming by guides vnto the place where the Cypriots with their king were lodged, ſuddenlie they aſſailed them yer they had anie warning of his marching towards them, by reaſon whereof they were ſlaine like beaſts in great numbers. Howbeit, their king and a few other eſcaped and fled away naked, hauing no time to put on their apparell, his treaſure, horſſe, armour and ſtandard were taken, which ſtandard king Richard ſtraitwaies determined to ſend vnto ſaint Edmunds ſhrine, and ſo did.

King Richard with a camiſado vanquiſheth the Cypriots, & chaſeth them out of their campe. Iohn Textor.

Hauing thus vanquiſhed his aduerſaries, he came backe to Limezun: and the third day after, Guie king of Ieruſalem and his brother Geffrey de Lucignan with the prince of Antioch Raimond and his ſonne named alſo Raimond earle of Tripoli, with other noble men, arriued at Limezun aforeſaid, to viſit king Richard, and to offer him their ſeruices, and ſo became his men, in ſwearing fealtie to him againſt all other perſons whatſoeuer.

The K. of Ieruſalem and other noble men doo fealtie vnto king Richard.

The ſame day the king of Cypres perceiuing himſelfe vnable to reſiſt the great puiſſance of king Richards armie, ſent ambaſſadours, and offered to king Richard the ſumme of twentie thouſand marks of gold, in recompenſe of the monie which his men that were drowned had about them, and alſo to reſtore thoſe to libertie which he had taken priſoners, and to make deliuerie to their hands of all their goods. Furthermore, he offered to go with him into the holie land perſonallie, and to ſerue him with an hundred knights, 400 light horſſemen, and 500 well armed footmen, & alſo to deliuer to king Richard his daughter and heire in hoſtage, and to acknowledge him his ſouereigne lord, by ſwearing to him fealtie for his kingdome, as for that which he ſhould confeſſe to hold of him.

King Richard accepted theſe offers, and ſo the king of Cypres came in and ſware fealtie to king Richard, in preſence of the king of Ieruſalem, the prince of Antioch, and other barons, and promiſed vpon his oth then receiued, not to depart till all things couenanted on his part were performed. Then king Richard aſſigned tents for him and his to lodge in, and appointed certeine knights and other men of warre to haue the cuſtodie of him. But the ſame day after dinner vpon repentance of that which he had doone, he deceiued his keepers and ſtale awaie, ſending knowledge backe to the king that he would not ſtand to the couenants, which were concluded vpon betwixt them.

King Richard ſeemed to like the matter well inough, and forthwith deliuered a part of his armie vnto the king of Ieruſalem and to the prince of Antioch, appointing them to purſue the king of Cypres by land, whileſt he with one part of his gallies and Robert de Turneham with the other might ſearch about the coaſt by ſea, to prohibit his paſſage by water. In euerie place where they came, ſuch ſhips and gallies as they found they ſeized into their hands, and no reſiſtance was made againſt them, by reaſon the people fled to the woods and mountains, leauing the cities, townes and caſtels void in all ſteeds, where the king or the ſaid ſir Robert de Turneham with their veſſels began to appeere. When they had taken their pleaſure thus alongſt the coaſts, they returned againe vnto Limezun. The king of Ieruſalem and the other that went forth by land, when they could not ſpeed of their purpoſe, returned alſo, in which meane time a great number of Cypriots came in, and ſubmitting themſelues to king Richard, were receiued as his ſubiects.

Robert de Turneham.

The king of England marieth the ladie Berengaria. She is crowned queene.

On the 12. daie of Maie, the ladie Berengaria daughter to the king of Nauarre was maried according to a precontract vnto king Richard at Limezun aforeſaid in the Ile of Cypres, one of the kings chaplins executing the order of the marriage. The ſame daie alſo ſhe was crowned by the biſhop of Eureux, the archbiſhops of Apamea and Aux, with the biſhop of Baion miniſtring vnto him. After the ſolemnitie of this marriage and coronation ended, king Richard ſet forward with his armie into the countrie of Cypres, and firſt wan (by ſurrender) the citie of Nichoſia, and after the ſtrong caſtell of Cherin, within the which was the daughter of the king of Cypres, which ladie humblie yeelded hir ſelfe vnto K. Richard, who (counting it reproch to be extreame with ſuch as ſubmit themſelues, and ſpeciallie the female ſex, according to the old ſaieng, Parcere ſubiectis nobilis ſcit ira leonis)

had pitie of hir caſe, and ſent hir to his wife the new queene, willing that ſhe might be honorablie vſed. From thence paſſing forward, theſe caſtels were deliuered into his hands, Baffes and Buffeuent, Den, Amur, Candace, and afterwards all the other caſtels and cities, townes and places of ſtrength within that Ile one after an other. Finallie, hearing that the king of Cypres was incloſed in an abbeie called Cap S. Andrew, he marched thitherwards: but when the king of Cypres heard of his approch, he came forth and ſubmitted himſelfe wholie into his hands. The king firſt appointed him to the keeping of his chamberlaine Rafe Fitz Geffrey, and after ſent him vnto the citie of Tripoli, there to be kept in cloſe priſon. Who when he heard he ſhould be committed to cloſe priſon, and remaine in fetters, ſaid, that if he laie in irons, he ſhould ſhortlie end his life. Whereunto king Richard when he heard of it, anſwered: He ſaith well, and therefore bicauſe he is a noble man, and our mind is not to haue him dead, but onelie to be kept ſafe from ſtarting anie more awaie, and dooing new hurt, let him be chained in giues and fetters made of ſiluer, and ſo he was.

But to proceed. After the king had ſet the countrie of Cypres in good ſtaie, he deliuered the keeping thereof vnto Richard de Camuille and Robert de Turneham. This doone, vpon the wedneſdaie in the Whitſunweeke he tooke the ſea againe, and paſſed ouer to the citie of Acres, which as then was beſieged by the chriſtian armie, as ye may read in the deſcription of the holie land, onelie giuing you to vnderſtand, that ſuch was the valiancie of king Richard ſhewed in manfull conſtreining of the citie, that his praiſe was greatlie bruted both amongſt the chriſtians and alſo the Saracens.

He arriued there on the ſaturdaie in Whitſunweeke, being the ſaturdaie alſo next before the feaſt of S. Barnabie.

Galfridus Vinſant.

Howbeit the ſecret enimitie betwixt him and the French king eftſoones reuiued, by occaſion of ſuch diſcord as chanced betwixt Guido king of Ieruſalem, and Conrade the marques of Tire, ſo that parties were taken, and whereas both the Piſans and Geneuois did offer their ſeruice vnto king Richard, yet bicauſe the Geneuois were confederat with the French king, who tooke part with the marques, he refuſed them, and receiued the Piſans, ioining himſelfe with king Guido to ſupport him againſt his enimies.

Piſans and Geneuois.

Here is to be remembred, that before king Richard arriued at the ſiege, he incountred on the ſea a mightie great ſhip called a Drommond, which one Saphaldine the brother of Saladine a prince of the Saracens had ſent, to refreſh them with vittels. This ſhip king Richard cauſed feercelie to be aſſailed with his gallies, and at length bowged hir with all the vittels and prouiſion within the ſame, as wildfire, barels of firie ſerpents, armour and weapons of ſundrie ſorts, beſides all the mariners and men of warre, except ſuch as were taken to mercie and ſaued aliue, being about 200 in the whole, whereas there were aboord the ſame ſhip 500 men of warre, as ſome write, though other haue but 800.

¶ But now to other accidents that chanced this yere. On Midſummer eeue there was ſuch an eclipſe of the ſunne, the moone being the ſame time 27. daies old, that for the ſpace of three houres (for ſo long it laſted) ſuch darkneſſe came ouer the face of the earth, that euen in the daie time (for this eclipſe began about nine of the clocke in the morning) the ſtars appeared plainelie in the element.

The ſeuenth houre of the daie ſaith Matth. Paris.

In the ſame moneth of Iune, Richard de Camville, whome the king had left (as ye haue heard) gouernour in Cypres, chanced to fall ſicke, and comming without licence to the ſiege of Acres, there died. After whoſe death the Cypriots and thoſe called Griffones and Ermians reuolted from the Engliſh obedience, and choſe to them a king, one that was a monke of the familie of Iſachus their former king: but Robert de Turneham, who after the deceaſſe of Richard Camuille remained ſole gouernour of the Ile, gathered a power of men togither, and giuing battell to the new king (whom Houeden nameth alſo emperour) vanquiſhed him with his complices, tooke him priſoner, and hanged him on a paire of gallowes. The ſame moneth alſo died Rafe Fitz Geffrey, who had the other king Iſac in cuſtodie, and then king Richard deliuered him to the knights of the hoſpitall, who ſent him to the caſtell of Margant, there ſafelie to be kept as priſoner to the vſe of the king of England.

Richard de Camuille deceaſſeth.

Now will we returne vnto the affaires of England land and make ſome mention of the dooings there. Yee ſhall vnderſtand, that after king Richard was ſet forward on his iournie, William Longchampe lord chancellour and biſhop of Elie, appointed (as ye haue heard) gouernour of the realme, began to exerciſe his authoritie to the vttermoſt, taking vpon him the ſtate of a prince, rather than of a ſubiect. He had of late (as before ye haue heard) procured ſuch fauor at the hands of pope Clement, that he was inſtituted by him legat of the apoſtolike ſee here in England, ſo that pretending a rule both ouer the clergie and temporaltie, and by reaſon that he had both the authoritie of pope and king in his hands, he vſed the ſame to his moſt aduantage, as well in cauſes eccleſiaſticall as temporall, whereby he wrought manie oppreſſions both againſt them of the clergie and temporaltie. He mainteined ſuch a port and countenance in his dooings, that he would ride with a thouſand horſſes, by meanes whereof when he came to lie at abbeis and other places (bringing with him ſuch a traine) he was verie burdenous vnto them, ſpeciallie when he laie at their houſes any ſpace of time.

This man called a conuocation at Weſtminſter, wherein at the ſuit of Hugh Nouant biſhop of Cheſter, it was decreed, that the moonks of Couentrie ſhould be diſplaced, and ſecular canons brought into that houſe to ſupplie their roomes. Which was doone by the authoritie of the ſaid lord chancellour, being bribed by the foreſaid biſhop of Cheſter (as ſome writers haue recorded) for diſpleaſure which he bare to the moonks, by reaſon of a fraie which they had made vpon the ſaid biſhop in their church at Couentrie, and drawne blood of him before the altar there, as he alledged.

But ſome haue written, that the biſhop of Cheſter procured a licence of the pope, to alter the ſtate of that church in ſort aboue mentioned, which is moſt likelie, ſurmiſing againſt the moonks, that they were moſt manifeſt and ſtubborne diſturbers of that peace and quietneſſe which ought to remaine amongſt churchmen: and yet he himſelfe ſowed the ſtrife and diſſention amongſt them, and namelie betweene the prior and his couent. Moreouer, the ſaid lord chancellour depriued ſuch rulers of their adminiſtrations and gouernements, as the king had appointed to beare any high authoritie within the realme, pretending not onelie the kings commandement, but alſo alleadging a reaſon which mooued him ſo to doo, as thus, that he might thereby take awaie all occaſions of grudges from the people, which otherwiſe might thinke, and would not ſticke to ſaie, that they were oppreſſed by the rule of manie kings in ſteed of one king. He did alſo depriue Hugh the biſhop of Durham of all his honour and dignitie, and put the biſhop of Wincheſter to great trouble. Moreouer, doubting leaſt the Nobles of the realme would riſe againſt him, and put him out of his place; he ſought to keepe them lowe, and ſpoiled them of their monie and ſubſtance. Likewiſe pretending a colour of doubt, leaſt earle Iohn the kings brother ſhould attempt any thing againſt his brother the king now in his abſence, he ſought alſo to keepe him vnder. To be breefe, he plaied in all points the right part of a tyrant, and ſhewed himſelfe ſuch a one in all reſpects as mainteined his title,

At length the king receiued aduertiſement from his mother queene Elianor of his demeanor, and that there was great likelihood of ſome commotion to inſue, if ſpeedie remedie were not in time prouided. Wherevpon being then in Sicile, he ſent Walter the archbiſhop of Rouen into England with commiſſion, to ioine in adminiſtration of the kingdome with his chancellor the ſaid biſhop of Elie. But the archbiſhop comming into England was ſo ſlenderlie interteined of the chancellour, and in effect ſo litle regarded, that notwithſtanding his commiſſion and inſtructions brought from the king, he could not be permitted to beare any rule. But the chancellour deteining the ſame wholie in his hands, ordered all things at his pleaſure, without making the arch-biſh. of Rouen, or any other of counſell with him, except ſuch as it pleaſed him to admit for the ſeruing of his owne turne.

Walter the archbiſhop of Rouen ſent into England

He is little regarded of the lord chancellor.

¶ He certeinlie beleeued (as manie other did) that king Richard would neuer returne with life into England againe, which cauſed him to attempt ſo manie vnlawfull enterpriſes, and therefore he got into his hands all the caſtels and fortreſſes belonging to the crowne, and furniſhed them with gariſons of ſouldiers, as he thought neceſſarie, depriuing ſuch capteins of their roomes as he ſuſpected not to fauour his proceedings.

One Gerard de Camuille had bought of the king the keeping of the caſtell of Lincolne, vnto whom alſo the ſhiriffewike of the ſhire was committed for a time, but the lord chancellour, perceiuing that he bare more good will vnto earle Iohn the kings brother than to him (which Iohn he moſt ſuſpected) he tooke from him the ſhiriffewike, & demanded alſo to haue the caſtell of Lincolne deliuered into his hands, which Gerard refuſed to deliuer, and perceiuing that the chancellor would practiſe to haue it by force, he fled vnto earle Iohn, requiring him of competent aid and ſuccour.

The chancellor on the other part, perceiuing what hatred diuerſe of the Nobles bare him, thought good to prouide for his owne ſuertie the beſt that he could, and therefore ſent for a power of men from beyond the ſea: but bicauſe he thought it too long to ſtaie till they arriued, he came to Lincolne with ſuch power as he could make, and beſieged the caſtell. Erle Iohn the kings brother aduertiſed hereof, raiſed ſuch numbers of men as he might make of his freends, ſeruants and tenants, and with ſmall a doo wan the caſtels of Notingham and Tickhill within two daies ſpace. This doone, he ſent to the lord chancellour, commanding him either to breake vp his ſiege, or elſe to prepare for battell. The chancellour conſidering with himſelfe that there was ſmall truſt to be put in diuerſe of thoſe lords that were with him, bearing good will to earle Iohn, and but hollow harts towards him, raiſed his ſiege and departed with diſhonour.

The lord chancellor beſiegeth the caſtell of Lincolne.

Earle Iohn winneth the caſtels of Notingham and Tickhill.

Not long after, one of his hornes was broken off by the death of pope Clement, whereby his power legantine ceaſed: wherewith being ſomewhat abaſhed, he came to a communication with earle Iohn, and vpon certeine conditions made peace with him. Shortlie after the ſouldiers which he had ſent for, arriued in England, and then he began to go from the agreement made with earle Iohn, affirming that he would either driue the ſame earle out of England, or elſe ſhould earle Iohn doo the like to him: for it was not of ſufficient largeneſſe to hold them both. Howbeit ſhortlie after, a peace was effſoones concluded betwixt them with condition, that if it chanced king Richard to depart this life before his returne into England, not leauing any iſſue of his bodie begotten, that then the chancellour renouncing the ordinance made by king Richard (who had inſtituted his nephue Arthur duke of Britaine to be his heire and ſucceſſour) ſhould conſent to admit earle Iohn for king of England, contrarie to the ſaid ordinance.

The chancellor raiſeth his ſiege with diſhonor.

The lord chancellor and earle Iohn are agreed.

The chancellor breaketh the agreement.

The lord chencellor and earle Iohn make another agreement.

But in the meane time it was agreed, that earle

John ſhould deliuer vp the caſtels of Notingham and Tickhill, Notingham to the hands of William Marſhall, and Tickhill to the hands of William Wendenall, they to kéepe the ſame vnto the vſe and behoofe of king Richard, that vpon his returne he might doo with them as ſhould pleaſe him: prouided that if it ſo chanced, that he ſhould die before he could returne from his voiage, or that the chancellour went from the agréement now taken, then immediatlie ſhould the foreſaid caſtels of Notingham and Tickhill be reſtored vnto earle John.

Moreouer, the other caſtels of ſuch honours as were aſſigned to earle John by the king his brother, were committed vnto the cuſtodie of certeine perſons of great truſt and loialtie, as the caſtell of Wallingford to the archbiſhop of Rouen, the caſtell of Briſtow to the biſhop of Lincolne, the caſtell of the Peake to the biſhop of Couentrie, the caſtell of Boleſofres vnto Richard de Peake (or if he refuſed, then ſhould the biſhop of Couentrie haue it in keeping) the caſtell of Eie was committed to Walter Fitz Robert, the caſtell of Herford to Roger Bigot, and to Richard Reuell the caſtell of Exceſter and Launſton. Theſe perſons to whom theſe caſtels were thus committed to be kept, receiued alſo an oth, that they ſhould faithfullie kéepe them to the kings behoofe, and if he chanced to die, before he ſhould returne, then the ſame ſhould be deliuered vnto earle Johns hands. Alſo there were thrée caſtels that perteined to the crowne, deliuered likewiſe in truſt, as the caſtell of Windſor vnto the earle of Arundell, the caſtell of Wincheſter vnto Gilbert de Lacie, and the caſtell of Northampton vnto Simon de Pateſhull.

Caſtels deliuered in truſt to the keeping of certeine perſons.

It was alſo agréed, that biſhops, abbats, earles, and barons, valuaſors, and fréeholders ſhould not be diſſeized of their lands, goods or cattels, otherwiſe than by order of the iuſtices or officers of the king, ſo that they ſhould be iudged in the kings courts according to the lawfull cuſtomes and ordinances of the realme: and likewiſe that earle John ſhould cauſe the ſame orders to be obſerued through all his lands. Prouided that if any man attempted to doo otherwiſe vpon ſupport or maintenance of earle John, he ſhould ſtand to be reformed by the archbiſhop of Rouen if he chanced then to be in England, and by the kings iuſtices, and by thoſe that had ſworne to obſerue this peace: and alſo earle John himſelfe at their requeſt ſhould ſée ſuch reformation to be had.

Moreouer, it was agréed that all thoſe caſtels that had bin built or begun to be builded ſince the kings paſſage ouer towards his iournie, ſhould be razed, and no new made or fortified till his returne, except in manours perteining to the kings demaine, if néed required, or by his ſpeciall commandement, either by letters, or ſufficient meſſengerrs. That the ſhiriffewike of Lincolne, which the lord chancellour had aſſigned vnto William de Stuteuille ſhould be reſtored to Gerard de Camuille, who had a daie appointed him to appéere in the kings court, to heare what might be laid againſt him: and if ſuch matter could be prooued, for the which he ought to looſe the ſaid ſhiriffewike and the caſtell of Lincolne, then he ſhould depart from them by the iudgement of the court, or elſe not. Neither ſhould earle John mainteine him againſt the iudgement of that court, nor ſhould receiue any outlawes, or ſuch as were notoriouſlie knowen for enimies to the king, and ſo named, nor ſhould ſuffer them to be receiued within the precinct of his liberties.

To hold, mainteine and obſerue this peace, the ſaid earle and chancellour ſware in the hand of the archbiſhop of Rouen with ſeuen barons on either part. On the part of earle John theſe were the names of them that receiued the oth: Stephan Ridell his chancellour; William de la Mare, Robert de la Mare, Philip de Turecheſter, William de Kahennes, Gilbert Baſſet & William de Montacute. On the chancellours part, the earles of Arundell and Saliſburie, earle Roger Bigot, and the earle of Clare, with Walter Fitz Robert, William de Breuſe, and Roger Fitz Ramfrey. Theſe things were concluded in this ſort, the authoritie and commandement of the king yet in all things ſaued and reſerued: but ſo, that if before his returne he ſhould ſignifie his pleaſure to the contrarie of the ordinances aboue mentioned, then ſhould the caſtels of Notingham and Tickhill be reſtored vnto earle John, notwithſtanding what ſoeuer the king ſhould command touching the ſame. Thus was the peace concluded eftſoones betwixt earle John and the chancellour.

Geffrey the archbiſhop of Yorke.
Rog. Houed.

In this meane while, Geffrey the elect archbiſhop of Yorke, after long ſuit and manie delaies contriued, ſpeciallie by the chancellour, obteined his pall, being conſecrated by the archbiſhop of Tours, by vertue of his buls obteined from pope Celeſtine. The chancellour aduertiſed herof, and vnderſtanding that he meant to come ſhortlie into England to be inſtalled, was in a great chafe, bicauſe that during the time of the vacation, he had vſed the reuenues of that ſée at his pleaſure, and therefore now to forgo them he was nothing contented. Herevpon he wrote his letters vnto Matthew de Clere ſhiriffe of Kent in this forme.

Matth. Paris.

The lord chancellours letters to the ſhiriffe of Kent.

PRæcipimus tibi quòd ſi Eboracen. electus ad aliquem portum in balliua tua applicuerit, aut aliquis nunciorum eius, eum retineri facias, donec mandatum noſtrum indè receperis. Et ſimiliter præcipimus, quòd omnes literas papæ aut magni alicuius viri quæ illic venerint, facias retineri. The Engliſh whereof is thus.

We command you that if the elect of Yorke ſhall arriue at any port or hauen within your bailiwicke, or any meſſenger of his, that you cauſe them to be areſted and kept, till you haue commandement from vs therein. And we command you likewiſe, to ſtay, attach, and keepe all letters that come from the pope, or any other great man.

The death of the archbiſhop of Canturburie.
Io. Textor.

Likewiſe, whereas Baldwine archbiſhop of Canturburie, hauing taken his iournie into the holie land, and arriuing there before the king, chanced to depart this life at Tyrus, the laſt yéere, vpon the feaſt daie of S. Edmund, the chancellour found meanes to kéepe that ſée alſo vacant, that he might receiue the profits thereof, during the vacation, and find meanes to be prepared to it in the end. But as touching the ſée of Yorke, although he had (as before is ſaid) made his hand of the reuenues belonging to the ſame from time to time at his pleaſure, yet now after that he heard how Geffrey had receiued the pall, he made hauocke, waſting & ſpoiling all that would yéeld him anie monie, without reſpect of right or wrong. Moreouer, he cauſed the hauens to be watched, with commandement giuen to the townes on the ſea coaſt, that they ſhould not ſuffer the archbiſhop Geffrey to take land. At length yet he arriued at Douer, where he was by the foreſaid Matthew de Clere firſt ſtaied, and after taken out of the abbeie by the chancellours commandement, and committed to priſon within the caſtell, where a Noble man that had maried the chancellors ſiſter was capteine.

The newes of whoſe impriſonment was anon bruted thorough the realme, wherewith the Nobles fretted, and the commons curſſed: finallie all men deteſted ſuch tyrannie in the chancellour. But namelie the kings brother earle John ſtormed at the matter, and with all ſpéed aſſembled an armie out of thoſe places where he bare rule, increaſing the number with a power of Welſhmen. There came to him the biſhop of Wincheſter, with manie earles and barons, alſo the biſhop of Bath and Cheſter, which latelie before had béene chéefe fauourers of the chancellour in all his dooings: but now that the world was changed, they ſhewed themſelues the moſt earneſt enimies he had, as well in words as déeds.

In an aſſemblie of all the biſhops of England, all thoſe were excommunicate in ſolemne wiſe, with candels light, and other ſuch ceremonies, which had either giuen commandement, or were preſent as partakers, to pull out of the church the archbiſhop of Yorke, or his people by violence, and had impriſoned them in maner (as before yée haue heard:) but this was after the archbiſhop was ſet at libertie, as ſhuld appeare by Matthew Paris, for the chancellour repenting himſelfe (though now too late) of his cruell dealing againſt the archbiſhop of Yorke, wherewith he had kindled ſuch a brand againſt him, commanded the ſaid archbiſhop (namelie at the inſtant ſute of the biſhop of London, or rather at the commandement of earle John, as Houeden ſaith) to be ſet at libertie. But the diſpleaſure once kindled in the hearts of the Nobles, could not ſo eaſilie be quenched with his deliuerie, as it was ſpéedilie ſet on fire by his impriſonment, ſo that they being now in armour, purpoſed to abate the pride of the chancellour, and to deliuer the common-wealth of ſuch an vglie tyrant. And to begin, they ſummoned and aſſigned him a peremptorie day to appeare at Reading, to make anſwer vnto ſuch iniuries as he had doone againſt the archbiſhop of Yorke, and the biſhop of Durham, ſithens the departure of his ſoucreigne lord the king.

R.Houed.
The chancellour ſummoned to appeare

At which day there came to Reading earle John, and the archbiſhop of Rouen, with manie other biſhops, earles, and barons, abiding there all that day, to ſée if the chancellour would appeare or no; but he came not: wherevpon they prepared to march forth towards London, and therewithall ſet forward in like maner. He on the other ſide being a man of a great courage, had gathered an armie of ſuch ſtrangers and other his fréends as he could make, and therewith went forth, and encamped néere to Windſor, there to abide his aduerſaries, and to giue them battell, if they came forward and would abide it. But when they approched, and he perceiued alſo how diuerſe of his fréends ſhranke from him, and went to his enimies, he durſt not attempt the hazard of a field, but fled backe to London, and there withdrew into the tower, with all his hoſt, bicauſe he durſt not commit himſelfe to the doubtfull fellowſhip of the citizens. Through his great pride and ſtatelie port which he mainteined, as partlie yée haue heard, he had procured to himſelfe no ſmall hatred amongſt all degrées of men, and namelie ſuch as by the kings appointment ought to haue béeneparteners with him in gouernement of the realme ſore repined at his preſumptuous procéedings, for that he diſdained (as it ſéemed) to vſe their aduiſe, or to ioine them with him in the adminiſtration of things, ſo that now in time of his trouble he wiſt not in whome he might put his truſt.

The chancellour retireth to London.

After he was thus retired into the tower of London, earle John the archbiſhop of Rouen, and the other biſhops, earles, and barons aſſociated togither againſt him, followed him at the héeles, entered the citie, and beſieged the tower on ech ſide. On the morrow after, being the fourth day after the octaues of ſaint Michaell, they came togither into Paules churchyard, where they publikelie declared the iniurious wrongs doone and practiſed by the chancellour; namelie againſt the archbiſhop of Yorke, and the biſhop of Durham. Thoſe alſo that had béene appointed as aſſociats with him, accuſed him, in that he had taken vpon him to rule and gouerne all things after his owne will, not vouchſafing to haue their aduiſe or councell in ſuch ſort as had béene conuenient.

A declaration made againſt the lord chancellour.

The archbiſhop of Rouen and William Marſhall earle of Pembroke ſhewed there before all the people the kings letters which he had ſent from Meſſina, appointing that they ſhould be aſſociats with him in gouernment of the kingdome; and that without the counſell and aduice of them and others aſſigned therto, he ſhould not meddle with the rule of the land, and that if he ſhould doo any thing to the hinderance of the common-wealth, or ſéeke to meddle with the affaires of the realme, without their good aduiſe, that then he ſhould be depoſed. Hérevpon it ſéemed good to earle John, and to all the biſhops, earles and barons of the realme, and to the citizens of London there aſſembled, that the ſaid chancellour ſhould be depoſed, and ſo they procéeded, and depoſed him indéed, appointing the archbiſhop of Rouen in his place, who would not take vpon him to doo anie thing touching the rule of the land, without conſent of his aſſociats aſſigned to him, and the barons of the eſchecker.

The tenor of this leter ſhall héereafter appeare.

The ſame day, earle John, and the archbiſhop of Rouen, and other of the kings iuſtices, granted to the citizens of London the priuilege of their communaltie; and the ſaid earle and archbiſhop, and in maner all the biſhops, erls and barons of the realme ſware to mainteine the ſaid priuilege firme and ſtable, ſo long as ſhould pleaſe their ſoueraigne lord. And the citizens of London ſware to be true, and to doo their faithfull ſeruice vnto king Richard and his heirs, and if he chanced to die without iſſue, then to receiue earle John the brother of king Richard for their king and ſoueraigne lord, and therevpon ſware fealtie to him againſt all men, ſauing that which they owed vnto his brother king Richard.

The citizens of London.

The chancellour perceiuing the multitude to be ſuch which he had with him in the tower, as the place was not able to hold them any long time, after he had remained within it one night, he came forth vnto earle John, and to the other that were thus entred the citie, and now readie to beſiege him, of whome he got licence for them that were incloſed within the tower, to depart without damage, and therewith deliuered vp the tower vnto the hands of the archbiſhop of Rouen, with the caſtell of Windſor, and certeine other caſtels, which he held within the realme, but not all: notwithſtanding he couenanted to make deliuerie of the reſidue, which yet remained in the hands of them whome he had appointed to the kéeping of the ſame. And for aſſurance of that couenant to be performed before he departed the realme, he deliuered his brethren, and one that was his chamberleine, to remaine with the lords as hoſtages.

The chancellour yéeldeth vp the tower.

This doone, he haſted to Canturburie, where he promiſed to receiue the croſſe of a pilgrime to go into the holie land, and to render vp the croſſe of his legatſhip, which he had vſurped a yeare and a halfe after the death of pope Clement, to the preiudice of the church of Rome, and to the detriment and great hinderance of the Engliſh church. For there was not any church within the realme, which had not béene put to fine and ranſome by that croſſe, nor any eccleſiaſticall perſon went frée, but the print of the croſſe appeared in him and his purſe. From Canturburie he got him to Douer to his brother in law, and finallie ſéeking means to paſſe ouer into France, and doubting to be diſcouered, he apparelled himſelfe in womans raiment, & got a web of cloth on his arme, as though he had béene ſome houſewifelie woman of the countrie: but by the vntowardlie folding and vncunning handling of his cloth (or rather by a lewd fiſherman that tooke him for an harlot) he was ſuſpected and ſearched ſo narrowlie, that by his priuie members he was prooued to be a man, and at length knowne, attached, and committed to priſon, after he had béene reprochfullie handled by them that found him, and by the wiues of the towne, in ſuch vnſéemelie apparell.

Earle Iohn not þ biſhops fréend.

Earle Iohn would haue had him puniſhed, and put to ſome open reproofe for his paſſed tyrannicall dooings; but the biſhops, and other of the barons, for reuerence of his order, procured his deliuerance, with licence to paſſe ouer into Normandie where he was borne. Thus was the biſhop of Elie a man full of pride and couetouſneſſe ouerthrowne with ſhame, and receiued for his hie climing a reprochfull downefall: for none are more ſubiect to ruine and rebuke, than ſuch as be aloft and ſupereminent ouer others, as the poet noteth well, ſaieng:

Matth.Paris.

In time he was depoſed from his office of being chancellour, and not without warrant, for in verie déed, king Richard hauing receiued aduertiſements from the lords and péeres of the realme, of the chancellours preſumptuous and hautie demeanour, with wrongs offered to diuerſe perſons, wrote to them againe as followeth.

A letter of king Richard directed to the States of the land for the depoſing of the biſhop of Elie from his office of lord chancellour.

Richard king of England ſendeth greeting to William Marſhall, to Gilbert Fitz Peter, and Henrie Berdulfe, and to William Brewer, peeres. If it ſo chance that our chancellour hath not faithfullie handled the affaires and buſineſſe of our realme (committed vnto him) by the aduiſe and counſell of you, and others to whom we haue alſo aſsigned the charge of gouernement of the ſame realme: we command you, that according to your diſpoſition in all things to be doone concerning the gouernement thereof, you order and diſpoſe as well for eſchetes, as all other things, &c.

The biſhop of Elie complaineth of his wrongs receiued.

The popes letters vnto the archbiſhop and biſhops of England.

By force of this commiſſion, the lords were the bolder to procéed againſt him as ye haue heard. Now after his comming into the parties beyond the ſeas, he ceaſſed not with letters and meſſengers to preſent his complaint to the pope of Rome, and to king Richard of the iniuries receiued at the hands of earle Iohn and his complices. Herevpon pope Celeſtine wrote in déed to all the archbiſhops and biſhops that were within the realme of England, in behalfe of the ſaid biſhop of Elie, declaring, that forſomuch as the king of England was gone into the holie land to warre againſt the enimies of our faith, leauing his kingdome vnder the protection of the apoſtolike ſée, he could not but haue ſpeciall regard to ſée that the ſtate, rights and honour thereof were preſerued from all danger of decaie.

Note how the pope defendeth his chaplins.

Wherefore, vnderſtanding that there had béene certeine attempts made by Iohn erle of Mortaigne and others, both againſt the king and the biſhop of Elie, that was not onelie legat of the apoſtolike ſée, but alſo gouernour of the land appointed by the king, which attempt ſounded greatlie to the reproch of the church of Rome, and danger of damage to inſue to king Richard, if remedie were not the ſooner found: therefore he commanded them by the vertue of their obedience, to excommunicat the earle of Mortaigne, or any other that was knowne to haue laid any violent hands vpon the ſaid biſhop of Elie, or deteined him as captiue, or inforced him to any oth, or elſe had changed the ſtate of rule in the kingdome of England to other forme, than king Richard had ordeined at his ſetting forward towards the holie land: and that not onelie all the councellours, authors, aiders and complices of thoſe that had committed ſuch outrage, but alſo their lands ſhould ſtand interdicted, ſo that no diuine ſeruice ſhould be vſed within the precinct of the ſame, except penance and chriſtning of infants. This to remaine till the ſaid biſhop & kingdome were reſtored into the former eſtate: and that the parties excommunicated ſhould preſent themſelues with letters from the biſhops vnto the apoſtolike ſée to be abſolued, &c.

Herevpon alſo the biſhop of Elie himſelfe wrote vnto the biſhop of Lincolne and other, touching this matter: but the biſhops did neither any thing in accompliſhment of the effect of the popes letters, nor at his owne ſupplication. And therefore perceiuing ſmall helpe to come that waie, he ſought to obteine the fauour and fréendſhip of earle Iohn, and of his mother quéene Elianor. In the meane time, the lords, barons and prelates of the realme, after they had depriued him of all authoritie, and baniſhed him out of the land, ordeined the archbiſhop of Rouen in fauour of the kings commiſſion, to haue the chéefe rule and adminiſtration of things touching all the affaires of the common-wealth; but yet ſo as earle Iohn had the dooings in manie points, ſo that he might ſéeme in manner an aſſociat with him, whereof ſprang much inconuenience. For this Iohn being a man (as he is noted by ſome writers) of an ambitious nature, was ſuſpected to aſpire vnto the kingdome: in ſomuch that he had ioined with the French king, after the ſame king was returned forth of the holie land, againſt his brother king Richard, if his mother quéene Elianor had not perſuaded him to the contrarie.

The archbiſhop of Rouen chéefe gouernour of England.

R. Houed. Wil. Paruus. Fifteene ſaith Functius, but others agrée with Houed. as Gerardus Mercator, citing Albericus a monke.

Whileſt theſe things were a dooing, on the twelfth daie of Iulie, the citie of Acres was ſurrendred into the chriſtian mens hands, for the Soldan Saladine (being approched néere to the ſiege of the chriſtians with a puiſſant armie, in hope to haue raiſed their ſiege) when he perceiued it laie not in his power to worke any feat to the ſuccour of his people within the citie, and that they were ſo conſtreined that they muſt néeds yéeld, he holpe to make their compoſition, and promiſed to performe certeine couenants on their behalfe. Herevpon, the Saracens within Acres couenanted not onelie to deliuer the citie vnto the chriſtians with fiue hundred priſoners of chriſtians which they had within the ſame, but alſo to procure that the holie croſſe ſhould be to them deliuered, with a thouſand other chriſtian priſoners, ſuch as the chriſtian princes ſhould appoint out of thoſe numbers which Saladine had in his cuſtodie, and further, to giue them two hundred thouſand Beſans. And till theſe couenants were performed, it was agréed, that the Saracens, which were at that preſent left within the citie, ſhould remaine as pledges, vnder condition, that if the ſame couenants were not performed within fortie daies, then ſhould they ſtand at the mercie of the chriſtian princes as touching life and lim.

The citie of Acres.

Theſe things thus concluded, and the citie yéelded vp into the chriſtian mens hands, the French king vpon enuie and malice conceiued againſt king Richard(although he pretended ſickneſſe for excuſe) departed homewards, ſetting from Acres the laſt day of Iulie. Now then, after the departure of king Philip, when the day approched, in the which the Saracens ſhould performe the couenants; or elſe ſtand to the iudgement of life and death at the pleaſure of the chriſtian princes: it was perceiued that the couenants would not be fulfilled according to the agreement. For Saladine, as it well appeared, ment not to performe that which for the ſafegard of his men he had vndertaken, and did but dallie with the chriſtians to prolong the time: wherevpon ſentence was giuen forth, that for default in ſuch behalfe, the Saracens remaining as pledges ſhould loſe their heads.

Saladine cauſeth the chriſtian priſoners to be beheaded.

R.Houed.

Saladine hauing knowledge thereof, ſent word to king Richard and to the whole chriſtian armie, that if his people that were in the chriſtian mens hands loſt their heads, he would not faile but cauſe the heads of all thoſe chriſtians which he had in captiuitie to be cut off alſo. Notwithſtanding which anſwer, on the fourteenth day of Auguſt king Richard iſſued forth of the citie, paſſing the vttermoſt ditches, and incamped himſelfe neere the armie of Saladine, who the ſame daie ſent rich preſents vnto king Richard, requiring of him a longer day for performance of the couenants, but that would not be granted. Wherefore vpon the ſaid deniall, Saladine cauſed all thoſe chriſtian priſoners which he had in his hands to be beheaded on the eighteenth day of Auguſt, on which day king Richard aduanced forth towards the lodgings of the Saracens, and ſkirmiſhed with them verie hotlie, ſo that manie were wounded and ſlaine on both parts: and amongſt other one of king Richards companions at all exerciſes named Peter Mignot loſt his life there. Furthermore, although king Richard knew that Saladine had put the chriſtian priſoners to death in ſuch wiſe as you haue heard, yet would not he preuent his terme appointed for the execution of the Saracens that were in his cuſtodie, but abiding vnto the twentith day of Auguſt, he then cauſed thoſe Saracens which fell to his lot, at the time of the ſurrender of Acres, being in number about 2600. to be brought forth of the citie, and néere to the walles in the ſight of Saladine and all his hoſt they had their heads chopped off. The duke of Burgoigne cauſed execution to be doone within the citie vpon thoſe which fell to the French kings ſhare, the number of the which roſe to two thouſand and foure hundred, or thereabouts: for the whole number was reckoned to be about fiue thouſand that thus loſt their liues through the inconſtancie of their prince: yet diuerſe of the principall had their liues ſaued. The Saracens themſelues alſo ſpake much euill of Saladine for this matter, bicauſe that refuſing to performe the articles of couenants, he had occaſioned the enimie to ſlea thoſe that had ſo valiantlie ſerued in defenſe of the citie, to the vttermoſt ieopardie of their liues. And heere is verified that knowne verſe,

Quicquid delirant reges plectuntur Achiui.

Ger.Dor.

Strife betwixt ẏ archbiſhop of York and the biſhop of Durham.

But now to leaue forren matters, and to returne home into England: we find, that on the ſecond of December, the monks of Canturburie choſe to their archbiſhop Reignold biſhop of Bath, who within fifteene daies after his election, departed this life, and lieth buried at Bath. Alſo this yeare, or (as Ger.Dor. ſaith)in the yeare following, the biſhop of Durham ſought meanes to withdraw his ſubiection from the archbiſhop of Yorke, for which attempt the archbiſhop of Yorke, vpon truſt of the popes grant, did not excommunicate the ſaid biſhop, notwithſtanding that he appealed to the popes conſiſtorie thrée ſeuerall times, putting his owne matter and his churches to be examined and tried by the pope, wherevpon he obeied not the excommunication: and ſignifieng the cauſe vnto Rome, obteined ſuch fauour, that the pope and his cardinals reuerſed the ſentence, and iudged the excommunication to be of none effect. And further they decreed, that if the archbiſhop of Yorke had broken the altars and chalices, as information was giuen, in which the biſhop of Durham had celebrated after his appeale made to the court of Rome, that then ſhould the ſaid biſhop of Durham be acquited from owing any ſubiection to the ſaid archbiſhop for ſo long as they two ſhould liue togither.

True it is, that the archbiſhop had not onelie broken the altars and chalices which the biſhop had vſed in déed for the celebration of maſſe, but alſo held his owne brother Iohn earle of Mortaigne for excommunicate, bicauſe he had eat and dronke in companie of the ſaid biſhop, and would not communicate with him, till he came to receiue abſolution, and to make ſatiſfaction for his fault. In the end the biſhops of Lincolne and Rocheſter, with the abbat of Peterburrow, were appointed by the pope to haue the hearing of this matter, as iudges authoriſed by his buls, who ſat therevpon at Northampton, vpon S. Calixt his day, where after they had heard both parties argue what they could in either of their caſes, they gaue a longer day, to wit, vntill the feaſt of the natiuitie of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt next after, to ſee if by anie good means there might ſome agréement haue béene had betwixt them, or (if that could not be) that then the popes leters ſhould ſtand in force as before, & the helpes of either part ſaued, as though no delaie had béene vſed. And to this, both parties were agréeable, ſpeciallie at the motion of the biſhop of Lincolne.

Roger Lacie coneſtable of Cheſter.

This yeare alſo, Roger de Lacie coneſtable of Cheſter tooke Alan de Lec and Peter de Bouencort, and vpon deſpite hanged them, for that being put in truſt amongſt other with the kéeping of the caſtels of Notingham and Tickhill, which he had receiued into his cuſtodie of the biſhop of Elie quondam lord chancellour, they had conſented to the treaſon of Robert de Crokeſton, & Eudo de Duuille, which deliuered the ſame caſtels vnto Iohn earle of Mortaigne. The ſame earle of Mortaigne was highlie offended for the death of thoſe two perſons, and therefore waſted the lands of the ſaid Roger which lay within the compaſſe of his iuriſdiction.

But now touching the departure of the French king from Acres, diuerſe occaſions are remembred by writers of the emulation and ſecret ſpite which he ſhould beare towards king Richard, and beſide other alreadie touched, one was for enterteining and reléeuing the earle of Champaigne in ſuch bountifull wiſe in his neceſſitie, that he was readie to forſake the French kings ſeruice, and cleaue to king Richard. But howſoeuer it came to paſſe, partlie through enuie (as hath béene thought) conceiued at the great déeds of king Richard, whoſe mightie power and valiantneſſe he could not well abide, and partlie for other reſpects him mouing, he tooke the ſea with thrée gallies of the Geneuois, and returned into Italie, and ſo home into France, hauing promiſed firſt vnto king Richard at his departure out of the holie land, and after to pope Celeſtine at Rome, that he would not attempt any hurtfull enterpriſe againſt the Engliſh dominions, till king Richard ſhould be returned forth of the holie land. But this promiſe was not kept, for after that he was returned into France, he firſt ſought to procure the foreſaid erle Iohn, king Richards brother, to rebell againſt him, promiſing him not onelie aid to reduce all his brothers dominions into his hands, but alſo to giue his ſiſter Adela in marriage, whom king Richard vpon ſuſpicion of vnchaſt liuing, had forſaken, as before ye haue heard. But when earle Iohn was diſſuaded by his mother, from accepting this offer (which otherwiſe as it is ſaid he would willinglie haue receiued) king Philip ſtill reteined a malicious rancor in his hart, and in reuenge of old diſpleaſures, would haue attempted the warre againſt the ſubiects of king Richard, if his lords would haue ioined with him: but they conſidering what ſlander would redound hereby both to him and them for the iniurie doone to the chriſtian common-welth, in making warre againſt him that was occupied in defenſe of the faith againſt the common enimies of chriſtendome, would not giue their conſent thereto, and ſo the matter reſted, till king Richard was taken priſoner in Almaigne, and then what followed, it ſhall after appeare.

Enuious diſcord among the chriſtians.

In the meane while, the chriſtian armie atchiued ſome worthie enterpriſes in the holie land, though not manie, by reaſon of ſuch enuious diſcord as reigned amongſt the chéefe gouernours. It chanced yet on the éeue of the Natiuitie of our ladie next after the departure of king Philip, as king Richard marched forth towards Iaph ancientlie called Ioppa, that the Soldan Saladine taking aduantage of the place, did ſet vpon the rereward of the chriſtians: but his Saracens (after they had fought right fiercelie from noone till ſunne ſetting) were ſo beaten backe at length, and repelled with ſuch loſſe and diſaduantage, that in 40. yeares before they had not ſuſteined at one time greater damage. Amongſt other of the chriſtians ſlaine at that encounter, was one Iames Dauenes, a man of high proweſſe and valiancie.

Moreouer, king Richard wan diuerſe townes and caſtels out of the enimies hands, as Aſcalon, Darus, and diuerſe other, and ſome he fortified, as Aſcalon aforeſaid, and Port Iaph, otherwiſe called Ioppa. There were ſundrie encounters alſo betwixt the Saracens and chriſtians, wherein king Richard and his people bare themſelues ſo manfullie, that the victorie for the moſt part continuallie reſted on their ſide. At one time alſo, hearing of a great conueie of vittels, munitions, and other things which came from Babylon towards Ieruſalem to furniſh Saladine and his armie (which conueis they call carauannes) king Richard with a competent power of men met them on the waie, and diſtreſſed thoſe that were attendant vpon the ſafegard of that carriage, being in number about two thouſand horſſemen, beſides a great multitude of footmen, and therewith tooke the carriages with foure thouſand and ſix hundred camels and dromedaries, beſides an innumerable ſort of mules, aſſes, and other beaſts of burthen.

¶ But to ſpeake of all the worthie exploits atchiued by king Richard and his valiant capteins there in the holie land againſt the infidels, it would require a long treatiſe, and therefore here we paſſe them ouer. This is to be noted, that amongſt other of whom we find honorable mention made by writers for their high valiancie ſhewed in thoſe exploits, theſe are named as chéefe, Robert earle of Leiceſter, Hubert biſhop of Saliſburie, with the earles of S. Paule and Dreux, beſide diuerſe other, as Hugh de Gourney, William de Borrez, Walcline de Ferrers, Roger de Toonie, Iames de Auenes, the biſhop of Beauuois, William de Barres, William de Carland, Drogo de Merlo, Robert de Nealle, Henrie Fitz Nicholas, Robert de Newburg, Raſe de S. Marie, Arnold de Bois, Henrie de Mailoc, William & Saule de Bruil, Andrew de Chauignie, Henrie de Graie, Peter de Pratellis, Stephan de Turneham, Baldwin Carron, Clarenbald de Mount Chablon, Manſer de Liſle, Richard de Orques and Theodorike Philip, Ferrike de Vienne, Gilbert Malemaine, Alexander d' Arſie, Stephan de Longchamp, Seguin de Barret, Roger de Glanuille, Raimond Fitz Prince, Bartholomew de Mortimer, Gerard Furniuall, Raſe de Malleon, Roger de Sacie, William de Poole, Hugh de Neuill, Henrie Teutch or (if ye will) Teutonicus the kings ſtandardbearer, with diuerſe others, as well Engliſhmen, Frenchmen, Normans, Poictouins, Aniouines, Britans, Gaſcoignes, as other nations, of whome partlie mention is alreadie made before in this booke, and partlie for bréefeneſſe diuerſe are omitted.

De Poole a de Stagno,

But now to returne, ſure it is, that king Richard meant to haue recouered the citie of Ieruſalem, and all the holie land out of the Saracens hands, by the aſſiſtance of almightie God: if the doubt which he had of his brother the earle of Mortaigns practiſes, & the French kings doings, which were brought to him with a gréeuous report, had not reuoked him home. For diuerſe meſſengers were ſent dailie into the holie land, to aduertiſe him of ſuch dangers as were like to inſue, if by his ſpéedie returne the ſame were not preuented. And firſt after Eaſter, there came to him the prior of Hereford with letters from the biſhop of Elie, conteining a ſore information againſt his brother earle Iohn, for hauing expelled thoſe whom he had appointed rulers ouer the realme of England, and altered the ſtate of things there contrarie to the ordinances by him deuiſed afore his ſetting forward vpon his iournie (as before ye haue partlie heard.)

Galf.Vinſaf.

Vpon receipt of which letters, he meant inmediatlie at the firſt to haue returned, and to haue left behind him a conuenient power of men, to wit, thrée hundred knights or men of armes, and two thouſand choſen footmen, to abide vpon the defenſe of the holie land, with other chriſtians at his coſts and charges. But yet at length he was perſuaded to tarrie, ſpeciallie till things were ſet in ſome better ſtate, which then were out of order by the death of the marques of Montferrato, lord of Tire, whom two traitorous Saracens of the kind which they name Aſſaſſini had murthered. After whoſe death Henrie earle of Champaigne nephue to king Richard married his wife, and was made king of Ieruſalem, Guido reſigning to him his title, vnto whome as it were in recompenſe king Richard gaue the Ile of Cypres: although ſome write, that the knights Templers had bought it of him before. Thus king Richard remaining ſtill in the holie land, ſhortlie after Whitſuntide, there came an other meſſenger to him, one Iohn de Alanzon a clearke, bringing worſſe newes out of England than the prior of Hereford had brought before, which in effect conteined, that his brother earle Iohn was alied as a confederat with the French king, and meant through his ſetting on, to ſeize into his poſſeſſion the whole realme of England, notwithſtanding the perſuaſion of his mother quéene Elianor and other his fréends to the contrarie.

Herevpon king Richard was fullie perſuaded to returne home, but yet through the admonition of certeine perſons, and namelie of one William de Poicters, a chapleine of his, he eftſoones altered his purpoſe, and ſo remained there, till at length through enuie and malice ſtill increaſing amongſt the chriſtians, he perceiued how no good purpoſe could go forward, ſince that which ſéemed good to ſome, was miſliked of other; and ſpeciallie our writers put great blame in the French men, who either vpon diſdaine or other diſpleaſure would not be perſuaded to follow their aduiſe, which were knowne beſt to vnderſtand the ſtate of things in thoſe parties. And herevpon, when the armie was aduanced to Betenoble, a place not paſt foure leagues diſtant from Ieruſalem, bicauſe their mind might not be fulfilled for the beſieging of Ieruſalem, which they had intended to take in hand (whereas the reſidue would rather that they ſhuld haue gone to beſiege Babylon in Aegypt, and that vpon ſundrie great reſpects) the Frenchmen raiſed their field, and returned againe to Acres in great deſpite, putting the reſt of the armie alſo (ſo much as in them laie) in danger of vtter ruine and diſtreſſe.

Anno Reg. 4.

Then king Richard and the other chriſtian capteins perceiuing how the matter inclined, and giuing ouer all hope of any more good ſucceſſe, followed them. So that after they were thus returned to Acres, king Richard ſtill doubting leaſt his long abſence from home might put him in danger of more loſſe here, than he ſaw hope of preſent gaine to be had there, in ſuch diuerſitie of humours and priuie malice which reigned among them, he determined fullie to depart homewards, with no leſſe purpoſe to returne thither againe after he had ſetled things at home in ſuch ſure ſtay as was expedient for the ſuertie of his owne eſtate and quietneſſe of his people. Herevpon being readie to enter into his ſhips at Acres [or as ſome haue, being on his iournie homewards in Cypres] he was aduertiſed that the Souldane Saladine had taken the towne of Iaph, ſlaine a great number of the chriſtians within it, and beſieged the reſidue within the caſtell, the which (conſtreined through feare) had compounded to yéeld, if within thrée daies there came no ſuccour.

K. Richard reſcueth Port Iaph.

King Richard being hereof aduertiſed, and turning gréef into valiancie, with all ſpéed ſailed backe vnto Iaph, and landing there with his people, cauſed his enimies to forſake the towne: but anon aſſembling themſelues againe togither, they turned once more to beſiege it, wherevpon he iſſued forth into the fields, and fought with them ſundrie daies togither, till finallie they were content to forſake their enterpriſe, and to depart thence for altogither. In theſe conflicts the valiant courage of king Richard, and the worthie manhood of his ſouldiers right well appeared: for he brought not with him at that time vnto Iaph aboue 80 men of armes, and foure hundred other ſouldiers with croſſebowes, and yet with that ſmall handfull of men, and ſome aid of them that he found there in the caſtell, he did not onelie bid battell to the enimies, which were numbred to 62 thouſand, but alſo put them to the worſſe, and cauſed them to flée backe, to their great ſhame and confuſion.

Cephas.
K. Richard fell ſicke.

Thus Iaph being deliuered out of the enimies hands, king Richard fell ſicke at a caſtell called Cephas, and ſo remained there certeine daies, till he had recouered his health. In which meane time the Soldane Saladine ſéeming to lament his caſe, ſent vnto him certeine of his councellors to common with him of peace, declaring that although he well vnderſtood that king Richard ment ſhortlie to returne into his countrie, and that after his departure out of the eaſt parts, he could with ſmall adoo recouer all that the chriſtians yet held within the holie land, he would neuertheleſſe in reſpect of king Richards high prowes, and noble valiancie, grant a peace for a certeine time, ſo that not onelie Aſcalon, but alſo all other ſuch townes and places as the chriſtians had fortified or wonne ſince the conqueſt of Acres ſhould be raced, as touching their walles, bulworks, gates, and other fortifications.

King Richard (though he perceiued that this offer of peace tended vnto this point chéefelie, that Saladine would thereby adnihilate whatſoeuer the chriſtian armie had doone in the holie land ſince his & the French kings arriuall, ſo that by the ſaid peace he ſhould gaine more than by the edge of his ſword) did ſomewhat ſtaie at this offer and demand, as a thing greatlie diſhonourable to the chriſtians, to loſe by treatie of peace ſo much or rather more than they got by force of warres (a méere token of faint and féeble courage) yet conſidering that in ſuch neceſſitie both of his departure from thence, and alſo of lacke of other ſuccors to reſiſt the puiſſance of the enimies, after his comming awaie, he iudged it beſt to take the offer at the enimies hands in auoiding of ſome greater euill. Herevpon therefore was a peace concluded to endure for thrée yeares, thrée moneths, thrée wéeks, thrée daies, and thrée houres, to begin at Eaſter next inſuing. And among other articles, it was couenanted, that the chriſtians ſhould haue frée paſſage to come and go vnto the citie of Ieruſalem, to viſit the holie ſepulchre there, which was granted; ſo that amongſt a great number of chriſtians that preſentlie vpon this concluſion went thither, Hubert biſhop of Saliſburie was one, who had continued about the king during the time of all his iournie till this time.

A peace concluded betwixt the Chriſtians & Saracens.

K. Richard taketh his iornie homewards.

King Richard hauing thus concluded with Saladine, tooke the ſea, and comming againe into Cypres, ſent his wife quéene Berengaria with his ſiſter Ioane (late quéene of Sicile) into England by the long ſeas, but he himſelfe not minding to lie long on the ſeas, determined to take his courſe into Grecia, and ſo by land to paſſe homewards with all ſpéed poſſible. Howbeit yer he could atteine his purpoſe, his chance was to be driuen by tempeſt into the coaſt of Iſtria, not farre from Aquilia, where he ſtood in ſome doubt of his life. For if he had béene knowne and taken, they would ſurelie haue killed him, bicauſe of the ſlander that went of him, as guiltie of the death of Conrade the marqueſſe of Montferrato, who indéed was ſlaine by two of the Aſſaſſini in the citie of Tyrus, whileſt king Richard was in the holie land (as before yée haue heard.)

K. Richard ſlandered for the death of ỹ marques of Montferrato.

He therefore hauing here made ſhipwracke, and doubting to fall into the hands of any perſon in thoſe parts that bare good will vnto the marqueſſe (againſt whome he had indéed ſhewed himſelfe not fréendlie in a quarrell betwixt the ſaid marqueſſe and Guido the king of Ieruſalem) made the beſt ſhift he could to get away, yet knowledge being had of him, and ſerch made after him by one Meinard of Gorezein, he loſt eight of his ſeruants, and ſo came to a towne within the biſhoprike of Saltzburge called Friſake, where he was eftſoones in danger to haue béene taken againe by one Frederike de ſaint Soome, who notwithſtanding tooke ſix of his men, but yet he himſelfe with thrée other of his companie made ſhift to get away. Finallie comming to Vienna in Auſtrich, and there cauſing his ſeruants to prouide meat for him, more ſumptuous and fine than was thought requiſit for ſo meane a perſon as he counterfeited then to beare out in countenance, it was ſtreightwaies ſuſpected that he was ſome other maner of man than he pretended, and in fine, thoſe that marked more diligentlie the maner of him, perceiued what he was, and gaue knowledge to the duke of Auſtrich named Leopold, being then in the citie of Vienna, what they had ſéene. His page that had the Dutch toong, going about the towne to change gold, and buy vittels, bewraied him, hauing by chance the kings gloues vnder his girdle: wherevpon comming to be examined for feare of tortures confeſſed the truth.

He being warie that he was deſcried, got him to his weapon: but they aduiſing him to be contented, and alledging the dukes commandement, he boldlie anſwered, that ſith he muſt be taken, he being a king, would yéeld

“ he would yéeld himſelfe into his hands. The duke hearing of this, ſpéedilie came vnto him, whom he méeting, deliuered vp his ſword, and committed him vnto his cuſtodie. The duke reioiſing of ſuch a preie, brought him vnto his palace, and with gentle words enterteined him, though he meant no great good towards him, as well inough appeared in that he committed him to the kéeping of certeine gentlemen, which without much courteſie looked ſtreightlie inough to him for ſtarting awaie, in ſomuch that they kept him in cold irons (as ſome authours doo write.) The duke of Auſtrich owght the king no good will, bicauſe he had caſt downe his enſignes pitcht vp in a turret at Acres, which he had wonne at the verie time when that citie was deliuered by the Saracens: for while they were in tretie on the one ſide, the duke on the other, not knowing anie thing thereof, gaue the aſſault vnto that part of the towne which was appointed vnto him to beſiege. And ſo being entred the towne, and perceiuing that by treatie it was to be deliuered, he retired into the turret which he had firſt wonne and entred, and there ſet vp his ſtandard and enſignes, which king Richard (as the Dutch writers affirme) comming thither, threw downe and trode vnder his féet.

The cauſe of the diſpleaſure betwixt the duke of Auſtrich & king Richard.

Ger.Dor.

But Geruaſius Dorobornenſis declareth this matter ſomewhat otherwiſe, as thus. After that the ſaid citie of Acres was rendred into the chriſtian mens hands (ſaith he) diuerſe lords tooke their lodgings as they thought good, and hanged foorth their enſignes. And as it chanced, the duke of Auſtrich placing himſelfe in one of the faireſt palaces of all the citie, put foorth his enſigne, whereof king Richard being warie, came thither with a companie of hardie ſouldiers about him, and threw downe the dukes enſigne, ſo diſplacing him out of that ſo pleaſant and beautifull a lodging. For this cauſe, and alſo ſurmizing that king Richard ſhould be guiltie of the death of the marques, Conrade the duke of Auſtrich ſhewed ſuch diſcourteſie towards him. But concerning the murther of the marques, the chéefe gouernour of thoſe Saracens called Aſſaſſini cleared king Richard by a letter written and directed vnto the duke of Auſtrich in manner as followeth.

The ſame in Engliſh.

Vetus de Monte to Lupold duke of Auſtrich ſendeth greeting. Where manie kings and princes beyond the ſeas blame Richard king of England of the marques his death, I ſweare by the lord that reigneth euerlaſtinglie, and by the law which we hold, that he was not in fault for his death. For the verie cauſe of the marques his death was ſuch as followeth. One of our brethren in a ſhip of Satalie came towards our parties, and chanced by tempeſt to be driuen vnto Tyre, and the marques cauſed him to be taken and ſlaine, and tooke a great portion of monie that he had in the ſhip with him. Wherevpon we ſent our meſſengers to the marques, commanding him to reſtore vnto vs the monie of our brother, and to compound with vs for our ſaid brothers death, and he would not.

Moreouer, he alſo contemned our meſſengers, & laid the fault of our brothers death vpon Reginald lord of Sidon, and we did ſo much through our freends, that we got full vnderſtanding that the marques himſelfe cauſed him to be ſlaine, and tooke his monie. And therefore we ſent vnto him againe an other meſſenger named Edriſus, whome he would haue drowned in the ſea, but our freends made ſuch ſhift, that they procured him to depart with ſpeed from Tyre, who returned to vs, and ſignified theſe things to vs for certeine. And from that houre euer after we had a deſire to ſlea the marques: and ſo then we ſent two of our brethren vnto Tyre, who openlie, & in a manner in preſence of all the people of Tyre ſlue him.

This therefore was the verie cauſe of the death of the marques: & we ſay to you in good ſooth, that the lord Richard king of England, in this death of the marques was nothing culpable: and they that haue doone anie diſpleaſure vnto the king of England for this cauſe, they haue doone it wrongfullie, and without anie iuſt occaſion. Know ye for certeine, that we doo not vſe to kill anie man of this world for anie bribe, or for monie, except he haue doone to vs ſome harme afore time. And know ye that we haue made theſe letters in our houſe at our caſtell of Meſſuat, in the midſt of September, in the yeare from Alexander the great, 1505.

¶ Thus we ſee how king Richard was cleared of that crime concerning the marques his death by the tenour of this letter. And verelie it is moſt like that king Richard would haue beene loth to haue communicated his purpoſe vnto ſuch a wicked kind of pagans as the Aſſaſſini were, if he had pretended any ſuch matter, but rather would haue ſought his reuenge by ſome other meanes. Now therefore to our purpoſe.

The newes of the taking of king Richard was anon bruted and blowne ouer all Germanie, wherevpon the emperour Henrie the ſixt, the ſonne of Frederike the firſt, ſent in all haſt vnto the duke, perſuading him to deliuer the king into his hands, being able to ſuſteine and abide the malice of all them that would be offended with the taking and deteining of him priſoner, as the pope and others. The emperour well vnderſtood the wealth and riches of England, and therefore hoped to make ſome good purchaſe by ranſoming the king, if he might get him out of the dukes hands. The duke perceiuing alſo the emperours meaning, durſt not well denie his requeſt, and therefore he deliuered the king vnto them that were ſent from the emperour, who couenanted to giue vnto the ſaid duke the ſumme of 6000. pounds of Cullen weight for the hauing of the ſaid king. The emperour thus receiuing the king at the hands of the duke of Auſtrich, commanded that he ſhould be committed to cloſe priſon, and would not doo ſo much as once ſpeake with him. This he did, to cauſe the king vpon an indignation and wearineſſe of that maner of life, to make ſpeed in offering ſome large maſſe of monie for his libertie & deliuerance. ¶ Thus we ſee how couetouſneſſe infected the hearts of the mightie, and what occaſion the emperour and duke did take, to inrich themſelues by the meanes of the king, whome they forced not to impoueriſh, ſo their owne greedie worme were ſerued. But this hath beene a diſeaſe not ſo generall as ancient, according to his words that ſaid,

The king is deliuered to the emperor.

Here is to be remembred by the waie, that about the ſame time, or ſomewhat before, in the yeare of our Lord 1192. the pope ſent two legats (namelie, Octauian biſhop of Hoſtia, and Iordane de Foſſa noua) into Normandie, to reconcile the biſhop of Elie and the archbiſhop of Rouen: but comming vnto Giſors, they were ſtaied from entring any further into the countrie, wherevpon they did interdict the whole duchie of Normandie, togither with William Fitz Radulfe lord ſteward of that countrie, bicauſe he was the man that had ſo ſtaied them. Immediatlie herevpon, queene Elianor, and the archbiſhop of Rouen ſent vnto thoſe legats Hugh biſhop of Durham, requiring them to releaſe that ſentence of interdiction ſo pronounced againſt the ſteward and countrie of Normandie in the kings abſence, but they would not, except they might be receiued into Normandie: howbeit, the pope being ſent vnto, releaſed it, and cauſed the legats to releaſe it alſo, and yet they entred not into Normandie at all.

This yeare, whileſt the ſeneſchall of Gaſcoigne laie ſicke, the earle of Pieregort, and the vicount of March, and almoſt all the lords and barons of Gaſcoigne, began to waſte and deſtroie the lands of king Richard. And though the ſeneſchall manie times by meſſengers required a peace, or at the leaſt ſome truce, yet could he not haue any grant thereof: wherfore vpon his recouerie of health he inuaded the lands of the ſaid earle, tooke the caſtels and fortreſſes and ſome of them he fortified, and kept to the kings vſe, and ſome of them he raced downe to the ground. He alſo inuaded the vicounts countrie, and ſubdued it to the kings gouernement. Shortlie after came the brother of the king of Nauarre, with eight hundred knights or men of armes to the ſeneſchals aid, and ſo they two togither entring into the lands of the earle of Tholouſe, tooke diuerſe caſtels and fortreſſes within the ſame, of the which ſome they fortified, and ſome they raced, and rode euen to the gates of Tholouſe, and lodged in maner vnder the walles of the citie.

A little before Chriſtmas alſo, diuerſe of thoſe that had beene in the holie land with king Richard, came home into England, not knowing but that king Richard had beene at home before them, and being aſked where they thought he was become, they could ſay no more but that they had ſeene the ſhip wherein he firſt went aboord, arriuing at Brendize in Puglia. At length, when newes came that he was taken and ſtaied as priſoner, the archbiſhop of Rouen and other the rulers of the realme of England, ſent the abbat of Boxley and the abbat of Roberts-bridge with all ſpeed into Almaine to ſpeake with him, and to vnderſtand his ſtate, and what his pleaſure was in all things. Who comming to Germanie, paſſed through the countrie into Baierland, where at a place called Orefer they found the king as then on his iournie towards the emperour, to whom (as yee haue heard) the duke of Auſtrich did ſend him. The ſaid abbats attended him to the emperours court, and remained there with him till the emperour and he were accorded, in manner as after ſhall be ſhewed: and then after Eaſter they returned with the newes into England.

The abbats of Boxley and Roberts-bridge.

Vpon report hereof order was taken for manie things, but cheefelie for the ſtate: in which dealings, forſomuch as thoſe which had the rule of the land ſtood in great doubt of things (for the inconſtant nature of earle Iohn was of them much ſuſpected) firſt they cauſed a new oth of allegiance to be made to king Richard, and receiued of the people. They fortified alſo ſuch townes and caſtels as were of importance, both with repairing the walles and other defenſes about the ſame, and furniſhing them with men, munition and vittels. Thus was the land brought into ſome order.

Ger.Dor.

In the meane while, the French king being aduertiſed that king Richard was deteined as priſoner, reioiſed not a little thereat, and with all ſpeed by ſecret meſſages did ſend for his brother earle Iohn, who was readie to come at his call. And being come, he exhorted him not to ſuffer ſo conuenient an occaſion to paſſe, but to take the gouernement of the realme of England now into his hands, promiſing him all ſuch aid as he could of him reaſonablie require: with other like talke ſtill tending to the prouocation of the earle to forſake his allegiance vnto his brother. And to ſay the truth, earle Iohn was eaſilie perſuaded ſo to doo, and therefore vpon his immediat returne into England, aſſembled an armie, and with the ſame (and ſuch ſtrangers as he brought with him) began to proue maiſteries, firſt winning the caſtels of Windſore, Wallingford, Notingham, and diuerſe other, and fortifieng the ſame to his owne vſe and defenſe.

flight, ſome into one place, and ſome into an other, the which yet being apprehended were put to worthie execution. But this was not doone without continuance of time, & without great trouble & charges to the realme: for whereas there was a practiſe betwixt the French king and earle Iohn, that a great power of ſtrangers, & namelie Flemings ſhould haue come into the realme (for whoſe tranſporting a great number of ſhips were brought togither at Witſand) yet the high prouidence and goodneſſe of God diſappointed their purpoſe. For their meſſengers being taken which were ſent hither into England, the treaſon was reuealed, and by the queene mothers appointment (who cheefelie then ruled the land) a great companie of knights, men of armes, and commons of the countrie, watched the ſea coaſts ouer againſt Flanders, to keepe the enimies from landing. They began thus to watch in the paſſion weeke, and ſo continued till a certeine time after Eaſter. Howbeit earle Iohn came ſecreetlie ouer, in hope to haue not onelie the aſſiſtance of the Welſhmen and of manie other his freends in England, but alſo of the Scots, howbeit, the king of Scots would not meddle. He therefore with ſuch Welſhmen and other as he had brought ouer, and ſuch Engliſhmen as he could get to take his part, began ſuch attempts (as before ye haue heard) to the diſquieting of the whole realme, and great diſpleaſure of the king.

Moreouer, beſide that power of the barons which laid ſiege to Windſor caſtell, there were Noble men alſo in other parts of the realme that were readie to reſiſt him. And amongſt other, Geffrey the archbiſhop of Yorke, with Hugh Bardolfe one of the kings iuſtices, and William de Stuteuille, aſſembled an armie, and comming to Doncaſter, fortified the towne: but when the archbiſhop would haue gone forward to beſiege the caſtell of Tickhill, which earle Iohn had in poſſeſſion, the other two his aſſociats would not conſent to go with him, bicauſe they were ſeruants, and reteined with earle Iohn. Herewith the archbiſhop being ſore offended, departed from them, calling them traitors to their king, and enimies to the realme.

Rouen beſieged.
The earle of Leiceſter.
Polydor.

About the ſame time did the French king enter into Normandie with an armie, & comming to the towne of Giſors, beſieged it, the which one Gilbert de Vaſcoll or Guaſcoill capteine thereof (to his high reproch) yeelded vp vnto him, with an other caſtell alſo called Neſle, which he had likewiſe in keeping. After this, the French king entring into the countrie of Veurine or Veulqueſſine, wan diuers towns and fortreſſes in the ſame, and paſſing forward, tooke Val de Rueil, and Neuſburge, and finallie comming before the citie of Rouen he laid ſiege thereto: but the earle of Leiceſter being gotten into the citie before the French kings comming thither, ſo incouraged the citizens, that they ſtoutlie ſtanding to their defenſe, cauſed the French king to his great diſhonour to raiſe his field, hauing loſt there more than he wan. Yet to ſaue other townes and caſtels from taking, and the countrie from deſtruction, the rulers of the ſame procured a truce for a great ſumme of monie, which they couenanted to giue, deliuering vp foure notable caſtels by waie of engagement, till the ſumme agreed vpon ſhould be to him contented and dulie paid.

Michaelma ſaith Ger. Dorob.

In the meane time, earle Iohn as head of all the conſpiratours, perceiuing himſelfe not able to atchiue his purpoſe as then, nor to reſiſt the lords and barons of the realme, being vp in armour againſt him, and now growen to greater ſtomach, bicauſe they vnderſtood by the biſhop of Saliſburie latelie arriued, of the kings welfare, and hope of deliuerance; and furthermore, conſidering that he was diſappointed both of Scots and Flemings as he had well hoped ſhould haue come to his aid: he tooke a truce with the lords of the kings ſide, by the earneſt trauell of the biſhop of Saliſburie, till the feaſt of All ſaincts, ſo as the caſtels of Windſore, Wallingford, and the Peake, ſhould remaine in the hands of his mother queene Elianor; but the caſtels of Notingham and Tickhill remained ſtill in his owne poſſeſſion, the which with ſuch other caſtels as he held within the land, he furniſhed with garriſons of his owne men and freends, and then went againe ouer into France to the French king, to purchaſe ſome new aid at his hands according to his promiſe.

The emperour chargeth king Richar with iniuries doone to the Sicilians.

The kings wiſedome in making his anſwere.

Here will we leaue earle Iohn conferring with the French king, and returne to the king of England. Vpon Palmeſundaie after that he was deliuered (or rather betraied) into the emperours hands, he was brought before the princes and lords of the empire, in whoſe preſence the emperour charged him with diuerſe vnlawfull doings: and namelie picked a quarell at him for the wrongs and hurts doone to the Sicilians in time of his ſoiourning in their Ile, as he went towards the holie land. For albeit the ſaid emperour had nothing as then to doo in the countrie, yet for ſomuch as he had latelie recouered the Ile of Sicile out of king Tancreds hands, and was now intituled king thereof by the pope, in right of his wife Conſtance, the daughter of Roger king of Sicile, and ſo by reaſon thereof ſeemed to be greeuouſlie offended with him for his doings about the recouering of the monie from Tancred, which neuertheleſſe was iuſtlie due vnto his ſiſter for hir dowrie, as in the proceſſe afore I haue alreadie declared. King Richard notwithſtanding theſe vaine and other friuolous obiections laid to his charge, made his anſwears alwaies ſo pithilie and directlie to all that could be laid againſt him, and excuſed himſelfe in euerie point ſo throughlie, that the emperour much maruelled at his high wiſedome and prudence, and not onelie greatlie commended him for the ſame, but from thenceforth vſed him more courteouſlie, and ſuffered that his freends might haue acceſſe to him more freelie than before they could be permitted.

Polydor.

The Pope alſo being aduertiſed of the taking of king Richard, was much offended, that anie chriſtian prince, hauing taken vpon him the defenſe of the chriſtian faith againſt the infidels, ſhould be ſo vſed in his returne from ſo godlie an enterpriſe: and therefore ſent both to the duke of Auſtrich, and to the emperour, requiring them to ſet him at libertie. But the emperour declared plainlie that he would be anſwered for ſuch ſummes of monie as king Richard had taken out of Sicile before he would releaſe him or ſet him at libertie.

The biſhop of Saliſburie ſent into England.
Ger.Dor.

When king Richard perceiued that no excuſes would ſerue, though neuer ſo iuſt, but that he muſt needs paie to his couetous hoſt ſome great ſumme of monie for his hard interteinment, he ſent the biſhop of Saliſburie into England, to take order with the barons of the realme to prouide for the paiment of his ranſome, which biſhop (as yee haue heard) after the peace concluded with Saladine, went vnto Ieruſalem to viſit the holie ſepulchre, and now comming into Sicile, as he returned homewards, had knowledge there how king Richard was taken priſoner in Auſtrich, and remained in the emperours hands: whervpon he turned that waie foorth, and comming to him, was now ſent into England with commiſſion (as I haue ſaid) to leauie monie for the kings ranſome. He landed here the twentith day of Aprill, by whoſe comming the land was the ſooner brought in quiet: for the agreement which earle Iohn tooke (as before yee haue heard) was cheefelie procured by his meanes. For till his comming, the caſtell of Windſore was not wonne, the ſiege being but ſlackelie followed by the archbiſhop of Rouen, who had diuerſe of his fréends within it, and therefore was not verie earneſt againſt them.

Rog. Houed. The biſhop of Elie commeth to the king.

When the biſhop of Saliſburie was departed towards England, the biſhop of Elie came to the king and trauelled ſo earneſtlie betwixt the emperour and him, that finallie the emperour (partlie through his ſuit, & partlie for that he had béene verie much called vpon by the pope and other for his deliuerie) tooke order with him for the redéeming of his libertie, and appointed what ſumme he ſhould pay for his ranſome, which (as ſome write) was two hundred thouſand markes: other ſaie that it was but 140 thouſand marks of the poiſe of Cullen weight. But William Paruus, who liued in thoſe daies, affirmeth it was one hundred thouſand pounds, and Roger Houeden ſaith an hundred thouſand marks of Cullen poiſe, to be paid preſentlie at the kings firſt comming into England, and fiftie thouſand marks afterwards, that is to ſay, thirtie thouſand to the emperour, and twentie thouſand to the duke of Auſtrich, as it were in recompenſe of the iniurie done to him in the holie land; where king Richard ouerthrew his enſignes: and for the ſame to deliuer ſufficient ſuerties.

R. Houed. Lands aſſigned to king Richard.

Moreouer, we find in Roger Houeden that the emperour amongſt other the articles of this agréement thus concluded betwixt him and king Richard, gaue and granted, and by his letters patents confirmed vnto him theſe lands hereafter mentioned, that is to ſaie: Prouance with the citie of Vienne, and Viennois, the citie of Marſeils, Narbon, Arles and Lion vpon the Rhone, with the countrie vp to the Alps, and all thoſe poſſeſſions which belonged to the empire in Burgoine, with the homages of the king of Aragon and of the earle of S. Giles: wherein is to be noted, that with the precinct of the premiſſes thus granted to king Richard, fiue archbiſhops ſées, and thirtie thrée biſhops ſées are included. Howbeit the truth is, that the emperour neuer had poſſeſſion of theſe countries, cities, and towns himſelfe, neither would the inhabitants receiue any perſon ſo by him appointed to their lord and gouernour, wherefore the king made ſmall account of that his ſo large grant. But after he once vnderſtood the certeintie of the ſumme that he ſhould paie for his ranſome (which buſineſſe he moſt attended) he ſent one with letters by and by and in great haſt into England to his treaſurers, requiring them with all conuenient ſpéed to prouide monie, and to ſend it to him by a day, that he might be ſet at libertie with ſpéed.

Rog. Houed. Order taken for leuieng monie to paie the kings ranſome.

vſed much ſtreightneſſe in exacting it, not onelie leuieng it to the vttermoſt value and extent of mens lands, goods, and poſſeſſions, but after their owne willes and pleaſures: ſo that vnder colour of the kings commiſſion, and letters to them directed, there ſéemed not a tribute or ſubſidie to be raiſed, but by ſome publike proclamation all the goods and ſubſtance of the people to be appointed as a prey to the kings officers, whereby it came to paſſe, that not onelie priuate mens goods, but alſo the chalices, iewels, and veſſels belonging to the church were turned into monie, and a farre greater ſumme made than was at the firſt commanded, a great part of the ouerplus being conuerted to the vſe of thoſe, through whoſe hands the receipt paſſed. There was no priuilege nor fréedome allowed to exempt any perſon or place for being contributorie towards the paiment of this monie. The order of Ciſteaux that were neuer charged with any paiment before, were now aſſeſſed more déepelie than the reſt.

The abbat of S. Albons acquitted all thoſe churches within the compaſſe of his iuriſdiction, by the gift of an hundred marks. But the biſhop of Cheſter had verie ill lucke with his collections; for hauing gathered a great ſumme of monie to the kings vſe, he was ſpoiled thereof in one night, as he lodged néere vnto Canturburie, being vpon his iournie towards the king. And bicauſe Matthew de Cléere that laie in the caſtell of Douer was knowne to aid thoſe that robbed the ſaid biſhop, the archbiſhop of Canturburie pronounced him accurſſed.

About this time, and on the morrow after the natiuitie of ſaint Iohn Baptiſt, the biſhop of Elie lord chancellour arriued in England, not ſhewing himſelfe in any ſtatelie port (for he tooke vpon him neither the dignitie of chancellour nor legat, nor yet of iuſtice) but onelie as a ſimple biſhop and meſſenger ſent from the king. The quéene mother, the archbiſhop of Rouen, and ſuch other as had gouernment of the land, hearing of his comming, met him at ſaint Albons, where he ſhewed to them the emperours letters, conteining the agréement made betwixt him and king Richard, and withall appointed certeine lords & barons to go with him at his returne backe to the king, as Gilbert biſhop of Rocheſter, Siſrid biſhop of Chicheſter, Bennet abbat of Peterborow, Richard earle of Clare, Roger Bigot earle of Norfolke, Geffrey de Saie, and diuerſe other. It was alſo ordeined at this ſame time, that the monie gathered towards the paiment of the kings ranſome ſhould remaine in cuſtodie of Hubert biſhop of Saliſburie, Richard biſhop of London, William earle of Arundell, Hameline earle of Warren, and of the Maior of London, vnder the ſeales of the quéene mother, and of the archbiſhop of Rouen.

¶But ſée the hap of things, whileſt ech one was thus occupied about the aforeſaid monie; it chanced that king Richard was at the point to haue béene deliuered into the hands of his deadlie aduerſarie the French king, as hereafter you ſhall heare, noting by the waie the dangerous eſtate of princes, the manifold diſtreſſes whereinto by ſiniſter fate (as well as the inferior & raſcall rout of common drudges) they be driuen. For what greater calamitie, what gréeuouſer hartach, what more miſerable caſualtie could haue happened vnto a bondman, than to be deliuered to and fro from the hand of one enimie to another, to be bought and ſold for monie, to ſtand to the courteſies of forren foes, of a king to become a captiue? wherevnto the poet did right well allude, when he ſaid,

The biſhop of Liege murthered.

The emperour vpon diſpleaſure conceiued againſt the biſhop of Liege, which latelie had atteined to that benefice contrarie to the emperours pleaſure, who wiſhed the ſame rather to an other perſon, hired certeine naughtie fellowes to go into France, where the biſhop remained for feare of the emperours malice, and there to find meanes traitorouſlie to ſlea him, which they accordinglie did, by reaſon whereof the duke of Louaigne that was brother to the biſhop, and other of his kinſmen, vpon knowledge had thereof, meant to haue made the emperour warre, in reuenge of that murther: inſomuch that the emperour, to haue the French kings aid againſt them, was minded to haue deliuered K. Richard vnto him.

Howbeit after that the matter was taken vp, and a concord made betwixt the emperour and his nobles, he changed his purpoſe alſo touching the deliuering ouer of king Richard, who perceiuing that till his ranſome were paid (which would amount to the ſumme of an hundred & fiftie thouſand marks) he ſhould not get libertie: and putting great confidence in the dexteritie and diligence of Hubert biſhop of Saliſburie (whome he ſent as ye haue heard into England to deale for the leuieng of the ſame) he thought good to aduance the ſame biſhop to the metropolitane ſée of Canturburie, which had béene vacant euer ſithence the deceaſe of archbiſhop Baldwine, that died (as ye haue heard) in the holie land.

Wil. Paruus.

Hubert biſhop of Saliſburie elected archbiſhop of Canturburie.

Hereupon writing to the biſhops of the realme, and to the moonks of Canturburie, he required them to procéed to the election of an archbiſhop for that ſée, and withall commended vnto them the foreſaid Hubert, as a man moſt ſufficient and méet for that roome. He wrote likewiſe to the quéene to further that matter, and eaſilie hereby obteined his deſire. For ſhortlie after, the ſame Hubert was elected by the biſhops and moonks, which aſſembled togither for that purpoſe. He was the 41 archbiſhop that gouerned that ſée: for although Reginold biſhop of Bath was elected before him, yet bicauſe he died yer he was inſtalled, he is not put in the number.

Hubert archbiſhop of Cãturburie, lord chéefe iuſtice.

The king being now put in good hope of his ſpéedie deliuerance, ſent into England, willing his mother quéene Elianor, the archbiſhop of Rouen and others, to come ouer vnto him into Almaine, and in the meane time he ordeined Hubert the archbiſhop of Canturburie to remaine at home as lord chéefe iuſtice. After this, the emperour with the aduice of the princes of the empire, aſſigned a day to king Richard, in which he ſhould be deliuered out of captiuitie, which was the mondaie next after the twentith day of Chriſtmaſſe. Whereupon king Richard wrote vnto Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie in forme as followeth.

The kings commandement not obeied.

Before this king Richard had ſent the biſhop of Elie into France vnto his brother earle John, who preuailed ſo much with him, that he returned into Normandie, and there ſware fealtie vnto his brother king Richard, and ſo was contented to forſake the French king. But whereas king Richard commanded that all ſuch caſtels and honours as he had giuen to him afore time, ſhould now be reſtored to him againe, as well thoſe in England, as the other on the further ſide the ſea: ſuch as had the ſame caſtels in kéeping would not obeie the kings commandement herein, refuſing to make reſtitution of thoſe places, according to the tenour & purport of the kings writ, vnto the ſaid earle of Mortaigne, by reaſon of which refuſall, he returned againe to the French king, and ſtucke to him. Hereupon the French king gaue vnto him the caſtels of Drincourt, and Arques, the which ought to haue béene deliuered vnto the archbiſhop of Reimes as in pledge, who had trauelled as a meane betwixt the French king to whom he was vncle, and the king of England to whom he was couſine, procuring a meeting for agreement to be had betwixt them at a certeine place betwixt Vaucolour and Tulle in the borders of Lorraine. But notwithſtanding all that he could doo, matters were ſo farre out of frame, and ſuch miſtruſt was entred into the minds of the parties, that no concluſion held. So that all the hope which king Richard had, was by paiment of his ranſome to redéeme his libertie, and then to ſhift with things as he might. And ſo finallie when the monie was once readie, or rather a ſufficient portion thereof, the ſame was conueied ouer into Germanie, and paiment made to the emperour of the more part of the kings ranſome, and ſufficient pledges left with him for the reſt, as the archbiſhop of Rouen, the biſhop of Bath [Baldwin Wac] and other which were of late come out of England to ſee and ſalute the king.

R. Houed.
King Richard releaſed out of captiuitie.

Herevpon king Richard, after he had beene priſoner one yeare, ſix weekes, and three daies, was ſet at libertie on Candlemaſſe day (as moſt writers agree) and then with long and haſtie iournies, not keeping the high waies, he haſted forth towards England. It is reported that if he had lingred by the way, he had beene eftſoones apprehended. For the emperour being incenſed againſt him by ambaſſadors that came from the French king, immediatlie after he was ſet forward, began to repent himſelfe in that he had ſuffered him ſo ſoone to depart from him, and herevpon ſent men after him with all ſpeed to bring him backe if they could by any meanes ouertake him, meaning as then to haue kept him in perpetuall priſon.

R. Houed.
The offers of the French K. and erle Iohn to haue the K. of England kept ſtill in priſon.

Some write that thoſe ambaſſadours ſent from the French king, with other from earle Iohn, came to the emperor before king Richard was deliuered, offering in the French kings name fiftie thouſand marks of ſiluer, and in the name of earle Iohn thirtie thouſand, vpon condition that K. Richard might remaine ſtill in captiuitie vntill the feaſt of S. Michaell next inſuing; or elſe if it might ſo pleaſe him, he ſhould receiue a thouſand pounds of ſiluer for euerie moneth, whileſt king Richard ſhould be deteined in his priſon, or otherwiſe fiftie thouſand marks of ſiluer more than the firſt offer, at one entire paiment, if he would deliuer him into their hands, or at the leaſtwiſe to keepe him priſoner by the terme of one whole yeare.

The emperour hearing of ſuch large offers, and yet hoping for more, contrarie to his promiſe and letters patents therefore granted, prorogued the day in which king Richard ſhould haue beene ſet at libertie, till Candlemaſſe after, at which day he was brought from Haguenaw vnto Spiers, where the emperour had called a councell to intreat further of the matter touching his redemption. Here the emperour ſhewed the letters which he had receiued from the French king and earle Iohn vnto king Richard, who vpon ſight and peruſing of the ſame, was maruellouſlie amazed, and began to deſpaire of all ſpeedie deliuerance.

The princes that had vndertaken for the emperor to performe the couenants.

Indeed the emperour ſought delaies vpon a couetous deſire of the monie offered by the French king and earle Iohn, but yet ſuch princes and great lords as had vndertaken for the emperour, that the couenants and articles on his part agreed vpon in the accord paſſed betwixt him and king Richard, ſhould be in ech behalfe performed [that is to ſaie, the archbiſhops of Ments, Cullen, and Saltzburge, the biſhops of Wormes, Spiers, and Liege, the dukes of Suaben, Auſtrich, & Louain, the Palſgraue of the Rhine, and others] came to the emperour, and reprouing him for his couetous mind, in that he deferred the reſtoring of king Richard to his libertie, contrarie to the compoſition, did ſo much preuaile, that the emperour receiuing pledges for the paiment of the monie yet behind (as before ye haue heard) releaſed king Richard out of captiuitie on the ſecond or (as Roger Houeden ſaith) the fourth day of Februarie, being a diſmall day and an infortunate (as they note them in kalendars.) And where the king would haue left Robert de Nouant the biſhop of Couentries brother for a pledge amongſt the other, he refuſed to be one of the number, alledging that he was ſeruant to earle Iohn. King Richard greeuouſlie offended herewith, commanded that he ſhould be apprehended, and committed to priſon, & ſo he was. This Robert was one of thoſe that came with the letters from the French king and earle Iohn to the emperour, about the ſtaieng of king Richards deliuerance.

Robert de Nouant.

Furthermore, king Richard the ſame day in which he was reſtored to libertie, ſummoned by his letters Hugh Nouant biſhop of Couentrie, to appeare in his court, to anſwer ſuch things as were to be obiected againſt him, both before ſpirituall iudges in that he was a biſhop, and alſo before temporall in that he had holden and exerciſed a temporall office. On the verie ſame day alſo the emperour and the princes of the empire, ſent letters vnder their hands and ſeales to the French king, and to Iohn erle of Mortaigne, commanding them immediatlie vpon ſight of the ſame letters, to reſtore vnto king Richard all thoſe caſtels, cities, townes, lands, and other things, which they had taken from him during the time of his remaining in captiuitie, and if they refuſed thus to doo, then they gaue them to vnderſtand by the ſame letters, that they would aid king Richard to recouer that by force, which had beene wrongfullie taken from him.

Yeerelie penſions giuen by the king to certeine princes of the empire.

Memburge.

Moreouer king Richard gaue and by his deed confirmed vnto ſundrie princes of the empire for their homage and fealtie, certeine yearelie penſions, as to the archbiſhop of Ments and Cullen, to the biſhop of Liege, to the dukes of Auſtrich and Louaine, to the marqueſſe of Mountferrat, to the duke of Meglenburge, to the duke of Suaben the emperors brother, to the earle of Bins, to the earle of Holland, and to the ſonne of the earle of Henault, of all the which, and other mo, he receiued homage, or rather had their promiſe by oth to aid him againſt the French king, which French king, now that he ſawe no hope nor likelihood remaining to bring the emperour to the bent of his bowe for the deteining of K. Richard ſtill in captiuitie, raiſed a power forthwith, & entring into Normandie (the truce notwithſtanding) tooke the towne of Eureux, with diuerſe other fortreſſes thereabouts, and after he had doone miſcheefe inough, as it were wearied with euill dooing, he granted eftſoones to ſtand to the truce, and ſo returned home.

Wil. Paruus.
The French king inuadeth Normandie.

Finallie after king Richard had diſpatched his buſineſſe with the emperour, and the princes of Almaigne, he ſet forward on his iornie towards England, and hauing the emperours paſſeport, came to Cullen, where he was ioifullie receiued of the archbiſhop, the which archbiſhop attended on him till he came to Antwerpe, where king Richard tooke the water in a gallie that belonged to Alane de Trenchmere, but in the night he went into a ſhip of Rie, being a verie faire veſſell, and ſo laie aboord in hir all the night, and in the morning returned to the gallie, and ſo ſailed about the coaſt, till he came to the hauen of Swin in Flanders, and there ſtaieng fiue daies, on the ſixt day he ſet forth againe, and at length in good ſafetie landed at Sandwich the twelfe daie of March, and the morrow after came to Canturburie, where he was receiued with proceſſion, as Ger. Dor. ſaith. From thence he went to Rocheſter, and on the wedneſday being the ſixteenth of March, he came vnto London, where he was receiued with great ioy and gladneſſe of the people, giuing heartie thanks to almightie GOD for his ſafe returne and deliuerance.

R. Houed.

He landed the 20. of March being ſundaie as R. Houeden and Rafe de Diceto write.

¶ It is recorded by writers, that when ſuch lords of Almaine as came ouer with him, ſaw the great riches which the Londoners ſhewed in that triumphant receiuing of their ſoueraigne lord and king, they maruelled greatlie thereat, inſomuch that one of them ſaid vnto him; „Surelie oh king, your people are wiſe and ſubtile, which doo nothing doubt to ſhew the beautifull ſhine of their riches now that they haue receiued you home, whereas before they ſeemed to bewaile their need and pouertie, whileſt you remained in captiuitie. For verelie if the emperour had vnderſtood that the riches of the realme had bin ſuch, neither would he haue béene perſuaded that England could haue béene made bare of wealth, neither yet ſhould you ſo lightlie haue eſcaped his hands without the paiment of a more huge and intollerable ranſome.

The ſame yeare that king Richard was taken (as before is mentioned) by the duke of Auſtrich, one night in the moneth of Ianuarie about the firſt watch of the ſame night, the northweſt ſide of the element appeared of ſuch a ruddie colour as though it had burned, without any clouds or other darkneſſe to couer it, ſo that the ſtars ſhined through that redneſſe, and might be verie well diſcerned. Diuerſe bright ſtrakes appeared to flaſh vpwards now and then, diuiding the redneſſe, thorough the which the ſtars ſéemed to be of a bright ſanguine colour. In Februarie next inſuing, one night after midnight the like woonder was ſéene, and ſhortlie after newes came that the king was taken in Almaigne.

On the ſecond daie of Nouember alſo a little before the breake of the daie, the like thing appeared againe with leſſe feare and woonder to the people (than before) being now better accuſtomed to the like ſight againe. And now the ſame daie and ſelfe houre that the king arriued at Sandwich, being the ſecond houre of that daie, whileſt the ſunne ſhone verie bright and cleare, there appeared a moſt brightſome and vnaccuſtomed clearneſſe, not farre diſtant from the ſunne, as it were to the length and breadth of a mans perſonage, hauing a red ſhining brightneſſe withall, like to the rainbow, which ſtrange ſight when manie beheld, there were that prognoſticated the king alreadie to be arriued.

Rog.Houed. Diuerſe ſieges held at one time.

In this meane while the biſhop of Durham with a great armie beſieged the caſtell of Tickhill; and earle Dauid brother to the king of Scots, with Ranulfe earle of Cheſter, and earle Ferrers, beſieged the caſtell of Notingham, whileſt at the ſame preſent the archbiſhop of Canturburie with a great power beſieged Marleburgh caſtell, the which within a few daies was rendred into his hands, the liues and lims of them within ſaued. Alſo the caſtell of Lancaſter was deliuered to him, the which the ſame archbiſhops brother had in kéeping vnder earle Iohn, and likewiſe the abbeie of S. Michaels mount in Cornwall, the which abbeie Henrie de la Pomerey chaſing out the moonks, had fortified againſt the king, and hearing newes of the kings returne home, died (as it was thought) for méere gréefe and feare. Theſe thrée places were ſurrendered to the archbiſhop before the kings returne, but Tickhill & Notingham held out.

S. Michaels mount.

King Richard being returned into England, and vnderſtanding both how the French king made warre againſt him in Normandie, and that the ſtate of England was not a little diſquieted, by the practiſe of his brother earle Iohn and his complices, ſpeciallie by reaſon that diuerſe caſtels were defended by ſuch as he had placed in them, he thought good with all ſpéed to cut off ſuch occaſions as might bréed a further miſchéefe. Wherevpon he firſt went to Notingham, and within thrée daies after his comming thither (which was on the daie of the Annunciation of our ladie) he conſtreined them that kept the caſtell there in his brothers name, to yéeld themſelues ſimplie vnto his mercie, after they had abidden diuerſe aſſaults, by the which euen the firſt daie the vtter gates were burnt, and certeine defenſes deſtroied, which they had made before the ſame.

The king goeth to Notingham and winneth the caſtel.

Rog.Houed.

The chéefe of them that were within this caſtell to defend it were theſe, William de Vendeuall coneſtable there, Roger de Mountbegun, Raſe Murdac, Philip de Worceter and Ranulfe de Worceter brethren. The morow after the ſurrender was made, the king went to Clipſtone, and rode into the forreſt of Shirewood, where he had neuer béene before, the view whereof pleaſed him greatlie. The caſtell of Tickhill was likewiſe at the ſame time yéelded vnto the biſhop of Durham, who receiued it to the kings vſe, and them that kept it as priſoners, without anie compoſition, but ſtanding ſimplie to the K. mercie. For although thoſe that had theſe caſtels in kéeping, were ſufficientlie prouided of all neceſſarie things for defenſe, yet the ſudden comming of the king (whom they thought verelie would neuer haue returned) put them in ſuch feare, that they wiſt not what to make of the matter, and ſo (as men amazed) they yéelded without anie further exception. The biſhop of Durham bringing thoſe priſoners with him which had yéelded vp this caſtell of Tickhill, came to the king the 27 daie of March, the verie daie before that Notingham caſtell was giuen ouer.

Moreouer, this is to be remembred, that during the ſiege of Notingham, contention aroſe betwixt the two archbiſhops of Canturburie and Yorke, about the carriage of their croſſes. For Hubert archſhop of Canturburie comming thither, had his croſſe borne before him; the archbiſhop of Yorke (hauing no croſſe there at all) was verie ſore offended, that anie other ſhould go with croſſe borne before him in his dioceſſe, and therfore complained hereof to the king. But the archbiſhop of Canturburie mainteined that he had not doone anie thing but that which was lawfull for him to doo, and therevpon made his appeale to Rome, that the pope might haue the hearing and iudging of that controuerſie betwixt them.

Strife betwixt yͤ archbiſhops for carieng of their croſſes.

In the meane time, after the king had got the caſtels of Notingham and Tickhill into his hands (as ye haue heard) he called a parlement at Notingham, where the quéene mother ſat on the right hand of him, and the archbiſhops of Canturburie & Yorke on the left, with other biſhops, earles and barons according to their places. On the firſt daie of their ſeſſion was Gerard de Camuille diſcharged of the office which he had borne of ſhiriffe of Lincolne, and diſpoſſeſſed both of the caſtell & countie. And ſo likewiſe was Hugh Bardolfe of the caſtell and countie of Yorke, and of the caſtell of Scarbourgh, and of the cuſtodie and kéeping of the countrie of Weſtmerland, the which offices being now in the kings hands, he ſet them on ſale to him that would giue moſt. Hereof it came to paſſe, that where the lord chancellour offered to giue fiftéene hundred markes before hand, for the counties of Yorke, Lincolne and Northampton, and an hundred markes of increaſe of rent for euerie of the ſame counties, Geffrey archbiſhop of Yorke offered to the king thrée thouſand markes aforehand, onelie for the countie of Yorke, and an hundred markes yearelie of increaſe, and ſo had the ſame committed to his regiment.

Moreouer in this parlement, the king demanded iudgement againſt his brother Iohn, and Hugh Nouant the biſhop of Couentrie and Cheſter, for ſuch traitorous and moſt diſloiall attempts as they had made againſt him and his countries, and iudgement was giuen that both the ſaid earle and biſhop ſhould haue ſummons giuen them peremptorilie to appeare, and if within fortie daies after, they came not to anſwer ſuch plaints as might be laid againſt them, then ſhould earle Iohn forfeit all that he had within the realme, and the biſhop ſhould ſtand to the iudgement of the biſhops, in that he was a biſhop, and to the temporall lords in that he had béene the kings ſhiriffe.

In this parlement alſo, in the kalends of Aprill, the king procured a ſubſidie to be granted to him, to wit, two ſhillings of euerie plough land through England, which maner of ſubſidie by an old name is called Teemen toll, or Theyme toll. He alſo commanded that euerie man ſhould make for him the third part of knights ſeruice, accordinglie as euerie fee might beare, to furniſh him forth into Normandie. He demanded of the monks Ciſteaux, all their wolles for the ſame yeare. But bicauſe that ſeemed an ouer greeuous burthen vnto them, they fined with him, as after ſhall appeare. The fourth day of this parlement, by the kings permiſſion manie greeuous complaints were exhibited againſt the archbiſhop of Yorke, for extortion and other vniuſt vexations, which he had practiſed: but he paſſed ſo little thereof, that he made no anſwer vnto their billes.

Gerard de Camuille charged with felonie and treaſon.

Moreouer through the procurement of the lord chancellour, Gerard de Camuille was arreigned for receiuing theeues, and robbers, which had robbed certeine merchants of their goods, that were going to the faire of Stamfort; alſo they appealed him of treaſon for refuſing to ſtand to his triall by order of the kings lawes at commandement of the kings iuſtices, bearing himſelfe to be earle Iohns man, and aiding the ſame earle againſt the king. But all theſe accuſations he flatlie denied, and ſo his aduerſaries put in pledges to follow their ſuit, and he put in the like to defend himſelfe by one of his freeholders.

The king of Scots commeth to ſee the king of England.

The ſame daie king Richard receiued the king of Scots at Clipſtone, comming now to viſit him, and to reioiſe with him for his ſafe returne home after ſo long a iournie, and ſo manie paſſed perils. After they had ſpent the time a certeine ſpace in ioy and mirth, the fourth of Aprill at their being togither at Malton, the king of Scots required of king Richard to haue reſtored to him the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland and Weſtmerland, with the countie of Lancaſter alſo, the which in right of his predeceſſors belonged to him (as he alledged.)

A parlement.

King Richard aſſembling a parlement of the Nobles of his realme at Northampton, about ſixteene daies after that the Scotiſh king had made this requeſt, gaue him anſwer that by no means he might as then ſatiſfie his petition: for if he ſhould ſo doo, his aduerſaries in France would report that he did it for feare, and not for any loue or hartie freendſhip. But yet king Richard in the preſence of his mother queene Elianor, and the lords ſpirituall and temporall of his realme togither at that preſent aſſembled, granted and by his deed confirmed vnto the ſaid king of Scots, and to his heires for euer, that whenſoeuer he or any of them ſhould come by ſummons of the king of England vnto his court, the biſhop of Durham, and the ſhiriffe of Northumberland ſhould receiue him at the water of Tweed, and ſafe conduct him vnto the water of Theſe, and there ſhould the archbiſhop of Yorke, and the ſhiriffe of Yorke be readie to receiue him of them, and from thence giue their attendance vpon him vnto the borders of the next ſhire.

A grant made to the king of Scots what allowance he ſhould haue when he came to England.

It was alſo granted to the ſaid king, that he ſhould be attended from ſhire to ſhire by prelats and ſhiriffes, till he came to the kings court, alſo from the time that the king of Scotland ſhould enter this realme of England, he ſhould haue dailie out of the kings purſſe for his liuerie an hundred ſhillings, and after he came to the court, he ſhould haue in allowance dailie for his liuerie, ſo long as he there remained, thirtie ſhillings and twelue manchet waſtels, twelue manchet ſimnels, foure gallons of the beſt wine, and eight gallons of houſhold wine, two pound of pepper, foure pound of cumin, two ſtone of wax, or elſe foure links, and fortie great and long colpons of ſuch candels as are ſerued before the king, and foure and twentie colpons of other candels that ſerue for the houſhold. And when he ſhould returne into his countrie againe, then ſhould he be conueied with the biſhops and ſhiriffes from countie to countie, till he come to the water of Tweed, hauing an hundred ſhillings a day of liuerie, &c: as is before appointed. The charter of this grant was deliuered vnto William king of Scots in the towne of Northampton in Eaſter weeke, by the hands of William biſhop of Elie lord chancellour, in the yeare of our lord 1194, and in the fift yeare of king Richard his reigne.

A councell holden at Wincheſter.

After this, on the fifteenth day of Aprill, king Richard hauing the ſaid king of Scots in his companie came to Wincheſter, where he called a councell, and there in open aſſemblie he highlie commended all thoſe of the Nobilitie, that in his abſence had ſhewed themſelues faithfull, and reſiſted his brother, and ſuch other his complices, which had as diſloiall perſons rebelled againſt him. Here he alſo proclaimed his ſaid brother, and all thoſe that tooke his part, traitours to the crowne, and tooke order for the puniſhment of them, that (being of their faction) could by any means be apprehended.

Furthermore, to put awaie as it were the reproofe of his captiuitie and impriſonment) by the reuiuing of his nobleneſſe, which he had in high eſtimation,

——pretio nam dignior omni eſt Nobilitas, hæc non emitur nec venditur auro)

he cauſed himſelfe to be eftſoones crowned by the archbiſhop Hubert, on the 18 of Aprill, at Wincheſter, and ſo ſhewed himſelfe as a new crowned king (in hope of good ſucceſſe and better lucke to follow) in the preſence of the ſaid king of Scots, who bare one of the three ſwords before him, going in the middle betwixt two earles, that is to ſaie, Hamelin earle of Warren going on his right hand, and Ranulfe earle of Cheſter on his left. The canapie vnder the which he went was borne vp alſo by foure earles, Norffolke, Liſlewight, Saliſburie, and Ferrers. The biſhop of Elie lord chancellour went on the right hand of the king, and the biſhop of London on the left. At dinner alſo the citizens of London ſerued him in the butterie by reaſon of two hundred marks which they had giuen the king that they might ſo doo, notwithſtanding the claime and challenge made by the citizens of Wincheſter, the which ſerued him in the kitchin.

The citizens of London.

The archbiſhop of Yorke was commanded that he ſhould not be preſent at the coronation, leaſt ſome tumult might ariſe about the hauing of his croſſe borne afore him, to the diſpleaſure of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, who ſtood in it, that no prelat within his prouince ought to haue any croſſe borne before him, himſelfe excepted.

A parlement called.

After this, he called a parlement, by vertue whereof he reuoked backe and reſumed into his hands all patents, annuities, fees, and other grants (before his voiage into the holie land) by him made, or otherwiſe granted or alienated. And bicauſe it ſhuld not ſeeme that he vſed a meere violent extortion herein, he treated with euerie one of them in moſt courteous wiſe, bearing them in hand, that he knew well they ment not to let forth their monie to him vpon vſurie, but would be contented with ſuch reaſonable gaine and profit, as had beene raiſed to their vſe in time of his abſence of thoſe things which they held of him by aſſignation in way of lone, ſo that now the ſame might be reſtored to him againe, ſith he ment not to ſell them, but to let them forth as it were to farme for the time, as all men might well vnderſtand, conſidering that he could not mainteine the port of a king without receipt of thoſe profits which he had ſo let forth. With theſe gentle words therefore mixed with ſome dreadfull allegations, he brought them all into ſuch perplexitie, that not one of them durſt withſtand his requeſt, nor alledge that he had wrong doone to him, except Hugh the biſhop of Lincolne, who ſticked not to ſaie, that the king in this demand did them and the reſt open iniurie. The biſhop of Durham loſt his earledome, and was conſtreined to content himſelfe with his old biſhoprike, and to leaue the dignitie of an earle, or at the leaſtwiſe the poſſeſſions which he had bought of the king before his ſetting forward into the holie land.

The moonks Ciſteaux.

Thus the king recouered thoſe things for the which he had receiued great ſummes of monie, without making any recompenſe, where the moſt part of the occupiers had not receiued ſcarſelie a third part of the principall which they had laid forth. For no ſufficiencie of grant, patent, or other writing to any of them before made, did any thing auaile them. Moreouer, where he had borrowed a great ſumme of monie of the merchants of the ſtaple, he wrought a feat with the moonks of the Ciſteaux order to diſcharge that debt. He told theſe moonks that being conſtreined with vrgent neceſſitie, he had borowed that monie of the merchants beyond the ſea, vpon confidence of their good beneuolence, and therefore he required them to extend their liberalitie ſo farre toward him, as to deliuer ſo much wooll in value, as ſhould diſcharge that debt. To be ſhort, the moonks being ouercome with the kings words, threatning kindneſſe vpon them, fulfilled his requeſt. Moreouer not ſatiſfied herewith, he leuied a taſke throughout the realme, exacting of euerie hide of land two ſhillings, according to the grant made to him at Notingham: and the ſame was generallie gathered, as well of the ſpirituall mens lands as of the temporall.

Rog. Houed.

The king of Scots maketh ſuit for Northumberland.

The king of Scots vnderſtanding that the biſhop of Durham had giuen ouer and reſigned the earledome of Northumberland into the kings hands, thought good once againe to aſſaie if he might compaſſe his deſire, and herewith he began his former ſuit afreſh, offering to king Richard fifteene thouſand markes of ſiluer for the whole earledome of Northumberland with the appurtenances, as his father earle Henrie did hold the ſame before. The king taking counſell in the matter, agreed that he ſhould haue it for that monie, excepting the caſtels: but the king of Scots would haue caſtels and all, or elſe he would not bargaine.

Mainpriſe.

Finallie, after he had ſundrie times mooued this ſuit for the hauing of the lands vnto which he pretended a title, and could get nothing of king Richard but faire words, putting him as it were in hope to obteine that he required at his next returne out of France, vpon the 22 daie of Aprill being fridaie, he tooke leaue of the king, and returned towards his countrie, not verie ioifull, in that he could not obteine his ſuit. King Richard in this meane while cauſed all thoſe priſoners that were taken in the caſtels of Notingham, Tickhill, Marleburgh, Lancaſter, and S. Michaels mount, which were of any wealth to be put in priſon, that they might fine for their ranſoms. The reſidue he ſuffered to depart vpon ſuerties, that were bound for them in an hundreth marks a peece, to be forthcomming when they ſhould be called.

Rog. Houed.

Now the king (after he had gathered a great portion of monie, and ordeined diuerſe things for the behoofe of the common-wealth, thereby to ſatiſfie the harts of the people) prepared himſelfe to ſaile into Normandie. But firſt he reconciled the archbiſhop of Yorke, and the biſhop of Elie lord chancellour, aſwell for the apprehenſion & impriſoning of the archbiſhop at Douer, as for the diſhonourable expulſion of the chancellour out of England, in ſuch wiſe that the chancellour ſhould vpon reaſonable ſummons giuen to him by the archbiſhop, ſweare with the hands of an hundred preeſts with him, that he neither commanded nor willed that the archbiſhop ſhould be apprehended. The controuerſie betwixt the two archbiſhops about the bearing of their croſſes, the king would not meddle withall, for (as he ſaid) that perteined to the pope. Yet the archbiſhop of Canturburie complained to king Richard of the iniurie doone to him at that preſent by the archbiſhop of Yorke, preſuming within his prouince to haue his croſſe borne before him. At length when the kings prouiſion was once readie for his voiage into Normandie, he came to Douer, and hearing that the French king had beſieged the towne of Vernueil, and that the ſame was in danger to be taken, he tooke the ſea togither with his mother queene Elianor on the ninth daie of Maie, and tranſporting ouer into Normandie, arriued at Harfleet with an hundred great ſhips fraught with men, horſſes and armour.

The king tranſporteth ouer into France.

The French king raiſeth his ſiege from Vernueil.

N. Triuet.

The French king hearing of king Richards arriuall, and that he was comming with a great power to the ſuccour of them within Vernueil, and was alreadie incamped neere to the towne of the Eagle, he plucked vp his tents in the night before Whitſundaie, and leauing the ſiege, departed from thence, and tooke a certeine ſmall fortreſſe by the waie as he marched, wherein he left a few ſouldiers to keepe it to his vſe. King Richard herewith entring into the French dominions, ſent three bands of ſouldiers towards Vale de Ruell, and went himſelfe vnto Loches, and beſieging that caſtell wan it within a ſhort time. The Normans alſo recouered the citie of Eureux out of the French mens hands, but thoſe that were ſent vnto Ruell, and had beſieged the caſtell there an eight daies without anie gaine, hearing that the French king was comming towards them, departed thence, & came backe to the kings campe, wherevpon the French king comming to Ruell raced it to the ground, bicauſe his enimie ſhould not at anie time in winning it neſtle there to the further damage of the countrie.

Rog. Houed.

The earle of Leiceſter taken priſoner.

About the ſame time, Robert earle of Leiceſter iſſuing foorth of Rouen in hope to worke ſome feat to the damage of the Frenchmen, as he rode ſomewhat vnaduiſedlie in the lands of Hugh Gourney, fell within danger of his enimies, who tooke him priſoner, and a few other that were in his companie. The French king after this came with his armie into the coaſts of Touraine, and marched neere Vandoſme, and there incamped, whereof king Richard being aduertiſed, drew neere to Vandoſme, meaning to aſſaile the French king in his campe, who hauing knowledge thereof diſlodged with his armie earlie in the morning, and fled awaie (to his great diſhonour) in all haſt poſſible. The king of England with his people following in chaſe of the French men ſlue manie, and tooke a great number of priſoners, amongſt whom was the French kings cheefe treaſurer. Alſo the Engliſhmen tooke manie wagons and ſumpters laden with croſſebowes, armour, plate, apparell, and the furniture of the French kings chapell. This chanced about 37 daies after his fleeing in the night from Vernueil, of which two flights of the French king (in maner as ye haue heard) we find theſe verſes written:

Gallia fugiſti bis, & hoc ſub rege Philippo,
Nec ſunt ſub modio facta pudenda tuo.
Vernolium ſumit teſtem fuga prima, ſecunda
Vindocinum, noctem prima, ſecunda diem.
Nocte fugam primam rapuiſti, manè ſecundam,

Engoleſme wonne.

Polydor. Wal. Paruus.

Polydor.

In this meane while certeine rebels in Guien, as the lord Geffrey de Rancin or Rancon, and the earle of Engoleſme with their complices, vpon confidence of the French kings aſſiſtance, ſore diſquieted the countrie. Howbeit, the ſonne of the king of Nauarre, and brother to Berengaria the quéene of England, entring into Guien with an armie, waſted the lands of both thoſe rebels, till he was called home by reaſon of his fathers death which chanced about the ſame time. Shortlie after Geffrey Rancin died, and king Richard comming into his countrie, wan the ſtrong caſtell of Tailleburge by ſurrender, which apperteined to the ſame Geffrey with others, and then going againſt the other rebels, he wan the citie of Engoleſme from him by force of aſſault. All which time the French king ſtirred not, by reaſon that there was ſome communication in hand for a truce to be taken betwixt him and king Richard, which by mediation of certeine biſhops was ſhortlie after concluded, to endure for twelue moneths. The biſhop of Elie was chéefe commiſſioner for the king of England, and this truce was accorded about Lammas, and ſerued to little purpoſe, except to giue libertie to either prince to breath a little, and in the meane time to prouide themſelues of men, munition, ſhips & monie, that immediatlie after the terme was expired, they might with greater force returne to the field againe, for they had not onelie a like deſire to follow the warres, but alſo vſed a like meane and practiſe to leuie monie.

Great exactions.

The colour pretended in leuieng of monie.

For whereas they had alreadie made the temporaltie bare with often paiments, and calling them forth to ſerue perſonallie in the warres, they thought beſt now to fetch a fleece from the ſpiritualtie and churchmen, conſidering alſo that they had béene by reaſon of their immunitie more gentlie dealt with, and not appointed to ſerue themſelues in anie maner of wiſe. To colour this exaction which they knew would be euill taken of manie, they bruted abroad, that they leuied this monie vpon purpoſe, to ſend it into the holie land, towards the paiment of the chriſtian ſouldiers, which remained there vpon the defenſe of thoſe townes, which yet the Saracens had not conquered. King Richard therfore comming to Towrs in Toraine, required a great ſumme of monie of the cleargie in thoſe parts, and the like requeſt he made through out all thoſe his dominions, on that further ſide of the ſea. King Philip for his part demanded likewiſe intollerable tithes and duties of all the churchmen in his territories, and thoſe that had the gathering of that monie ſerued their owne turne, in dealing moſt ſtreightlie with ſillie préeſts, making them to paie what they thought good, though ſometime beyond the bounds of equitie and reaſon.

Rog. Houed. Inquiſitions taken by a iurie of ſundrie matters.

Vſurers.

In September, the iuſtices itinerants made their circuits thorough euerie ſhire and countie of this realme, cauſing inquiſitions to be taken by ſubſtantiall iuries of plées of the crowne both old and new, of recogniſances, of eſcheats, of wards, of mariages, of all maner of offendors againſt the lawes and ordinances of the relme, and of all other tranſgreſſors, falſifiers, and murtherers of Iewes; of the pledges, goods, lands, debts, and writings of Iewes that were ſlaine, and of other circumſtances touching that matter. Likewiſe of the accompts of ſhiriffes, as to vnderſtand what had béene giuen towards the kings ranſome, how much had béene receiued, and what remained behind to receiue. Alſo of the lands that belonged to erle Iohn, and what goods he had, and what he held in demaine, in wards, eſcheats, and in gifts, and for what cauſe they were giuen. Furthermore, of his fautors and partakers, which had made fines with the king, and which not, with manie other articles touching the ſame earle. Alſo of vſurers, and of their goods being ſeized, of wines ſold contrarie to the aſſiſe, of falſe meaſures, and of ſuch as hauing receiued the croſſe to go into the holie land, died before they ſet forward. Alſo of grand aſſiſes that were of an hundred ſhillings land or vnder, and of defaults, and of diuerſe other things, the iurats were charged to inquire, and preſent the ſame.

Iewes.

Iuſtices, ſhiriffes and other officers.

Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie lord chéefe iuſtice.

The iuſtices alſo were appointed to cauſe the manours, farmes and lands which the king held in demaine, or by wards and eſcheats, to be ſurueied by a ſubſtantiall iurie, and to take order for the conuerting of them to ſuch vſe, as the king might be anſwered of the gaines riſing by the ſame at the farmers hands. Alſo, the Iewes were appointed to inroll all their debts, pledges, lands, houſes, rents and poſſeſſions. Moreouer, inquiſition was taken of iuſtices, ſhiriffes, bailiffes, coneſtables, foreſters and other officers belonging to the king, to vnderſtand in what maner they had behaued themſelues in taking and ſeizing of things into their hands, and of all ſuch goods, gifts and promiſes had and receiued by occaſion of leaſure made of the lands of earle Iohn and his fautors, and who receiued the ſame, and what delaie was granted by commandement of Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie, then lord chéefe iuſtice.

Officers driuen to fine for their offices. The king offended with the lord chancellor.

A new ſeale.

In this meane time, whileſt theſe inquiſitions were thus taken in England, king Richard comming forth of Poictou into Aniou, cauſed all the bailiffes and officers of that countrie, and alſo of Maine, to fine with him for their offices. After this, when he came downe into Normandie, he ſéemed in ſhew to be offended with his chancellour the biſhop of Elie, about concluding of the truce with the French king (where as ye haue heard he was chéefe commiſſioner) miſliking greatlie all that was doone therein, and therefore he tooke the ſeale from him, and cauſed a new ſeale to be made, commanding to be proclaimed thorough all his dominions, that whatſoeuer had béene ſealed with the old ſeale, ſhould ſtand in no force, both for that his chancellor had wrought more vndiſcréetlie than was conuenient; and againe, bicauſe the ſame ſeale was loſt, when Roger Malus Catulus his vicechancellour was drowned, who periſhed among other by ſhipwracke, néere to the Ile of Cypres, before the king arriued there, being as then on his iournie into the holie land. Therefore all men had commandement to come to this new ſeale, that they might haue their charters and writings confirmed.

Furthermore, whileſt the truce yet laſted, king Richard ſailed ouer into England, where he cauſed turneis to be exerciſed in diuerſe places, for the better training vp of ſouldiers in feats of warre, that they might growe more ſkilfull and perfect in the ſame, when they ſhould come to the triall of their forces, whereby he raiſed no ſmall ſummes of monie for granting licenſe to his ſubiects ſo to tournie. Euerie earle that would tournie, paid to him for his licence twentie marks, euerie baron ten marks, and euerie knight hauing lands, did giue foure marks, and thoſe that had no lands two marks, to the great damnifieng of the people; hauing learned the common leſſon, and receiued the ordinarie rule followed of all, and neglected of none; namelie,

The charter of this grant was deliuered by the king vnto William earle of Saliſburie, to haue the kéeping thereof: but Hubert Walter the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and lord chéefe iuſtice, made his brother Theobald Walter collector of the monie, for the ſcraping and raking togither whereof, in huge ſums, he put the former ſhifts of extortion and exaction in practiſe.

The tenour of the charter concerning the turnements before remembred.

RIchard by the grace of God king of England, duke of Normandie and Aquitaine, and earle of Aniou, to the reuerend father in Chriſt, Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie, and primat of all England, ſendeth greeting. Know ye that we haue granted turnaments to be kept in England in fiue ſteeds, to wit, betwixt Sarisburie and Wilton, betwixt Warwike and Kenelworth, betwixt Stanford and Warmeford, betwixt Brackeley and Nixburgh, betwixt Blie & Tickhill, ſo that the peace of our land be not broken, nor yet our iuſtices authoritie diminiſhed, nor any damage doone to our forreſts. Prouided that what earle ſoeuer will turney there, ſhall giue to vs twentie markes, a baron ten marks, a knight that hath lands foure marks and he that hath no lands ſhall giue two marks.

Moreouer, no ſtranger ſhall be admitted to turney there, wherevpon we command you, that at the daie of the turnieng, ye haue there two clarkes, and two of our knights to receiue the oth of the earles and barons, which ſhall ſatiſfie vs of the ſaid ſummes of monie, before the turnieng begin, & that they ſuffer none to turney, till (before) they haue made paiment, and haue cauſed to be entred how much & of whom they haue receiued: and ye ſhall take ten marks for this charter to our vſe, whereof the earle of Salisburie, and the earle of Clare, and the earle of Warren are pledges. Witneſſe my ſelfe, at Ville Leueſche, the two and twentith of Auguſt.

Biſhops towne.

Furthermore, ordinances were made and ſet forth for the ſafe kéeping of the peace, ſo that ſuch as would turney, neither by the way in comming or going, or whileſt the turnieng laſted, ſhould violentlie take any thing to ſerue their neceſſarie vſes, without paieng therefore to the owner according to the worth, nor ſhould doo iniurie to any man in any manner of wiſe. But now to the other doings of king Richard, who made no long abode in England at this time, but ſhortlie returned into Normandie, bicauſe he heard that king Philip had an armie readie leuied. Wherefore meaning to buckle with him vpon occaſion offered, he made the more haſt, and being landed there, approched vnto the borders of the French dominions, incamping himſelfe with his armie in the field, to wait for the time that the truce ſhould be expired, leaſt the enimie ſhould in any exploit preuent him. In like manner king Philip hauing with him earle Iohn king Richards brother, kept his ſouldiers and men of warre in a readines with him, to worke any feat that ſhould be thought expedient aſſoone as the truce ſhould end.

I thinke he came not ouer at all into England at this time, but rather ſent his mind vnto the archbiſhop.

Whileſt both theſe kings were thus bent to powre out their malice, and to eaſe their ſtomachs with dint of ſword, there came meſſengers from the pope, exhorting him vnto peace and quietneſſe, but his exhortation little auailed. For they regarding it little or nothing, immediatlie as the truce was expired, got them abroad into the field, & king Richard drew towards Iſoldune, a towne ſituat in the confines of Berrie, whither it was reported that the French king meant to come: and there ſtaid for him a whole day togither. But the French king hearing that king Richard was there to looke for him, thought it beſt not to come there at all. Wherefore king Richard went the next daie vnto a caſtell called Briſon, and tooke it vpon his firſt approch. Then went he to a towne called Nouencourt, and perceiuing the ſame to be ſtrong and well manned, tooke not in hand to aſſaile it till the third daie after his comming thither, at what time he ſo incloſed the ſame round about with diligent watch and ward, that a cat could not haue eſcaped out of the place, neither by daie nor night, but that ſhe ſhould haue béene eſpied. They within being put in feare herewith, yéelded vp the towne the daie next following, in which meane time the French king beſieged Albemarle.

Herevpon king Richard, hauing left a garriſon of ſouldiers in Nouencourt, came to raiſe the enimie from his ſiege, & ſetting vpon the Frenchmen, there began a ſharpe fight: but the Engliſhmen being wearie with trauell of their paſſed iournie, and hauing raſhlie entred into the battell, were not able to indure the Frenchmens violence, ſo that (not without great loſſe) they were conſtreined to retire with ſwift flight, or (to ſaie the truth) to run awaie a maine paſe. The French king hauing thus chaſed his enimies, returned to aſſault Albemarle, woone the caſtell by force, and the towne by compoſition, permitting the garriſon there to depart with all their armour. This doone, he ruinated the caſtell flat to the ground. Robert earle of Leiceſter offered to the French king a thouſand marks ſterling for his ranſome, and to quite claime to him and his heires for euer all the right which he had to the caſtell of Paſcie, with the appurtenances, and to get a confirmation thereof for him both of the pope, and of the king of England: but for that the warre ſtill laſted, the French king tooke a reſpite in anſwering this offer, neuertheleſſe afterwards in the yeare next inſuing, he tooke it, and ſo the earle was ſet at libertie.

Not long after this foreſaid repulſe, the king of England hauing refreſhed his ſouldiers with ſome reſt after their great trauell, went to Million, and giuing aſſault to the towne wan it at the firſt brunt, and made it plaine with the earth. Then was a motion made for peace betwixt the two kings, being now wearied with long wars: whereof when earle Iohn was aduertiſed, who (as it ſhould ſéeme by ſome writers) hauing tarried with the French king till this preſent, began now to doubt leaſt if any agréement were made, he might happilie be betraied of the French king by couenants that ſhould paſſe betwixt them: he determined therefore with himſelfe to commit his whole ſafetie to his naturall brother, and to no man elſe, perceiuing that the French king made not ſo great accompt of him after the loſſe of his caſtels in England, as he had doone before.

Million won and raſed.

A motion for peace.

Herevpon comming to his brother king Richard, he beſought him to pardon his offenſe, and though he had not dealt brotherlie towards him, yet that he would brotherlie forgiue him his rebellious treſpaſſe, adding furthermore, that whereas he had not heretofore béene thankefull for his manifold benefits which he had receiued at his hands, yet he was now moſt ſorie therefore, and was willing to make amends: wherewith he acknowledged the ſafegard of his life to reſt in him, for the which he was bound to giue him thanks, if he would grant thereto. The king moued with his words, made this anſwer (as it is ſaid) that he pardoned him indéed, but yet wiſhed that he might forget ſuch iniuries as he had receiued at his hands, which he doubted leaſt he ſhould not eaſilie doo. Herewith erle Iohn being yet put in good hope of forgiueneſſe, ſware to be true euer after vnto him, and that he would endeuour himſelfe to make amends for his miſdeeds paſt, and ſo was ſhortlie after reſtored vnto his former degrée, honour and eſtimation in all reſpects.

But by ſome writers it ſhould appeare, that earle Iohn, immediatlie vpon concluſion of the firſt truce, came from the French king, and ſubmitted himſelfe to his brother, and by mediation of the quéene their mother was pardoned, receiued againe into fauour, and ſerued euer after againſt the French king verie dutifullie, ſéeking by new atchiued enterpriſes brought about (to the contentation of his brother) to make a recompenſe for his former miſdemeanor, reputing it méere madneſſe to make means to further miſcheefe; for

But at what time ſoeuer he returned thus to his brother, this yeare (as Roger Houeden ſaith) he was reſtored to the earledoms of Mortaigne in Normandie, and Gloceſter in England, with the honour of Eie (the caſtels onelie excepted) and in recompenſe of the reſidue of the earledoms which he had before inioied, togither with certeine other lands, his brother king Richard gaue vnto him a yéerelie penſion amounting to the ſumme of eight thouſand pound of Aniouin monie. ¶ Now here to ſtaie a while at matters chancing here about home, I will ſpeake ſomewhat of the dooings of Leopold duke of Auſtrich, who as one nothing mooued with the peſtilence and famine that oppreſſed his countrie in this ſeaſon, but rather hauing his hart hardened, began to threaten the Engliſh hoſtages that they ſhuld loſe their liues, if king Richard kept not the couenants which he had vndertaken to performe by a day appointed. Wherevpon Baldwin Betun one of the hoſtages was ſent by common agréement of the reſidue vnto king Richard, to ſignifie to him their eſtate. King Richard willing to deliuer them out of further danger, ſent with the ſame Baldwin his coſen, the ſiſter of Arthur duke of Britaine, and the daughter of the emperour of Cypres, to be conueied vnto the ſaid duke of Auſtrich, the one, namelie the ſiſter of Arthur to be ioined in marriage with the dukes ſonne, and the other to continue in the dukes hands to beſtow at his pleaſure.

But in the meane time, on ſaint Stephans day, duke Leopold chanced to haue a fall beſide his horſſe, and hurt his leg in ſuch wiſe, that all the ſurgions in the countrie could not helpe him, wherevpon in extreame anguiſh he ended his life. And whereas before his death he required to be abſolued of the ſentence of excommunication pronounced againſt him by the pope (for apprehending of king Richard in his returning from his iournie made into the holie land) he was anſwered by the cleargie, that except he would receiue an oth to ſtand to the iudgement of the church for the iniurie doone to king Richard, and that vnleſſe other of the Nobilitie would receiue the like oth with him if he chanced to die (whereby he might not fulfill that which the church héerein ſhould decrée) that yet they ſhould ſée the ſame performed, he might not otherwiſe be abſolued.

Duke Leopold catcheth a fall beſide his horſſe and dieth of the hurt.

Wherefore he tooke the oth, and the Nobles of his countrie with him, and therewithall releaſed the Engliſh pledges, remitted the monie that yet remained behind of his portion aforeſaid, and immediatlie therewith died. After his deceaſſe, bicauſe certeine péeres of the countrie withſtood the performance of the premiſſes, his bodie laie eight daies longer aboue ground than otherwiſe it ſhould haue doone, for till ſuch time as all the pledges were perfectlie releaſed, it might not be buried. Alſo Baldwin de Betun approching néere to the confines of Auſtrich, when he heard that the duke was dead, returned with the two ladies vnto his ſoueraigne lord king Richard. Thus (as ye haue heard) for feare of the cenſures of the church were the pledges reſtored, and the reſidue of the monie behind releaſed.

¶ All this was both pleaſant and profitable for king Richards ſoules helth (as may be thought) bicauſe he tooke occaſion therof to amend his owne former life, by conſidering how much he might be reprehended for his ſundrie faults committed both againſt God and man. A maruellous matter to heare, how much frō that time forward he reformed his former trade of liuing into a better forme & order. Moreouer, the emperour gaue to the Ciſteaux monks 3000 marks of ſiluer, parcell of king Richards ranſome, to make ſiluer cenſers in euerie church throughout where they had any houſes: but the abbats of the ſame order refuſed the gift, being a portion of ſo wrongfull and vngodlie a gaine. At which thing, when it came to the knowledge of K. Richard, he greatlie maruelled at the firſt, but after commended the abbats in their dooings, and chéeflie for ſhewing that they were void of the accuſtomed gréedineſſe of hauing, which moſt men ſuppoſed them to be much infected withall.

King Richard this yeare pardoned Hugh Nouant biſhop of Couentrie of all his wrath and diſpleaſure conceiued toward him, and reſtored to him his biſhoprike for fiue thouſand marks of ſiluer. But Robert Nouant the ſame biſhops brother died in the kings priſon at Douer. Alſo whereas the archbiſhop of Yorke had offended king Richard, he pardoned him, and receiued him againe into fauour, with the kiſſe of peace. Wherevpon the archbiſhop waxed ſo proud, that vſing the king reprochfullie, he loſt his archbiſhoprike, the rule of Yorkeſhire which he had in gouernment as ſhiriffe, the fauour of his ſoueraigne, and (which was the greateſt loſſe of all) the loue of God. Moreouer, through the kings requeſt, pope Celeſtine this yeare made the archbiſhop of Canturburie legat of all England by his buls directed to him, bearing date at his palace in Rome called Lateran the fifteenth kalends of Aprill, in the fourth yeare of his papaſie. Furthermore, the pope wrote to the Engliſh cleargie, giuing them to vnderſtand that he had created the ſaid archbiſhop of Canturburie his legat, commanding them ſo to accept him: by vertue of which letters, the archbiſhop Hubert being now both archbiſhop of Canturburie, legat of the apoſtolike ſée, and lord chéefe iuſtice of England, appointed to hold a councell at Yorke, and therefore gaue knowledge by the abbat of Binham in Northfolke, and one maiſter Geruiſe, vnto the canons of Yorke, and to the archbiſhops officials of his purpoſed intention.

Herewith he came to Yorke vpon ſaint Barnabies daie being ſundaie, and was receiued with proceſſion. On the morrow after,he held a court of plees of the crowne,of aſſiſes,and ſuch other matters touching the king. On the next day being Tueſday,he entred into the monaſterie of ſaint Maries in Yorke,and depoſed the abbat,bicauſe of his infirmitie of bodie,at the requeſt of the monks, but the abbat appealed to the popes conſiſtorie. Then he aſſembled the cleargie in the church of Saint Peter in Yorke, and there held a ſynod for reformation of things amiſſe in the church,and amendment of manners in the cleargie, ſo that diuerſe decrées were made,the which for bréefeneſſe we omit to ſpeake of in particular. This yeare alſo, the ſaid archbiſhop Hubert cauſed all men throughout the realme of England to receiue an oth of obſeruing the kings peace,and to ſweare that they ſhould not be robbers, nor abbettors of robbers,nor in any wiſe conſenting vnto them,but ſhould doo what in them might lie to apprehend all ſuch offendors,and to diſcouer them to the kings officers to be apprehended, and to purſue them vpon hew and crie to the vttermoſt of their powers, and thoſe that withdrew themſelues from ſuch purſuit, ſhould be apprehended as partakers with the offendors.

About this time the emperour ſent to king Richard, requiring him in no wiſe to conclude any peace with the French king,but rather to inuade his dominions, promiſing to aid him all that he might. But king Richard,to vnderſtand further of the emperours mind herein, ſent ouer his chancellour the biſhop of Elie vnto him in ambaſſage. In the meane time the warre was ſtill continued betwixt him and the French, by the which they were commonlie put to the worſe,and king Richard inuading their borders, did much hurt in waſting the countries on each ſide.The French king was at one time ſo narrowlie chaſed, that as he would haue paſſed a bridge that laie ouer the water of Saine, he was in danger of drowning by the fall of the ſame vnder him,but yet at the length he eſcaped, and got to the further ſide.

After this, the two kings came to a communication togither,in the which a motion was made, that Lewes the French king his ſonne and heire ſhould haue the ſiſter of Arthur duke of Britaine in marriage,and that king Richard in conſideration thereof ſhould ſurrender vnto them and to their heires the townes of Giſors,Bademont, with the countrie of Veulqueſſine or Veuxine le Normant, Vernon, Iuerie and Paſcie; and further ſhould giue vnto them twentie thouſand marks of ſiluer. On the other ſide it was moued,that the French king ſhould reſigne vnto king Richard all that he could demand in the countie of Engeuleſme,and ſhould reſtore vnto him the counties of Albemarle and Augie, with the caſtell of Arkes,and all other caſtels which he had taken in Normandie, or in any partie during theſe laſt warres. But there was a reſpit taken for the full concluding and aſſuring of theſe conditions, till the octaues of All ſaints, that king Richard might vnderſtand the emperours pleaſure,without whoſe conſent he might not conclude any thing concerning that matter,bicauſe he had ſent ſuch word vnto him by the lord chancellour, who at this time was attendant in his court.

In the meane time,the emperour being aduertiſed of the whole matter,and of the articles afore mentioned,gaue knowledge to king Richard by the biſhop of Elie at his returning backe, that this forme of peace nothing liked him, but rather made directlie to his diſcontentment : the which leaſt he might ſéeme to ſaie without ſufficient ground of reaſon, he alledged, that it ſhould ſound to king Richards diſhonour, if he ſurrendred and gaue vp anie thing that he had not in poſſeſſion. And to encourage him to recouer thoſe things which had beene taken from him,the emperour pardoned him of the ſeauentéene thouſand marks of ſiluer,which yet remained behind due to him for the kings ranſome. Howſoeuer the matter paſſed, the two kings met not in the octaues of All ſaints, according to the appointment, although they were come, and approched verie néere to the place where they ſhould haue communed togither : but through the diſſimulation of the Frenchmen,they departed,without ſéeing one another, and immediatlie began the warre as fiercelie as at anie time before.

But king Richard aduertiſed thereof, came with quicke ſpéed (making of thrée daies iournie but one)and entred into the caſtell of Iſoldun to defend the ſame againſt his aduerſaries : and forthwith there reſorted ſuch numbers of men vnto him, when they heard how he was beſieged, that the French king doubting how to retire from thence in ſafetie, made ſuit firſt to haue licence to depart, and after when that would not be granted, he required at the leaſtwiſe to talke with the king of England about ſome agréement.

The abbat of Caen ſent into England.

At this time king Richard ſent the abbat of Caen (who was alſo the elect of Durham) into England, to take an accompts of thoſe that had the receipts of the kings monie: for this abbat had informed the king, that his receiuers and officers here in the realme dealt not iuſtlie in making their accompts, but both deceiued the king, and oppreſſed his people, in exacting more than was due, and concealing that which they ought to ſtand accomptable for. The king ſuppoſing his words to be true, or at leaſt likelie ſo to be, and that in reforming ſuch vntruth in his officers, it ſhould be both profitable to him, and well liked of the people, ſent this abbat ouer with commiſſion, to be as it were his generall auditour.

Fraudulent dealing in officers.

Howbeit, Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie, which was gouernour of the realme in cauſes both temporall and ſpirituall (by reaſon he had the kings authoritie as his vicegerent, & therefore ſufficientlie countenanced, & alſo the popes as his legat authoriſed) did ſomewhat ſtomach the matter, in that it ſhould be thought he did ſuffer ſuch abuſes in the kings officers, and not reforme them. But he held him content and ſaid little, ſith the abbat ſhewed him the kings commiſſion to doo that which he went about, although he brought it not to paſſe. For whereas he came ouer in lent, and gaue out commandements, that all ſuch as had any thing to doo in receipt of the kings monie, ſhould appeare before him after Eaſter, he tarried not to ſée Eaſter himſelfe, but was called into another world by the ſtroke of death, there to render accompts for his owne acts here in this life committed.

His oration to the people.

Ger.Dor.

By theſe and ſuch perſuaſions and means as he vſed, he had gotten two and fiftie thouſand perſons, readie to haue taken his part, as appeared after by a roll of their names found in his kéeping, beſides diuerſe inſtruments of iron to breake vp houſes, and other things ſeruing to ſuch like purpoſes. So that he brought the commoners into a great liking of him: but the rich and wealthie citizens ſtood in much feare, ſo that they kept their houſes, in armes, in doubt to be robbed and murthred by him in the night ſeaſon.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie (vnto whome the rule of the realme chéefelie belonged) being aduertiſed hereof, ſent for the greateſt number of the citizens, and vſing them with gentle words, perſuaded them to deliuer pledges, the better to aſſure him, that no ſuch thing ſhould chance, which was ſuſpected of manie, though he was loth to conceiue any ſuch opinion of them. They being ouercome with his courteous words, gaue vnto him pledges.

He is called before the archbiſhop of Canturburie lord chéefe iuſtice or preſident of the realme.

After this, when the foreſaid William ceaſed not to make congregations of the people, at length the archbiſhop ſent a commandement vnto him, that he ſhould appeare before him and other of the councell, at a certeine prefixed daie, to anſwer to ſuch things as might be laid to his charge. To be ſhort, he did ſo at the time appointed, but with ſuch a rout of the common people about him, that the archbiſhop durſt not pronounce againſt him, but licenced him to depart for that time, giuing him ſoft and gentle words. Howbeit, certeine perſons were then appointed by the ſaid archbiſhop and other of the councell to watch him ſometime, when he ſhould haue no great companie about him, and then to apprehend him.

He fleeth into the church of S. Marie Bow.

His concubine.

Amongſt thoſe that were thus commanded to attach him, were two burgeſſes of the citie, who hauing eſpied a conuenient time for the execution of their purpoſe, ſet vpon him to haue taken him, but he getting an ax, defended himſelfe manfullie: and in reſiſting ſlue one of them, and after that fled into the church of S. Marie Bow, kéeping the ſame not as a place of ſanctuarie, but as a fortreſſe: in ſomuch that by the helpe of ſuch as reſorted vnto him, he defended it againſt his aduerſaries, till with fire and ſmoke they conſtreined him to come forth, and all thoſe that were there with him: amongſt them alſo was his concubine, who neuer left him for any danger that might betide him.

The people regarding the danger of their pledges, came not out to aid him, as it was much doubted they would haue doone. Wherefore being thus attached, he was brought forth, and comming out of the church, the ſonne of that burgeſſe whome he had ſlaine (as you haue heard) ſtrake him verie ſore into the bellie with a kniſe, in reuenge of his fathers death. After this, he was had to his arraignment before the archbiſhop, ſitting within the towre, and being condemned, was from thence drawne with horſes to the place of execution called the Elmes, and there hanged on a gibet, with nine of his adherents, which had defended the church againſt the kings power: and yet for all this, the grudge ceaſſed not, but the common people raiſed a great ſlander vpon the archbiſhop, both for cauſing him to be taken out of the church, where he claimed priuilege of ſanctuarie, and alſo for putting him to death, who was innocent (as they alledged) and not giltie of thoſe crimes that were laid againſt him: who ſought onelie the defenſe of poore people againſt extortioners, and ſuch as were wrong dooers.

An old whoremonger, and a new ſaint.

This rumor roſe ſo faſt, that at length (by bruting abroad, that certeine miracles ſhould be wrought by a chaine, wherein he was bound in time of his impriſonment) he was taken for a ſaint. The place alſo where he ſuffered, was viſited by women, and other ſuperſtitious folks, as a plot of great holineſſe, till at length the archbiſhop cauſed it to be watched, to the end that no ſuch fooliſhneſſe ſhould be vſed there. In fine, the opinion which the people had thus fondlie conceiued of his vertue and innocencie, was by little and little remoued out of their heads, when his acts were more certeinlie publiſhed: as the ſleaing of a man with his owne hands, and the vſing of his concubine within Bowe church, during the time of his being there. Alſo the archbiſhop accurſed a preeſt, which had firſt brought vp the falſe report and fained fable of the miracle wrought by the chaine, whereby the occaſion of idolatrie was firſt giuen, and might eaſilie haue béene continued, if the archbiſhop had not béene the wiſer man, and by ſuch means repreſſed the rumour. ¶ So that we are to note by this example the force of counterfeit holineſſe and feigned harmeleſneſſe in hypocrits,

But now to returne vnto the dooings of king Richard in France. Ye haue heard how a peace was concluded (as ſome haue written) but the ſame continued not long: for the French king ſéeming to repent himſelfe of that he had doone (as is aforeſaid) brake the peace, and raiſing a power, beſieged Albemarle, at length wan it, and raced it downe to the ground, then king Richard gaue vnto him thrée thouſand marks of ſiluer for the ranſome of his knights and yeomen, or demilances (as I may call them) that were taken in that fortreſſe. After this, the French king wan Nouencourt, and earle Iohn tooke the caſtell of Gamages.

The erledome of Poictou.

Iohn Bouchet his doubt.

About the ſame time alſo king Richard gaue vnto his nephue Otho the earledome of Poictou. Which I haue thought good to note out of Roger Houeden, to remoue the doubt of Iohn Bouchet, who in the third part of his annales of Aquitaine, maruelleth at an old panchart or record which he had ſéene, by the tenour whereof it appeared, that this Otho intituled himſelfe duke of Aquitaine and earle of Poictou, being in his caſtell of Monſtereulbonin néere to Poictiers, in the yeare a thouſand, one hundreth, ninetie nine, in preſence of Geffrey de Luſignen, and others, and granted vnto a certeine perſon the office of cutting the monie in the mint of that towne, as by the ſame panchart it further appeareth.

The ſight whereof brought the ſaid Bouchet into a great perplexitie, conſidering that no chronicle which he had either ſéene, or heard of, made mention of any Otho that ſhuld be duke of Aquitaine, or erle of Poictou, either before that time, or after. Where againe it was euident to him, that quéene Elianor the mother of king Richard, as then liuing, named hir ſelfe dutcheſſe of Aquitaine, and counteſſe of Poictou; & likewiſe king Richard intituled himſelfe duke of Aquitaine, and earle of Poictou, euer after he had fianced the earle of Barcelons daughter, as by diuerſe records both of the mother and the ſonne he had ſéene perfect notice. At length yet he geſſeth (and that trulie) that it ſhould be this Otho, to whom the mother and ſonne had aſſigned the dutchie of Aquitaine and countie of Poictou, for the maintenance of his eſtate, he holding the ſame till the yeare 1199, in the which he was made emperour by king Richards good helpe, as after ſhall be ſhewed more at large.

Ranulph erle of Cheſter tooke his wife the dutcheſſe of Britaine priſoner.

About this time alſo as the counteſſe of Britaine, the mother of duke Arthur came into Normandie to haue ſpoken with king Richard, Ranulph earle of Cheſter hir husband meeting hir at Pountourſon, tooke hir as priſoner, and ſhut hir vp within his caſtell at S. Iames de Beumeron: and when hir ſonne Arthur could not find means to deliuer hir out of captiuitie, he ioined with the king of France, and made great hauocke in the lands of his vncle king Richard, wherevpon the king gathered a mightie armie, and inuading Britaine with great force, cruellie waſted and deſtroied the countrie.

A dearth.

The death of the earle of Saliſburie.

Here is alſo to be noted, that in this ſeuenth yeare of king Richard, a great dearth chanced through this realme of England, and in the coaſts about the ſame. Alſo about the ſame time died William earle of Saliſburie, the ſonne of earle Patrike, whoſe daughter and heire king Richard gaue in marriage, togither with the earledome of Saliſburie, vnto his baſe brother, ſurnamed Long Eſpée.

Marchades & Lupeſcaro.

It chanced moreouer about the ſame time, that earle Iohn the kings brother, with certeine capteins of ſuch hired ſouldiors as ſome call Brabanceni; others, the Routs; and the French hiſtories name them Coſtereaux, or Coterels, went abroad to atchiue ſome enterpriſe againſt the biſhop of Beauuois, and other Frenchmen, which had doone much hurt to king Richards ſubiects in thoſe parties. The chéefe leaders of thoſe Routs or Coſtereaux, which went forth with earle Iohn, and ſerued vnder him at that time, were two Prouancois, Marchades & Lupeſcaro. Theſe riding forth into the countrie about Beauuois, made hauocke in robbing and ſpoiling all afore them.

The biſhop of Beauuois taken priſoner.

Anon as Philip the biſhop of Beauuois, a man more giuen to the campe than to the church, had knowledge hereof, thinking them to be a méet preie for him, with ſir William de Merlow and his ſonne, and a great number of other valiant men of warre, came forth into the fields, and encountring with the enimies, fought verie ſtoutlie. But yet in the end the biſhop, the archdeacon, and all the chéefe capteins were taken: the reſidue ſlaine and chaſed. After this, earle Iohn and the foreſaid capteins paſſed forth, and wan the towne of Millie, and ſo returned.

Earle Iohn and Marchades preſented the two prelats with great triumph vnto K. Richard earlie in the morning, lieng yet in his bed, as thoſe that were knowne to be his great enimies, ſaieng to him in French; Riſe Richard, riſe, we haue gotten the great chantour of Beauuois, and a good quiet man (as we take it) to anſwer him in the ſame note, and here we deliuer them vnto you to vſe at your diſcretion. The king ſéeing them, ſmiled, and was verie glad for the taking of this biſhop, for that he had euer found him his great aduerſarie: and therefore being thus taken fighting in the field with armour on his backe, thought he might be bold in temporall wiſe to chaſtiſe him: ſith he (not regarding his calling) practiſed to moleſt him with temporall weapons: wherevpon vpon he committed him to cloſe priſon all armed as he was.

It chanced ſoone after, that two of his chaplins came vnto the king to Rouen, where this biſhop was deteined, beſeeching the king of licence to attend vpon their maiſter now in captiuitie: vnto whome (as it is of ſome reported) the king made this anſwer; I am conſent to make you iudges in the cauſe betwixt me and your maiſter, as for the euils which he hath either doone, either elſe gone about to doo vnto me, let the ſame be forgotten. This is true, that I being taken as I returned from my iournie made into the holie land, and deliuered into the emperours hands, was in reſpect of my kinglie ſtate, vſed according thereunto verie freendlie and honourablie, till your maiſter comming thither (for what purpoſe he himſelfe beſt knoweth) had long conference with the emperour. After which, I for my part in the next morning taſted the fruit of their ouernights talke, being then loden with as manie irons as a good aſſe might not verie eaſilie haue borne. Iudge you therefore, what maner of impriſonment your maiſter deſerued at my hands, that procured ſuch eaſe for me at the emperours hands.

The two chaplins had their mouths ſtopped with theſe words thus by the king vttered, and ſo departed their waies. The biſhop being ſtill deteined in priſon, procured ſuit to be made to the pope for his deliuerance: but the pope, being truelie informed of the matter, and wiſelie conſidering that the king had not taken the biſhop preaching, but fighting, and kept him priſoner rather as a rough enimie, than as a peaceable prelat, would not be earneſt with the king for his deliuerance, but rather reproued the biſhop, in that he had preferred ſecular warfare before the ſpirituall, and had taken vpon him the vſe of a ſpeare in ſteed of a croſier, an helmet in ſteed of a miter, an herbergeon in ſteed of a white rochet, a target for a ſtoale, and an iron ſword in lieu of the ſpirituall ſword: and therefore he refuſed to vſe any commandement to king Richard for the ſetting of him at libertie. But yet he promiſed to doo what he could by waie of intreating, that he might be releaſed.

It is reported by ſome writers, that the pope at firſt, not vnderſtanding the truth of the whole circumſtance, ſhould ſend to king Richard, commanding him by force of the canons of the church to deliuer his ſons the biſhop and archdeacon out of their captiuitie. To whom the king ſent their armour with this meſſage written in Latine, Vide an tunica filij tui ſit an non, that is, See whether theſe are the garments of thy ſonnes or not: alluding to the ſaieng of thoſe that caried Ioſephs coate to Iacob. Which when the pope ſaw, he ſaid: Naie by S. Peter, it is neither the apparell of my ſonnes, nor yet of my brethren: but rather they are the veſtures of the children of Mars: and ſo he left them ſtill to be ranſomed at the kings pleaſure. The biſhop thus ſeeing no hope to be deliuered without ſome agreement had betwixt the two kings, became now through irkeſomneſſe of his bonds, an earneſt mediatour for peace, whereas before he had beene an extreme ſtirrer vp of war. Such a ſchoolemaiſter is impriſonment, & plucker downe of loftie courages. But to proceed.

Anno Reg.8.

About the ſame time the archbiſhop of Rouen put all the countrie of Normandie vnder ſentence of interdiction, bicauſe king Richard had begun to fortifie a caſtell at Liſle Dandelie, vpon a peece of ground which the archbiſhop claimed to apperteine vnto his ſee. The matter was brought before the pope, who perceiuing the intent of king Richard was not otherwiſe grounded vpon any couetous purpoſe to defraud the church of hir right, but onelie to build a fortreſſe in ſuch place as was moſt expedient for defenſe of the countrie about, to preſerue it from inuaſion of the enimies; he counſelled the archbiſhop not to ſtand againſt the king in it, but to exchange with him for ſome other lands: which was doone, and the interdiction by the pope releaſed. The biſhop of Elie lord chancellour, being ſent about this buſineſſe towards Rome, departed this life by the way at Poitiers, in Ianuarie.

Normandie interdicted by ꝧ archbiſhop of Rouen.

The biſhop of Elie departed this life.

But the biſhops of Durham & Liſieux that were ſent with him, paſſed forward, and comming to Rome, informed the pope of the matter, who tooke order with the biſhops (as before is mentioned.) The king gaue to the church in Rouen in recompenſe, his milles which he had in Rouen, ſo that the ſaid church ſhould paie the almes of old time appointed to be giuen for the ſame. He gaue to the ſaid church likewiſe the towne of Diepe, and the towne of Buſſels, ſo that the church ſhould likewiſe paie the almes aſſigned forth of the ſame, being the ſumme of 372 pounds of Aniouine monie: alſo the manour of Louers, and the forreſt of Alermound with the deere and the appurtenances. But now to other doings.

About the ſame time, or not long before, whereas there had beene long contention betwixt the kings of England, and the earles of S. Giles for the earledome of Tholouſe, king Richard by way of aliance fell now at an appointment with the earle Raimond that held thoſe lands: for whereas the counteſſe Conſtance wife to the ſaid Raimond earle of Tholouſe and aunt to king Philip was now departed this life, king Richard concluded a mariage betwene the ſaid earle and his ſiſter Ioane queene of Sicile, ſometime wife to William king of Sicile, ſo that being thus ioined in aliance with the ſaid earle of Tholouſe on the one ſide, he procured a league alſo with Baldwine earle of Flanders on the other, vnto whome he gaue fiue thouſand markes in reward, vpon condition, that he ſhould couenant not to grow to any agreement with the French king without his conſent. Likewiſe Reginold the earle of Bolongne, that was ſonne to the earle of Chaſteau Martine, allied himſelfe with them againſt the French king, and ſo did Baldwine earle of Guines with diuerſe other.

The earle preparing an armie, firſt wan the towne of Dowaie, and then beſieged ſaint Omers, and wan it after fiue weekes ſiege: wherevpon they of Aire yeelded to him; ſhortlie after he entred into Artois, & beſieged the citie of Arras.

At the ſame time king Richard marching towards Giſors, wan in his waie the caſtell of Corſelles, & deſtroied it; that doone, he came to Giſors, and beſieged the towne, waſting all the countrie round about him where he came. The French king being thus troubled with the inuaſion of his enimies in two ſeuerall places at one preſent time, ſent certeine bands of his ſouldiors towards Arras to keepe the earle of Flanders plaie, whileſt he himſelfe went againſt king Richard: and comming vnto Giſors, found it ſtreictlie beſieged of the ſame king, ſo that he wiſt not well how to enter the towne. But yet at length faining to giue battell to king Richard (who vpon deſire to receiue it, came abroad into the field) the French king ruſhed forth with all his whole force to make towards the towne, & ſo got into it, though not without great loſſe and damage of his people.

King Richard not meaning to breake vp his ſiege from before the towne, notwithſtanding the French king had entred it, ſtaied a certeine time of purpoſe to win it, knowing the gaine to be the greater, and his name more famous, if he might atchiue his purpoſe, now that his aduerſarie was within it. But when he ſaw it would not be, he raiſed his ſiege, and departed towards Cleremont, ſpoiling all the countrie by his forrais as he went, ſo that he wan great pillage, wherewith his ſouldiers were loden and made verie rich.

King Philip, after that the king of England was remooued from Giſors (as before yée haue heard) aſſembled a great hoſt, and with banner diſplaied, entred into Normandie, and waſted the countrie from Newburge to Beaumont le Rogier, and that doone, returned into France, licencing his men to returne vnto their homes. About the ſame time, he ſent vnto king Richard, requiring him to appoint fiue champions, and he would appoint other fiue for his part, which might fight in liſts, for triall of all matters in controuerſie betwixt them, ſo to auoid the ſhedding of more giltleſſe bloud. King Richard accepted the offer, with condition, that either king might be of the number, that is, the French king one of the fiue vpon the French part; & K. Richard one of the fiue vpon the Engliſh part. But this condition would not be granted. Herevpon, when ſhortlie after it was ſignified to king Richard, that ſhips vſed to come out of England to ſaint Valerie with victuals, which were ſold and conueied awaie vnto the French K. and other his enimies, he rode to ſaint Valeries, and ſet the towne on fire, and ſuch ſhips of England as he found there he alſo burnt, and hanged the mariners by the necke, diuiding the graine and other victuals which were found in the ſame ſhips amongſt his owne ſouldiors.

At length king Richard and the French king concluded vpon an abſtinence of warre to indure from the feaſt of S. Griffin king of Wales departed this life.

This yeare it was ordeined that meaſures of all manner of graine ſhould conteine one quantitie throughout the realme, that is to ſaie, one reſonable horſſelode, and that the meaſures of wine and ale with all maner of liquors ſhould be of one iuſt quantie according to the diuerſitie of the liquor; alſo that weights ſhould be of like rate throughout the relme, and that cloth ſhould conteine two yards in breadth within the liſts, of perfect goodneſſe throughout, as well in the middeſt as by the ſides, and that one manner of yard ſhould be vſed through the relme. It was alſo ordeined that no merchants within the realme ſhould hang any red or blacke clothes before their windowes, nor ſet vp any pentiſes or other thing whereby to darken the light from thoſe that come to buy their cloth, ſo as they might be deceiued in chooſing thereof.

Weights and meaſures.

Alſo it was enacted that there ſhould be foure or ſix ſubſtantiall honeſt men choſen in euerie towne, and likewiſe in ſhires, with the head officers of cities and boroughes, which had a corporation, to ſée that the aſſiſes aforeſaid were truelie kept, and that if any were found to be offending in the premiſſes, to cauſe their bodies to be attached and committed to priſon, and their goods to be ſeized to the kings vſe: and if thoſe that were choſen to haue regard thereto, were tried to be negligent, ſo that by others, and not by them any offendors chanced to be conuicted before the iuſtices, then ſhould the regarders be put to their fines, for the negligent looking to their offices.

King Richard held his Chriſtmaſſe this yeare at Roan, and Hubert the archbiſhop of Canturburie legat of the apoſtolike ſée, named lord chéefe iuſtice of England, was about the ſame time in the marſhes of Wales at Hereford, and there receiued into his hands the caſtels of Hereford, Bridgenorth and Ludlow, remoouing thoſe that had the ſame in kéeping, and appointing others in their roomes. Afterwards comming by Couentrie, he placed the monks againe in the cathedrall church of that citie, by commandement of pope Celeſtine, and chaſed out the ſecular canons, which the biſhop Hugh Nouant had brought into the ſame church when he remooued the monks.

Monks placed againe in the church of Couentrie.

In the Chriſtmaſſe wéeke alſo there came meſſengers to Rouen from the archbiſhops of Cullen and Mentz, and from other ſtates of the empire, which declared vnto king Richard, that all the princes of Germanie were appointed to aſſemble at Cullen, the two & twentith of Februarie, about the chooſing of a new emperour, in place of the late deceaſſed Henrie: and therefore they commanded him by force of the oth and league in which he was bound to the emperour and empire, that all excuſe of deniall or occaſions to the contrarie ceaſing and ſet apart, he ſhould make his repaire vnto Cullen at the aforeſaid day, to helpe them in chooſing of ſome worthie perſonage that might and was able to haue the empire. King Richard doubting to put himſelfe in danger, bicauſe he had not diſcharged all the debts due for his ranſome, ſtaied at home, but yet he ſent diuerſe noble men thither, and did ſo much in fauour of his nephue Otho, that by the helpe of the foreſaid two archbiſhops of Cullen and Mentz, the ſame Otho Moreouer, about the ſame time king Richard required by the archbiſhop of Canturburie his chéefe iuſtice, an aid of 300 knights to be found by his ſubiects of England, to remaine with him in his ſeruice for one whole yeare, or elſe that they would giue him ſo much monie, as might ſerue to reteine that number after the rate of thrée ſhillings a daie of Engliſh monie for euerie knight. Whereas all other were contented to be contributors herein, onelie Hugh biſhop of Lincolne refuſed, and ſpake ſore againſt the archbiſhop that moued the matter. But how ſoeuer that requeſt tooke place, king Richard (as we find) leuied this yeare a ſubſidie of fiue ſhillings of euerie hide of land within the realme, two commiſſioners, that is to ſay, one of the ſpiritualtie, & a knight of the temporaltie, being appointed as commiſſioners in euerie ſhire, with the aſſiſtance of the ſhiriffe, and others, to ſee the ſame aſſeſſed & rated after an hundred acres of land to the hide of land, according to the cuſtome.

The moonks of Chriſtes church ſend to the pope, complaining of their archbiſhop.

The pope ſendeth to the king.

The ſame yeare alſo the moonks of the houſe of the holie Trinitie, otherwiſe called Chriſtes church in Canturburie, exhibited their complaint vnto pope Innocent, that their archbiſhop Hubert (contrarie to his order and dignitie) exerciſed the office of high iuſtice, and ſate in iudgement of bloud, being ſo incumbred in temporall matters, that he could not haue time to diſcharge his office touching ſpirituall cauſes: wherevpon the pope ſent vnto king Richard, admoniſhing him not to ſuffer the ſaid archbiſhop to be any longer troubled with temporall affaires, but to diſcharge him thereof, and not to admit any ſpirituall perſon from thenceforth vnto any temporall adminiſtration.

He further prohibited by vertue of their obedience, all manner of prelats and men of the church, that they ſhould not preſume raſhlie to take vpon them any maner of ſecular function or office. Wherevpon the archbiſhop was diſcharged of his office of chéefe iuſtice, and Geffrey Fitz Peter ſucceeded in gouernement of the realme in his ſtéed. ¶ Geruaſius Dorobernenſis ſaith, that the archbiſhop reſigned that office of his owne accord, and that not till after his returne from the marſhes of Wales, where he had ouerthrowne the Welſhmen, and ſlaine fiue thouſand of them. Which victorie other aſcribe vnto Geffrey Fitz Peter, which Geffrey (as the ſaid Dorobernenſis ſaith) ſucceeded the archbiſhop in the office of lord chéefe iuſtice, but not vntill Auguſt, in the tenth yeare of the kings reigne.

Anno Reg. 10.

In this yeare, immediatlie vpon the expiring of the truce which was taken till haruest might be ended, the warre betwixt the two kings of England & France began eftſoones to be purſued with like earneſtneſſe as before: wherevpon manie encounters chanced betwixt the parties, with taking of townes and fortreſſes, as commonlie in ſuch caſes it happeneth. Twiſe the French king was put to the worſſe, once in September betwixt Gamages and Vernon, where he was driuen to ſaue himſelfe by flight, loſing twentie knights, and thréeſcore ſeruitors or yeomen, which were taken, beſides thoſe that were ſlaine: and againe, in the ſame moneth on Michaelmaſſe euen betwixt Curſeilles and Giſors, at what time he came to ſuccour Curſeilles, bringing with him 400 knights, beſides ſeruitors, and a great multitude of commons. But the caſtell was woone before he could approch it.

King Richard being aduertiſed of his comming, haſted forth to méet him, and giuing the onſet vpon him, forced him to flée vnto Giſors, where at the entring of the bridge there was ſuch preaſſe, that the bridge brake, ſo that amongſt other, the king himſelfe with his horſſe and all fell into the riuer of Geth, and with much adoo was releeued, and got out of the water, no ſmall number of right hardie and valiant gentlemen being taken at the ſame time, which put themſelues forward to ſtaie the Engliſhmen, till the king was recouered out of that preſent danger. To conclude, there were taken to the number of an hundred knights, and two hundred barded horſſes, beſides ſeruitors on horſſebacke, and footmen with croſſebowes. Amongſt other priſoners theſe are named, Matthew de Montmorancie, Gales de Poits, Iollen de Bray, and manie other alſo innumerable. King Richard hauing got this victorie, wrote letters thereof vnto the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbats earles and barons of his realme, that they might praiſe God for his good ſucceſſe.

Now will we ſtaie the proceedings of the king of France at this time, and make no further relation thereof for a while, till we haue touched other things that happened in England at the ſame ſeaſon. And firſt ye ſhall vnderſtand, that Hugh Bardolfe, Roger Arundell, and Geffrey Hachet, to whom as iuſtices, the counties of Lincolne, Notingham, Yorke, Derbie, Northumberland, Weſtmerland, Cumberland, and Lancaſter were appointed for circuits, held not onelie plées of aſſiſes, and of the crowne, but alſo tooke inquiſitions of eſcheats, and forfaitures of all maner of tranſgreſſions, and of donations of benefices, of marriages of widowes and maids, and other ſuch like things as apperteined to the king, whereby any aduantages grew to his vſe, the which for tediouſneſſe we paſſe ouer. Theſe things were ſtreightlie looked vnto, not without the diſquieting of manie.

Inquiſitions taken.

Herewith came an other trouble in the necke of this former, to diuerſe perſons within the realme, through inquiries taken by the iuſtices of the forreſts: for Hugh Neuill, Hugh Waley, and Heruiſius Neuill, appointed iuſtices itinerants in that caſe, were commanded by the king to call before them archbiſhops, biſhops, earles, barons, knights, and fréeholders, with the réeue, and foure of the ſubſtantiall men of euerie towne or village, to heare and take knowledge of the kings commandement, touching the ordinances of forreſts, the which were verie ſtraight in ſundrie points, ſo that whereas before thoſe that offended in killing of the kings déere were puniſhed by the purſe, now they ſhould loſe their eies and genitals, as the lawe was in the daies of king Henrie his grandfather: and thoſe that offended in cutting downe woods or buſhes, or in digging and deluing vp of turues and clods, or by any other maner of waie made waſte and deſtruction in woods or graſſe, or ſpoile of veniſon, within the precinct of the forreſts, contrarie to order, they ſhould be put to their fines.

Ordinances of forreſts.

Préeſts to be arreſted offending in forreſts.

He gaue commandement alſo, that it ſhould be lawfull to the forreſters to take and put vnder arreſt, as well préeſts and thoſe of the cleargie, as temporall men, being found offenders in forreſt grounds and chaſes. Manie other ordinances were decréed touching the preſeruation of forreſts, and the kings prerogatiue, aduantages and profits riſing and growing by the ſame, as well for ſauing of his woods and waſts, as in pannage and agiſtements, greatlie to the reſtraint of them that might vſurpe or incroch vpon the grounds within the compaſſe of his foreſts.

The church of Lameth.

Ye haue heard before, how the monks of Canturburie did ſend to exhibit a complaint to the pope, for that their archbiſhop tooke vpon him to deale in exerciſe of matters belonging to a temporall man, and not to ſuch a one as had rule ouer the ſpiritualtie: but this was not the cauſe that did greeue them ſo much, as that he went forward with the erection of that church at Lameth, which his predeceſſor archbiſhop Baldwine had firſt begun at Haketon, now called S. Stephans (as before ye haue heard) and after was driuen through the importunate ſuit of the monks to leaue off, and race that which he had there begun, to obeie the popes pleaſure: and after laid a new foundation at Lameth.

The pope cōmandeth the church of Lameth to be raced.

The monks of Canturburie therefore ſtill fearing leaſt that church ſhould greatlie preiudice ſuch rights and liberties, as they pretended, namlie in the election of their archbiſhop, would neuer reſt, but ſtill complained and followed their ſuit in moſt obſtinate maner in the court of Rome, as well in the daies of the ſaid Baldwine, as now againſt Hubert, (when he tooke in hand to continue the worke according to the purpoſe of his predeceſſour the ſaid Baldwine, which was to haue inſtituted a colledge there, and to haue placed ſecular canons in the ſame) and ſuch was the earneſt trauell of the monks herein, that in the end now after the deceaſſe of pope Celeſtine, they found ſuch fauour at the hands of pope Innocent his ſucceſſor, that the ſame Innocent directed his letters of cōmandement to the archbiſhop, and other biſhops of this land, to deſtroie and race the ſame foundation, as a peece of worke derogatorie to the ſee of Canturburie, and verie preiudiciall to the eſtate of holie church.

The archbiſhop at the firſt truſted to be borne out by the king (who was highlie offended with the monks for their preſumptuous dealing) and therfore refuſed to obeie the popes commandement. The king in deed ſtomached the matter ſo highlie, that he ſent letters vnto the monks by no worſſe meſſengers than by Geffrey Fitz Peter, and Hugh Fitz Bardolfe his iuſtices, ſignifieng to them not onelie his high diſpleaſure for their preſumptuous proceedings in their ſuit without his conſent, but alſo commanding them to ſurceaſſe, and not to proceed further in the matter by vertue of anie ſuch the popes letters, which they had purchaſed contrarie to the honour and dignitie of his crowne and realme. Moreouer, he wrote to the biſhops, commanding them to appeale; and to the archbiſhop, forbidding him in anie wiſe to breake downe the church which he had ſo builded at Lameth.

The preſumptuous ſtoutneſſe of the monks.

The ſhiriffe of Kent alſo was commanded to ſeize into his hands all the tenements and poſſeſſions that belonged to the monks (a frie of ſatan, and as one ſaith verie well of them and the like leuen of lewdneſſe, who neuertheleſſe were ſo ſtout in that quarell, that they would not prolong one daie of the time appointed by the pope for the racing of that church. Herevpon the king for his part and the biſhops in their owne behalfes wrote to the pope. Likewiſe the abbats of Boxeley, Fourd, Stratford, Roberts-bridge, Stanleie, and Baſing Warke, wrote the matter to him: and againe the pope and the cardinals wrote to the king, to the archbiſhops, and biſhops: and ſo letters paſſed to and fro, till at length the pope ſent a Nuncio of purpoſe, to ſignifie his full determination, as in the next yeare it ſhall be ſhewed at full.

Welſhmen vanquiſhed. Ger.Dor. aſcribeth this victorie vnto Hubert archb. of Canturburie and ſaith there were ſlaine about 500 of the enimies.

Mauds caſtle.

About the ſame time Geffrey Fitz Peter, lord cheefe iuſtice of England, raiſed a power of men, and went into Wales to ſuccour the tenants of William de Brauſe, which were beſieged of the king, or rather prince of that countrie, named Owen, the brother of Cadwalaine, in Mauds caſtell: but the lord cheefe iuſtice comming to the reſkue of them within, gaue battell to the aduerſaries, and vanquiſhing them, ſlue three thouſand of them, and ſeauen hundred of thoſe that were taken priſoners and wounded. And all the while the warres continued in France, the loſſe for the moſt part ſtill redounded to the Frenchmen. Earle Iohn burnt Newburg, and tooke eighteene knights of ſuch as were ſent to the reſkue.

The earle of Leiceſter.

Marchades.

The earle of Leiceſter with a ſmall companie came before the caſtell of Paſcie, which (although the Frenchmen held it) did yet of right belong vnto the ſaid earle. The ſouldiors within iſſued foorth, and being too ſtrong for the earle, cauſed him to flee, for otherwiſe he had beene taken. But returning on the morrow after with more companie about him, and laieng ambuſhes for the enimie, he approched the ſaid caſtell, and trained the Frenchmen foorth till he had them within his danger, and then cauſing his men to breake out vpon them tooke an eighteene knights, and a great multitude of other people. Alſo Marchades with his rout of Brabanders did the Frenchmen much hurt, in robbing and ſpoiling the countries.

About this ſeaſon the archbiſhop of Canturburie went ouer into Normandie to ſpeake with king Richard, and at the French kings requeſt he paſſed into France, to common with him of peace, which the French king offered to conclude, in reſtoring all the townes and caſtels which he had taken (Giſors onelie excepted) and touching the poſſeſſion and title therof, he was contented to put the matter in compromiſe, to the order and award of ſix barons in Normandie to be named by him; and of ſix barons in France which king Richard ſhould name. But king Richard would not thus agree, except the earle of Flanders and others which had forſaken the French king to take his part, might be compriſed in the ſame peace. At length yet in Nouember, there was truce taken betwixt the two kings till the feaſt of S. Hilarie next inſuing.

A truce taken betwixt the two kings.

In the meane time pope Innocent the third, vnderſtanding in what preſent danger things ſtood in the holie land, and on the other ſide, conſidering what a weakening it was vnto chriſtendome, to haue theſe two kings thus to warre with mortall hatred one againſt the other: he thought it ſtood him vpon to trauell betwixt them, to bring them vnto ſome peace and agreement. Herevpon he diſpatched one Peter the cardinall of Capua into France, as legat from the ſee of Rome, vnto the two foreſaid kings, to inſtruct them in what preſent danger the ſtate of the chriſtians in Aſia preſentlie ſtood, ſo that without the aid of them and of other chriſtian princes, it could not be holpen, but needs it muſt come to vtter ruine, and the Saracens yer long to be poſſeſſed of the whole. Therefore both in reſpect hereof, and alſo for the auoiding of the further wilfull ſpilling of chriſtian bloud in ſuch ciuill and vngodlie war, he beſought them to ſtaie their hands, and to ioine in ſome freendlie band of concord, whereby they might with mutuall conſent beſtow their ſeruice in that neceſſarie and moſt godlie warre, wherein by ouercomming the enimies of Chriſt, they might looke for worthie reward at his hands, which is the frée giuer of all victories.

1199

R.Houed.

A truce concluded for fiue yeares.

The cardinall comming into France, and dooing his meſſage in moſt earneſt wiſe, was preſent at the enterview appointed betwixt the two kings in the feaſt of S. Hilarie, but yet could not he bring his purpoſe to full effect: onelie he procured them to take truce for the terme of fiue yeares, further he could not get them to agrée. ¶ The fault by authors is aſcribed aſwell to king Richard, as to king Philip: for king Richard being firſt euill vſed, and put to hinderance, determined either to vanquiſh, or neuer to giue place.

This forbearance from warre was concluded and taken in the yeare 1199 after the incarnation, and tenth of king Richards reigne. But immediatlie after, there aroſe matter of new diſpleaſure betwixt theſe two kings to kéepe their minds in vre with ſecret grudges, though by reaſon of the truce they outwardlie abſteined from declaring it by force of armes. It chanced that in the election of a new emperour, the electors could not agrée, one part of them chooſing Otho duke of Saxonie, nephue to king Richard by his ſiſter Maud, and another part of them naming Philip duke of Tuſcaine, and brother to the laſt emperour Henrie.

Contention about the chooſing of the emperour.

King Richard (as reaſon was) did procure what fauour he could to the furtherance of his nephue Otho: and king Philip on the contrarie part, did what he could in fauour of the foreſaid Philip. At length Otho was admitted by the pope to end the ſtrife: but yet the grudge remained in the harts of the two kings; Philip finding himſelfe much gréeued in that he had miſſed his purpoſe, and Richard being as little pleaſed, for that he had woone his ſo hardlie, and with ſo much adoo. And thus matters paſſed for that yeare.

The popes letters to the king for the church of Lameth.

In the beginning of the next, the popes Nuncio came with letters, not onlie to the archbiſhop and biſhops of England, but alſo to the king himſelfe, ſignifieng the popes reſolute decrée touching the church and colledge of Lameth to be broken downe and ſuppreſſed. Wherevpon the king and archbiſhop (though ſore againſt their willes) when they ſaw no waie longer to ſhift off the matter, yéelded to the popes pleaſure: and ſo the archbiſhop ſent his letters to Lameth, where the 21 daie of Ianuarie they were read, and the 27 daie of the ſame moneth was the church caſt downe, & the canons which were alreadie there placed, had commandement to depart from thence without further delaie. Thus the moonks in deſpite of the king and archbiſhop had their willes, but yet their vexation ceaſſed not, for the king and archbiſhop bearing them no ſmall euill will, for that they had ſo obteined their purpoſe contrarie to their minds and intents, moleſted them diuerſe waies, although the moonks ſtill vpon complaint to the pope, were verie much reléeued, and found great fréendſhip both with him and likewiſe with his court. ¶ So that it may be obſerued that theſe diſhclouts of the popes kitchen haue in all ages, ſince their firſt quickening béene troubleſome and mutinous, ſawcie and inſolent, proud and malapert. In this meane time, king Richard being now at reſt from troubles of warre, ſtudied buſilie to prouide monie, meaning to make a new voiage into the holie land. Therefore finding himſelfe bare of treaſure, by reaſon the French warres had emptied his cofers, he ſet a great tax vpon his ſubiects, and by that meanes, hauing recouered a great ſumme, he builded that notable ſtrong caſtell in Normandie, vpon the banke of the riuer of Saine, named Chateau Galiard: which when it was finiſhed, he fell a ieſting thereat and ſaid; Behold, is not this a faire daughter of one yeares growth. The ſoile where this caſtell was builded, belonged to the archbiſhop of Rouen, for which there followed great ſtrife betwixt the king and the archbiſhop, till the pope tooke vp the matter (as before ye haue heard.)

Chaſteau Galiard built.

After this, he determined to chaſtiſe certeine perſons in Poictou, which during the warres betwixt him and the French king, had aided the Frenchmen againſt him: wherevpon with an armie he paſſed forth towards them, but by the waie he was informed, that one Widomer a vicount in the countrie of Britaine, had found great treaſure: and therefore pretending a right thereto by vertue of his prerogatiue, he ſent for the vicount, who ſmelling out the matter, and ſuppoſing the king would not be indifferent in parting the treaſure, fled into Limoſin, where although the people were tributaries to the king of England, yet they tooke part with the French king.

The annales of Aquitaine.

There is a towne in that countrie called Chalus Cheuerell, into which the ſaid vicount retired for ſafegard of himſelfe, and then gaue the townesmen a great portion of treaſure, to the end they ſhould defend him and his quarell for the reſt. King Richard ſtill following him, as one that could not auoid his fatall ordinance, haſted into the confines of Limoſin, fullie determining either to win the towne by force, if the inhabitants ſhould make reſiſtance, or at leaſt wiſe, to get into his hands the preie, which he ſo earneſtlie purſued. At his firſt approch he gaue manie fierce aſſaults to the towne, but they within hauing throughlie prouided aforehand for to defend a ſiege, ſo reſiſted his attempts, that within thrée daies after his comming, he ceaſſed to aſſaile the towne, meaning to vndermine the walles, which otherwiſe he perceiued would verie hardlie be gotten, conſidering the ſtoutneſſe of them within, and withall, the naturall ſtrength and ſituation of the place it ſelfe.

K. Richard beſiegeth Chalus.

Herevpon therefore on the 26 of March, whiles he (togither with capteine Marchades) went about vnaduiſedlie to view the towne (the better to conſider the place which waie he might conueie the courſe of his mine) they came ſo farre within danger, that the king was ſtriken in the left arme, or (as ſome write) in the ſhoulder, where it ioined to the necke, with a quarell inuenomed (as is to be ſuppoſed by the ſequele.) Being thus wounded, he gat to his horſſe, and rode home againe to his lodging, where he cauſed the wound to be ſearched and bound vp, and as a man nothing diſmaid therewith, continued his ſiege with ſuch force and aſſurance, that within 12 daies after the miſhap, the towne was yéelded vnto him, although verie little treaſure (to make any great accompt of) was at that time found therein.

He is wounded.

Ra.Niger.

In this meane ſeaſon, the king had committed the cure of his wound to one of Marchades his ſurgions, who taking in hand to plucke out the quarell, drew forth onelie the ſhaft at the firſt, and left the iron ſtill within, and afterwards going about moſt vnſkilfullie to get forth the head of the ſaid quarell, he vſed ſuch inciſions, and ſo mangled the kings arme, yer he could cut it, that he himſelf deſpaired of all helpe and longer life, affirming flatlie to ſuch as ſtood about him, that he could not long continue by reaſon of his butcherlie handling. To be ſhort, féeling himſelfe to wax weaker and weaker, preparing his mind to death, which he perceiued now to be at hand, he ordeined his teſtament, or rather reformed and added ſundrie things vnto the ſame which he before had made, at the time of his going forth towards the holie land.

The king deſpaired of life.

He ordeineth his teſtament.

Vnto his brother Iohn he aſſigned the crowne of England, and all other his lands and dominions, cauſing the Nobles there preſent to ſweare fealtie vnto him. His monie, his iewels, and all other his goods mooueable he willed to be diuided into thrée parts, of the which Otho the emperor his ſiſters ſonne to haue one, his houſhold ſeruants an other part, and the third to be diſtributed to the poore. Finallie, remembring himſelfe alſo of the place of his buriall, he commanded that his bodie ſhould be interred at Fonteuerard at his fathers féet, but he willed his heart to be conueied vnto Rouen, and there buried, in teſtimonie of the loue which he had euer borne vnto that citie for the ſtedfaſt faith and tried loialtie at all times found in the citizens there. His bowels he ordeined to be buried in Poictiers, as in a place naturallie vnthankefull and not worthie to reteine any of the more honorable parts of his bodie.

Moreouer he cauſed the arcubaliſtar that wounded him, to be ſought out, whoſe name was Barthram de Gurden, or Peter Baſill (for ſo he named himſelfe as ſome write) who being brought before the king, he demanded wherein he had ſo much offended him, that he ſhould ſo lie in wait to ſlea him, rather than Marchades, who was then in his companie, and attendant on his perſon? The other anſwered boldlie againe, ſaieng; I purpoſed to kill thée, bicauſe thou ſlueſt my father, and two of my brethren heretofore, and wouldeſt alſo now haue ſlaine me, if I had hapned to fall into thy hands. Wherefore I intended to reuenge their deaths, not caring in the meane time what became of my ſelfe, ſo that I might in anie wiſe obteine my will of thée, who in ſuch ſort haſt bereft me of my fréends. The king hearkening vnto his words, and pondering his talke by good aduiſement, fréelie pardoned him, and withall commanded that he ſhould be ſet at libertie, and thereto haue an hundred ſhillings giuen him in his purſſe, and ſo to be let go. Moreouer, he gaue ſtrait charge that no man ſhould hurt him, or ſéeke any reuenge for this his death hereafter. Thus the penitent prince not onelie forgaue, but alſo rewarded his aduerſarie. Howbeit after his deceaſſe, Marchades getting him into his hands, firſt cauſed the ſkin to be ſtripped of his bodie, and after hanged him on a gibet.

A notable example of forgiuing an enimie.
Matth.Paris.

At length king Richard by force of ſickneſſe (increaſed with anguiſh of his incurable wound) departed this life, on the tueſdaie before Palmeſundaie, being the ninth of Aprill, and the xj. day after he was hurt, in the yeare after the birth of our Sauior 1199. in the 44 yeare of his age, and after he had reigned nine yeares, nine moneths, and od daies: he left no iſſue behind him. He was tall of ſtature, and well proportioned, faire and comelie of face, ſo as in his countenance appeared much fauour and grauitie, of haire bright aborne, as it were betwixt red and yellow, with long armes, and nimble in all his ioints, his thighes and legs were of due proportion, and anſwerable to the other parts of his bodie.

King Richard departed this life.

His ſtature & ſhape of bodie.
Gal. Vinſaf.

As he was comelie of perſonage, ſo was he of ſtomach more couragious and fierce, ſo that not without cauſe, he obteined the ſurname of Cueur de lion, that is to ſaie, The lions hart. Moreouer, he was courteous to his ſouldiors, and towards his fréends and ſtrangers that reſorted vnto him verie liberall, but to his enimies hard and not to be intreated, deſirous of battell, an enimie to reſt and quietneſſe, verie eloquent of ſpéech and wiſe, but readie to enter into ieopardies, and that without feare or forecaſt in time of greateſt perils.

His diſpoſition of mind.

Theſe were his vertuous qualities, but his vices (if his vertues, his age, and the wars which he mainteined were throughlie weied) were either none at all, or elſe few in number, and not verie notorious. He was noted of the common people to be partlie ſubiect vnto pride, which ſurelie for the moſt part followeth ſtoutneſſe of mind: of incontinencie, to the which his youth might happilie be ſomewhat bent; and of couetouſneſſe, into the which infamie moſt capiteins and ſuch princes as commonlie follow the warres doo oftentimes fall, when of neceſſitie they are driuen to exact monie, as well of fréends as enimies, to mainteine the infinit charges of their wars.

The vices that were in king Richard.

Hereof it came, that on a time whiles he ſoiourned in France about his warres, which he held againſt K. Philip, there came vnto him a French préeſt whoſe name was Fulco, who required the K. in any wiſe to put from him thrée abhominable daughters which he had, and to beſtow them in marriage, leaſt God puniſhed him for them. Thou lieſt hypocrite (ſaid the king) to thy verie face, for all the world knoweth that I haue not one daughter. I lie not (ſaid the préeſt) for thou haſt thrée daughters, one of them is called pride, the ſecond couetouſneſſe, and the third lecherie. With that the king called to him his lords & barons, and ſaid to them; This hypocrite héere hath required me to marrie awaie my thrée daughters, which (as he ſaith) I cheriſh, nouriſh, foſter and mainteine, that is to ſay, pride, couetouſneſſe, and lecherie. And now that I haue found out neceſſarie & fit huſbands for them, I will doo it with effect, and ſéeke no more delaies. I therefore bequeath my pride to the high minded templers and hoſpitallers, which are as proud as Lucifer himſelfe. My couetouſneſſe I giue vnto the white moonks, otherwiſe called of the Ciſteaux order, for they couet the diuell and all. My lecherie I commit to the prelats of the church, who haue moſt pleaſure and felicitie therein.

Fulco a preeſt

There liued in the daies of this king Richard, men of worthie fame amongſt thoſe of the cleargie, Baldwine archbiſhop of Canturburie, and Hubert who ſucceeded him in that ſée, alſo Hugh biſhop of Lincolne, a man for his worthineſſe of life highlie to be commended. Moreouer, William biſhop of Elie, who though otherwiſe he was to be diſpraiſed for his ambition and pompous hautineſſe, yet the king vſed his ſeruice for a time greatlie to his profit and aduancement of the publike affaires. Alſo of learned men we find diuerſe in theſe daies that flouriſhed here in this land, as Baldwine of Deuonſhire that came to be biſhop of Worceſter in this kings time, and after his deceaſſe, he was aduanced to the gouernment of the archbiſhops ſée of Canturburie, he wrote diuerſe treatiſes, namelie of matters perteining to diuinitie. Daniell Morley well ſéene in the Mathematicals, Iohn de Heram, and Richard de Herham two notable hiſtoricians, Guilielmus Stephanides a moonke of Canturburie, who wrote much in the praiſe of archbiſhop Becket. Beſide theſe, we find one Richard, that was an abbat of the order Premonſtratenſis, Richard Diuiſienſis, Nicholas Walkington, Robert de Bello Foco, an excellent philoſopher, &c. ¶ Sée Bale in his third Centurie.

In martiall renowme there floriſhed in this kings daies diuerſe noble capteins, as Robert earle of Leiceſter, Ranulfe de Fulgiers, two of the Bardulphes, Hugh and Henrie, thrée Williams, Marſhall, Brunell, and Mandeuill, with two Roberts, Ros and Sabeuile. Furthermore, I find that in the daies of this king Richard, a great derth reigned in England, and alſo in France, for the ſpace of thrée or foure yeares during the wars betwéene him & king Philip, ſo that after his returne out of Germanie, and from impriſonment, a quarter of wheat was ſold at 18 ſhillings eight pence, no ſmall price in thoſe daies, if you conſider the alay of monie then currant.

was about the ſeuenth yeere of the ſaid kings reigne, there followed a maruellous ſore death, which daile conſumed ſuch numbers of people, that ſcarſe there might be found any to keepe and looke to thoſe that were ſicke, or to burie them that died. Which ſickeneſſe was a peſtilentiall feuer or ſharpe burning ague. The accuſtomed manner of buriall was alſo neglected: ſo that in manie places they made great pits, and threw their dead bodies into the ſame, one vpon an other. For the multitude of them that died was ſuch, that they could not haue time to make for euerie one a ſeuerall graue. This mortalitie continued for the ſpace of fiue or ſix months, and at length ceaſſed in the cold ſeaſon of winter.

Two ſunnes.

In the octaues of Pentecoſt before this great death, in the firſt houre of the day, there appeared two ſunnes, the true ſunne & another, as it were a counterfeit ſunne: but ſo apparentlie, that hard it was to the common people, to diſcerne the one from the other. The ſkilfull alſo were compelled by inſtruments to diſtinguiſh the one from the other: in taking their altitudes and places, whereby in the end they found the new apparition, as it were, to wait vpon the planet, and ſo continued by the ſpace of certeine houres. At length when the beholders (of whom Wil. Paruus that recorded things in that age was one) had well wearied their eies in diligent marking the maner of this ſtrange appearance, the counterfeit ſunne vaniſhed awaie.

¶ This ſtrange wonder was taken for a ſignification of that which followed, that is to ſay, of war, famine and peſtilence: or to ſay the truth, it betokened rather the continuance of two of thoſe miſchiefs. For warre and famine had ſore afflicted the people before that time, and as yet ceaſſed not: but as for the peſtilence, it began ſoone after the ſtrange ſight, whereof inſued ſuch effect, as I haue alreadie rehearſed.

Thus farre king Richard.

Iohn the yongeſt ſonne of Henrie the ſecond.

Anno Reg. 1.

IOhn the yoongeſt ſon of Henrie the ſecond was proclaimed king of England, beginning his reigne the ſixt daie of Aprill, in the yeare of our Lord 1199, the firſt of Philip emperour of Rome, and the 20 of Philip king of France, K. William as yet liuing in gouernement ouer the Scots. This man, ſo ſoone as his brother Richard was deceaſſed, ſent Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie, and William Marſhall earle of Striguill (otherwiſe called Chepſtow) into England, both to proclaime him king, and alſo to ſee his peace kept, togither with Geffrey Fitz Peter lord cheefe iuſtice, and diuerſe other barons of the realme, whileſt he himſelfe went to Chinon where his brothers treaſure laie, which was forthwith deliuered vnto him by Robert de Turneham: and therewithall the caſtell of Chinon and Sawmer and diuerſe other places, which were in the cuſtodie of the foreſaid Robert. But Thomas de Furnes nephue to the ſaid Robert de Turneham deliuered the citie and caſtell of Angiers vnto Arthur duke of Britaine. For by generall conſent of the nobles and peeres of the countries of Aniou, Maine, and Touraine, Arthur was receiued as the liege and ſouereigne lord of the ſame countries.

Strife amongſt the Engliſh ſubiects on the other ſide of the ſea.

For euen at this preſent, and ſo ſoone as it was knowne that king Richard was deceaſed, diuerſe cities and townes on that ſide of the ſea belonging to the ſaid Richard whileſt he liued, fell at ods among themſelues, ſome of them indeuouring to preferre king Iohn, other labouring rather to be vnder the gouernance of Arthur duke of Britaine, conſidering that he ſeemed by moſt right to be their cheefe lord, forſomuch as he was ſonne to Geffrey elder brother to Iohn. And thus began the broile in thoſe quarters, whereof in proceſſe of time inſued great inconuenience, and finallie the death of the ſaid Arthur, as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter.

Now whileſt king Iohn was thus occupied in recouering his brothers treaſure, and traueling with his ſubiects to reduce them to his obedience, queene Elianor his mother by the helpe of Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie and other of the noble men and barons of the land, trauelled as diligentlie to procure the Engliſh people to receiue their oth of allegiance to be true to king Iohn. For the ſaid archbiſhop and William Marſhall earle of Striguill, being ſent ouer into England (as before you haue heard) to proclaime him king, and to keepe the land in quiet, aſſembled the eſtates of the realme at Northampton, where Geffrey Fitz Peter lord cheefe iuſtice was preſent with other of the Nobles, afore whom thoſe lords whoſe fidelities were earſt ſuſpected, willinglie tooke their oths of obedience to the new king, and were aſſured by the ſame lords on his behalfe, that they ſhould find him a liberall, a noble and a righteous prince, and ſuch a one as would ſee that euerie man ſhould inioy his owne, and ſuch as were knowne to be notorious tranſgreſſors, ſhould be ſure to receiue their condigne puniſhment.

Euſtace Veſcie ſent into Scotland.

They ſent Euſtace de Veſcie alſo vnto William king of Scotland, to ſignifie to him, that king Iohn vpon his arriuall in England, would ſatiſfie him of all ſuch right as he pretended to haue within the Engliſh dominions. And thus was king Iohn accompted and proclaimed king of England by the generall conſent of all the lords and barons of the ſame. The names of the chéefe of thoſe péeres that were ſworne (as you haue heard) are as followeth. Dauid earle of Huntington brother vnto William king of Scots, Richard earle of Clare, Ranulfe earle of Cheſter, William earle of Tutberie or rather Darbie, Walran earle of Warwike, Roger Lacie conſtable of Cheſter, and William de Mowbraie, with diuerſe other, whoſe names I here omit, bicauſe I would not be tedious and irkſome to the readers.

Now the king of Scotland being informed by the lord Euſtace Veſcie (who had maried his daughter) that there was ſome hope to be had on his part, for the recouerie of ſuch ſeigniories as he and his predeceſſours ſomtime held in England, did further diſpatch ſundrie ambaſſadours with full purpoſe to ſend them ouer into Normandie vnto king Iohn, there to require reſtitution of the countries of Northumberland and Cumberland, with their appurtenances, and he promiſed alſo by his letters, that if the ſame might be granted vnto him, in as ample manner as they had béene in times paſt to his anceſtors, he would gladlie do his homage to king Iohn, as to the true & lawfull king of England for the ſame, and furthermore yéeld to him his faithfull ſeruice againſt all men, ſo often as he ſhould be required therevnto. Howbeit when the archbiſhop of Canturburie and the reſt of the councell, vnderſtood that theſe ambaſſadors ſhould paſſe through England, they would not ſuffer them ſo to do, but ſpéedilie ſent Dauid earle of Huntington into Scotland vnto the king his brother, requiring him earneſtlie that he would not ſend any ambaſſadours ouer as yet, but rather tarie, and take patience a while, till the king ſhould come ouer into England: which (as they ſaid) he purpoſed to do verie ſhortlie.

King Iohn alſo hauing vnderſtanding of his purpoſe, ſent ouer the ſaid lord Euſtace againe vnto him with the like requeſt, who in ſuch wiſe perſuaded him, that he was contented to abide a time, in hope of the better ſucceſſe in his late attempted ſuit. And all this was done chéeflie by the working of the kings mother, whom the nobilitie much honoured and loued. For ſhe being bent to prefer hir ſonne Iohn, left no ſtone vnturned to eſtabliſh him in the throne, comparing oftentimes the difference of gouernement betwéene a king that is a man, and a king that is but a child. For as Iohn was 32 yeares old, ſo Arthur duke of Britaine was but a babe to ſpeake of. In the end, winning all the nobilitie wholie vnto hir will, and ſéeing the coaſt to be cleare on euerie ſide, without any doubt of tempeſtuous weather likelie to ariſe, ſhe ſignified the whole matter vnto K. Iohn, who forthwith framed all his indeuours to the accompliſhment of his buſineſſe.

Conſtance dutcheſſe of Britaine.

Surelie quéene Elianor the kings mother was ſore againſt hir nephue Arthur, rather moued thereto by enuie conceiued againſt his mother, than vpon any iuſt occaſion giuen in the behalfe of the child, for that ſhe ſaw if he were king, how his mother Conſtance would looke to beare moſt rule within the realme of England, till hir ſonne ſhould come to lawfull age, to gouerne of himſelfe. ¶ So hard it is to bring women to agrée in one mind, their natures commonlie being ſo contrarie, their words ſo variable, and their déeds ſo vndiſcréet. And therfore it was well ſaid of one (alluding to their diſpoſition and qualities,

When this dooing of the quéene was ſignified vnto the ſaid Conſtance, ſhe doubting the ſuertie of hir ſonne, committed him to the truſt of the French king, who receiuing him into his tuition, promiſed to defend him from all his enimies, and forthwith furniſhed the holds in Britaine with French ſouldiers. Quéene Elianor being aduertiſed hereof, ſtood in doubt by and by of hir countrie of Guien, and therefore with all poſſible ſpeed paſſed ouer the ſea, and came to hir ſonne Iohn into Normandie, and ſhortlie after they went forth togither into the countrie of Maine, and there tooke both the citie and caſtell of Mauns, throwing downe the wals and turrets thereof, with all the fortifications and ſtone-houſes in and about the ſame, and kept the citizens as priſoners, bicauſe they had aided Arthur againſt his vncle Iohn.

After this, king Iohn entring into Aniou, held his Eaſter at Beaufort (which feaſt fell that yeare the 18 day of Aprill) and from thence he went ſtreight vnto Rouen, where on the ſundaie next after Eaſter being S. Marks day, he was girded with the ſword of the dutchie of Normandie in the high church there by the hands of Walter archbiſhop of Rouen. And ſo being inueſted duke of Normandie, receiued the oth according to the cuſtome, that he ſhould defend the church, and mainteine the liberties thereof, ſée iuſtice miniſtred, good lawes put in execution, and naughtie lawes and orders aboliſhed. In the meane time his mother quéene Elianor, togither with capteine Marchades entred into Aniou, and waſted the ſame, bicauſe they of that countrie had receiued Arthur for their ſoueraigne lord and gouernour. And amongſt other townes and fortreſſes, they tooke the citie of Angiers, ſlue manie of the citizens, and committed the reſt to priſon.

The citie of Angiers taken.

This enterpriſe being thus luckilie atchiued, the reſidue of the people in thoſe parties were put in ſuch feare, that of their owne accord they turned to their wonted obedience, ſéeming as though they would continue ſtill therein. The French king all this while conceiuing an other exploit in his head, more commodious vnto him than as yet to attempt warre againſt the Engliſhmen vpon ſo light an occaſion, diſſembled the matter for a time, as though he would know nothing of all that was doone, till the king ſhould be otherwiſe occupied in England about his coronation.

In the meane ſeaſon king Iohn hauing ſet ſome ſtay in his buſineſſe on the further ſide of the ſea, he left his mother ſtill in Guien, to defend that countrie againſt the enimies, and taking the ſea, came ouer himſelfe into England, landing at Shorham, the 25 day of Maie. On the next day, being Aſcenſion éeue, he came to London there to receiue the crowne. On the morow after being Aſcenſion daie, when the Nobilitie and commons were aſſembled, and the king brought into the church of S. Peter at Weſtminſter there to receiue his diademe; Hubert the archbiſhop of Canturburie being chéefe in authoritie and honour, both for his age and calling, ſpake theſe words or the like in ſubſtance before the whole aſſemblie, as followeth.

Hubert the archbiſhop of Canturbu*ries oration to the lords ſpirituall and tem*porall in the preſence of the king, &c.

Moſt honorable lords of the ſpiritualtie, and moſt graue and politike péeres and barons of the temporaltie, you are come hither this day to chooſe you a king, and ſuch a one as (if need ſhould require) may be able of himſelfe to take ſuch a charge vpon him, and (hauing vndertaken the ſame) readie to execute that which he ſhall thinke to be expedient for the profit of his ſubiects; we haue therefore one preſent heere among vs, vpon whome harts and good willes of high and low, rich and poore, doo generallie depend: a man I doubt not, but that for his owne part will applie his whole indeuour, ſtudie, and thought vnto that onelie end, which he ſhall perceiue to be moſt profitable for the commonwealth, as knowing himſelfe to be borne not to ſerue his owne turne, but for to profit his countrie, and to ſeeke for the generall benefit of vs that are his ſubiects.

And albeit I am ſure that you doo well know, how all theſe qualities are moſt abundantlie planted in the perſon of Iohn duke of Normandie (a perſon of high prowesse and no leſſe prudence, for the which yee ought to iudge him right worthie of the gouernement) yet béeing in doubt leaſt the common fame ſhould carrie you awaie, or leaſt you ſhould turne your minds to the fauour of an other, as in reſpect of ſome better right, by title of a more lawfull deſcent of inheritance pretended by others than he hath to ſhew, I require you to giue eare vnto my words: who bearing the ſtate of two manner of perſons, ought to be profitable to my countrie, not onelie by example and exhortation, but alſo by loialtie and good counſell, which hitherto I haue euer ſtudied to performe, and wherein (God willing) I meane to perſiſt, ſo long as I ſhall continue in this mortall and tranſitorie tabernacle.

Therefore whereas at this preſent we haue in hand to conclude vpon ſuch a weitie matter, which béeing once doone, can not be vndoone, I commend vnto you this Iohn, euen with all my verie heart, and iudge that you ought to accept him for your king, who in all things which he ſhall ordeine, purpoſe, or take in hand, ſhall not faile ſo to anſwer your opinions with his well dooing, and ſo ſatiſfie your good expectations alreadie conceiued of him with his diligent prouidence, that all the whole realme ſhall not onelie like of and allow your dooing héerin, but alſo with high commendation extoll the ſame to the verie ſtars. Theſe things do I promiſe vnto you, and ſo farforth as in me may lie, I dare take vpon me all chances and perils that may procéed thereof.

When the archbiſhop had ended his ſpeach, diuerſe held their peace, and manie with great zeale ſaluted king Iohn, whom the ſame daie the ſaid archbiſhop crowned at Weſtminſter, after the maner then vſed with great ſolemnitie, and no leſſe reioiſing of all ſuch as were preſent. At the ſame time alſo he receiued the homages of the lords and barons of the realme, and promiſed with all ſpéed to haue conſideration of things that apperteined as well to religion as to the due execution of laws, whereby euerie man might come to inioie that which was his owne, by right and due courſe of iuſtice. We find that there were preſent at this ſolemnitie and coronation of king Iohn, which was celebrated on the Aſcenſion day the 27 of Maie, archbiſhops and biſhops to the number of ſeauentéene, as Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie, Iohn archbiſhop of Dubline, alſo the archbiſhop of Raguſe, William biſhop of London, Gilbert biſhop of Rocheſter, Iohn biſhop of Norwich, Hugh biſhop of Lincolne, Euſtace biſhop of Elie, Godfrey biſhop of Wincheſter, Henrie biſhop of Exceter, Sefride biſhop of Chicheſter, Godfrey biſhop of Couentrie, Sauarie biſhop of Bath, Herbert biſhop of Saliſburie, Philip biſhop of Dureſme, Roger biſhop of ſaint Andrew in Scotland, and Henrie biſhop of Landaffe in Wales. The biſhop of Dureſme found himſelfe ſomewhat gréeued in the matter, making obiections, that the coronation ought not to be celebrated without the preſence of Geffrey archbiſhop of Yorke: but it preuailed not.

Matth. Paris. Additions to Iohn Pike.

Beſides theſe biſhops, there were of the temporall lords and earles, Robert of Leiceſter, Richard of Clare, William of Tutburie, Hamlin of Warren, William of Saliſburie, William of Chepſtow otherwiſe called Striguille, Walran of Warwike, Roger Bigot, William of Arundell, and Ranulfe of Cheſter, with manie other barons, lords, knights, and no ſmall multitudes of gentlemen and other common people. The ſame daie of his coronation alſo, he inueſted William Marſhall with the ſword of the earledome of Striguille, and Geffrey Fitz Peter, with the ſword of the earledome of Eſſex. For although they were called earles, and exerciſed the adminiſtration of their earledoms; yet were they not till that daie girded with the ſword of thoſe earledoms, and ſo that day they ſerued at the table with their ſwords girded vnto them.

In like maner, Hubert the archbiſhop of Canturburie was made lord chancellour of England; who as he vttered ſome words vnaduiſedlie, that ſhewed how he inwardlie reioiſed at the kings fauour toward him in the gift of this office, and ſo gloried in the honour whereto he was preferred (which he would neuer haue doone, if he had weied of worldlie pompe as by his profeſſion he ought, and as one asketh the queſtion in the ſame caſe:

The coronation being thus ended, it was not long yer there came ambaſſadors from the Scotiſh king, namelie William the prior of May, William the prior of ſaint Colmes Ins, and one William Hay, the which on the behalfe of the ſaid Scotiſh king required reſtitution of Northumberland and Cumberland, with the appurtenances, promiſing that if the ſame were reſtored to him, he would ſerue the king of England with all his power againſt all men then aliue; otherwiſe, that is, if he could not haue thoſe countries, which of right to him apperteined by law, as he pretended, he would doo the beſt he could to recouer them by force.

He alſo ſent to him the biſhop of Dureſme, to require him to come vnto Notingham, where he would meet with him. Howbeit, king William refuſed to come himſelfe as then, but ſent the biſhop of ſaint Andrew, and Hugh Malebiſſe to follow his ſuit, with promiſe to abſteine from any forceable inuaſion of England, by the ſpace of fortie daies, ſo that he might within that terme haue ſome reſolute anſwer from king Iohn, whervnto he might ſtand either on the one ſide or the other.

The French K. inuadeth Normandie.

Whileſt theſe things were a dooing in England, Philip K. of France hauing leuied an armie, brake into Normandie, and tooke the citie of Eureux, the towne of Arques, and diuerſe other places from the Engliſh. And paſſing from thence into Maine, he recouered that countrie latelie before through feare alienated. In an other part, an armie of Britains with great diligence wan the townes of Gorney, Butenant and Genſolin, and following the victorie, tooke the citie of Angiers, which king Iohn had won from duke Arthur, in the laſt yeare paſſed. Theſe things being ſignified to king Iohn, he thought to make prouiſion for the recouerie of his loſſes there, with all ſpeed poſſible. And therevpon perceiuing that the Scotiſh king meant not to meet with him at Notingham whither he was come, and where he kept the feaſt of Whitſuntide, he determined to paſſe the ſeas ouer into Normandie: but firſt he tooke order for the gouernement and defenſe of the realme in his abſence.

He alſo deliuered vnto Roger de Lacie coneſtable of Cheſter, the caſtell of Pomfret, hauing firſt the ſonne and heire of the ſame Lacie deliuered vnto him as an hoſtage for his loialtie and faithfull obedience. This doone, he haſted vnto the ſea ſide, and ſailed ouer into Normandie, landing firſt at Diep, and from thence went to Rouen, whither he came vpon the ſundaie before Midſummer day, which was the 26 of Iune as W. Immediatlie vpon his arriuall in thoſe parts, there reſorted vnto him a great number of ſouldiers both horſſemen and footmen, hoping to be interteined, but by reaſon of ambaſſadours riding to and fro betwixt the two kings, they came to a communication, and tooke truce for fiftie daies. The earle of Flanders being certified thereof, was ſorie in his hart, and loth that the French king ſhould come to any accord with the king of England, and therefore to turne the mind of king Iohn from the purpoſe of peace, he came to viſit him at Rouen, where they renewed the league betwixt England & Flanders, to be the better able to defend themſelues from the French power: and withall determined fullie, that immediatlie vpon the expiring of this laſt truce they would make the French king warre, to reuenge their late receiued iniuries. Wherevpon the cardinall of Capua (being at the ſame time the popes legat in France) interdicted that realme for the taking of the ſame elect of Cambrey, & alſo all Normandie, for the deteining of the biſhop of Beauuois in priſon (who had laine there a long time, & was taken in the field after ſuch manner as is before rehearſed) ſo that the French king was glad to reſtore the elect of Cambrey to his libertie. And likewiſe king Iohn deliuered the biſhop of Beauuois, who paied two thouſand marks, beſides expenſes of diet during the time of his captiuitie, and furthermore tooke an oth, that he ſhould neuer after beare armour in the war againſt any chriſtian or chriſtians.

Arthur duke of Britaine made knight.

About the ſame time, king Philip made Arthur duke of Britaine knight, and receiued of him his homage for Aniou, Poictiers, Maine, Touraine, and Britaine. Alſo ſomewhat before the time that the truce ſhould expire; to wit, on the morrow after the feaſt of the Aſſumption of our ladie, and alſo the day next following, the two kings talked by commiſſioners, in a place betwixt the townes of Butenant and Guleton. Within thrée daies after, they came togither perſonallie, and communed at full of the variance depending betwéene them. But the French king ſhewed himſelfe ſtiffe and hard in this treatie, demanding the whole countrie of Veulqueſſine to be reſtored vnto him, as that which had béene granted by Geffrey earle of Aniou, the father of king Henrie the ſecond, vnto Lewes le Groſſe, to haue his aid then againſt king Stephan. Moreouer, he demanded, that Poictiers, Aniou, Maine, and Touraine, ſhould be deliuered and wholie reſigned vnto Arthur duke of Britaine.

But theſe, & diuerſe other requeſts which he made, king Iohn would not in any wiſe grant vnto, and ſo they departed without concluſion of any agréement. Therfore diuerſe earls and barons of France, which before that time had ſerued king Richard, repaired vnto king Iohn, and tooke an oth to aſſiſt him, and not to agrée with the French king without his conſent: and he likewiſe ſware vnto them, not to make peace with the French king, except they were therein compriſed. In the moneth of September, Ione king Iohns ſiſter, wife to Raimond earle of S. Giles, and ſomtime quéene of Sicile, died at Rouen, and was buried at Fonteuerard. The French king alſo tooke diuerſe townes and caſtels, but amongſt other the caſtell of Balun, and raced the wals thereof downe to the ground, wherewith William de Roches, generall of the armie of Arthur duke of Britaine, was greatlie offended, and did ſo much by his drift, that ſhortlie after a peace was concluded betwixt king Iohn and his nephue duke Arthur, though the ſame ſerued but to ſmall purpoſe.

A peace betwixt king Iohn & his nephue.

The French king hauing (as I haue ſaid) ouerthrowne the wals of Balun, beſieged a fortreſſe called Lauardin, but king Iohn comming with an armie, cauſed him to raiſe his ſiege, and to withdraw himſelfe to the citie of Mauns, whither he followed, and compelled him (mauger his force) to remooue from thence. All this while was William de Roches buſilie occupied about his practiſe, to make king Iohn and his nephue Arthur fréends, which thing at length he brought about, and therevpon deliuered into king Iohns hands the citie of Mauns which he had in kéeping. Alſo the vicount of Tours came to the king of England, and ſurrendred vnto him the caſtell of Chinon, the kéeping whereof he betooke vnto Roger de Lacie the coneſtable of Cheſter. But in the night folowing, vpon ſome miſtruſt and ſuſpicion gathered in the obſeruation of the couenants on K. Iohns behalfe, both the ſaid Arthur, with his mother Conſtance the ſaid vicount of Tours, and diuerſe other, fled awaie ſecretlie from the king, and got them to the citie of Angiers, where the mother of the ſaid Arthur refuſing hir former huſband the earle of Cheſter, married hir ſelfe to the lord Guie de Tours, brother to the ſaid vicount, by the popes diſpenſation. The ſame yere, Philip baſtard ſonne to king Richard, to whome his father had giuen the caſtell and honor of Coinacke, killed the vicount of Limoges, in reuenge of his fathers death, who was ſlaine (as yée haue heard) in beſieging the caſtell of Chalus Cheuerell.

Moreouer, there fell manie great flouds in England, and on the borders of Scotland, by violence whereof diuerſe bridges were borne downe, and amongſt other, the bridge at Barwike. For the building vp againe whereof, ſome variance aroſe betwixt Philip biſhop of Durham and earle Patrike lord chéefe iuſtice of Scotland, and capiteine at the ſame time of the towne of Barwike, who by the Scotiſh kings commandement would haue repared againe the ſame bridge, which could not be doone, but that the one end thereof muſt be builded on the biſhop of Durhams ground, which he would not ſuffer, till by the counſell of the lord William de Stuteuille, he agréed, ſo that the conuention accorded and concluded betwixt the king of Scots and his predeceſſour biſhop Hugh might be reſerued inuiolable.

Furthermore, king Iohn did ſet a rate vpon the prices of wines, as Rochell wine to be ſold for twentie ſhillings the tun, and not aboue. The wine of Aniou for twentie foure ſhillings the tun, and no other French wines aboue fiue and twentie ſhillings the tun, except it were of ſuch notable goodneſſe as that ſome peraduenture for their owne expenſes would be contented to giue after twentie ſix ſhillings eight pence for the tun, and not aboue. Moreouer, the galon of Rochell wine he appointed to be ſold at foure pence: and the galon of white wine at ſix pence. It was alſo ordeined, that in euerie citie, towne, and place where wine was vſed to be ſold, there ſhould be twelue honeſt men ſworne to haue regard that this aſſiſe ſhould not be broken: and that if they found any vintner that ſhould from the pin ſell any wine by ſmall meaſures contrarie to the ſame aſſiſe, his bodie ſhould be attached by the ſhiriffe, and deteined in priſon, till other commandement were giuen for his further puniſhment, and his goods ſeized vnto the kings vſe. Furthermore, if any perſons were or ſhould be found to buy and ſell by the hogſhead or tun, contrarie to this aſſiſe, they ſhould be committed to priſon, there to remaine, till other order were taken for them: neither ſhould there be any regrating of wines that were brought into England. But this ordinance laſted not long, for the merchants could not beare it, and ſo they fell to and ſold white wine for eight pence the gallon, & red or claret for ſix pence.

In the Lent following, he went to Yorke, in hope to haue met the king of Scots there, but he came not, and ſo king Iohn returned backe, and ſailed againe into Normandie, bicauſe the variance ſtill depended betwéene him and the king of France. Finallie vpon the Aſcenſion day in this ſecond yeare of his reigne, they came eftſoones to a communication betwixt the townes of Vernon and Liſle Dandelie, where finallie they concluded an agréement, with a marriage to be had betwixt Lewes the ſonne of king Philip, and the ladie Blanch, daughter to Alfonſo king of Caſtile the 8 of that name, & néece to K. In conſideration whereof, king Iohn, beſides the ſumme of thirtie thouſand markes in ſiluer, as in reſpect of dowrie aſſigned to his ſaid néece, reſigned his title to the citie of Eureux, and alſo vnto all thoſe townes which the French king had by warre taken from him, the citie of Angiers onelie excepted, which citie he receiued againe by couenants of the ſame agréement. The French king reſtored alſo to king Iohn (as Rafe Niger writeth) the citie of Tours, and all the caſtels and fortreſſes which he had taken within Touraine: and moreouer, receiued of king Iohn his homage for all the lands, fees and tenements which at anie time his brother king Richard, or his father king Henrie had holden of him, the ſaid king Lewes or any his predeceſſors, the quit claims and marriages alwaies excepted. The king of England likewiſe did homage vnto the French king for Britaine, and againe (as after you ſhall heare) receiued homage for the ſame countrie, and for the countie of Richmont of his nephue Arthur. He alſo gaue the earledome of Gloceſter vnto the earle of Eureux, as it were by way of exchange, for that he reſigned to the French king all right, title & claime that might be pretended to the countie of Eureux.

Polydor.

The king cõmeth backe againe into England.

By this concluſion of marriage betwixt the ſaid Lewes and Blanch, the right of king Iohn went awaie, which he lawfullie before pretended vnto the citie of Eureux, and vnto thoſe townes in the confines of Berrie, Chateau, Rour or Raoul, Creſſie and Iſoldune, and likewiſe vnto the countrie of Veuxin or Veulqueſſine, which is a part of the territorie of Giſors: the right of all which lands, townes and countries was releaſed to the king of France by K. Iohn, who ſuppoſed that by his affinitie, and reſignation of his right to thoſe places, the peace now made would haue continued for euer. And in conſideration thereof, he procured furthermore, that the foreſaid Blanch ſhould be conueied into France to hir huſband with all ſpéed. That doone he returned into England.

¶ Certes this peace was diſpleaſant to manie, but namelie to the earle of Flanders, who herevpon making no accompt of king Iohns amitie, concluded a peace with king Philip ſhortlie after, and ment to make warre againſt the infidels in the eaſt parts, wherby we may ſée the diſcontented minds of men, and of how differing humors they be, ſo that nothing is harder than to ſatiſfie manie with one thing, be the ſame neuer ſo good,

——ô cæcis mortalia plena tenebris
Pectora, & ô mentes caligine circumſeptas!

Ia. Meir.

But by the chronicles of Flanders it appeareth, that the earle of Flanders concluded a peace with the French king in Februarie laſt paſt, before that king Iohn and the French king fell to any compoſition. But ſuch was the malice of writers in times paſt, which they bare towards king Iohn, that whatſoeuer was doone in preiudice of him or his ſubiects, it was ſtill interpreted to chance through his default, ſo as the blame ſtill was imputed to him, in ſo much that although manie things he did peraduenture in matters of gouernement, for the which he might be hardlie excuſed, yet to thinke that he deſerued the tenth part of the blame wherewith writers charge him, it might ſéeme a great lacke of aduiſed conſideration in them that ſo ſhould take it. But now to procéed with our purpoſe.

King Iohn is diuorſed.

Matt. Weſt.

Matth. Paris.

R. Houed.

King Iohn being now in reſt from warres with forren enimies, began to make warre with his ſubiects purſſes at home, emptieng them by taxes and tallages, to fill his coffers, which alienated the minds of a great number of them from his loue and obedience. At length alſo, when he had got togither a great maſſe of monie, he went ouer againe into Normandie, where by Helias archbiſhop of Burdeaux, and the biſhop of Poictiers and Scone, he was diuorſed from his wife Iſabell, that was the daughter of Robert earle of Gloceſter, bicauſe of the néereneſſe of bloud, as touching hir in the third degrée. After that, he married Iſabell the daughter of Amerie earle of Angoleſme, by whome he had two ſonnes, Henrie and Richard, and thrée daughters, Iſabell, Elianor, and Iane.

Matth. Paris.

Geffrey arch. of Yorke depriued.

Moreouer, about this time, Geffrey archbiſhop of Yorke was depriued of all his manours, lands, and poſſeſſions, by the kings commandement, directed to the ſhiriffe of Yorkeſhire for diuerſe cauſes, for that he would not permit the ſame ſhiriffe to leuie the dutie called Charugage, that was; thrée ſhillings of euerie ploughland within his dioceſſe, rated and appointed to be leuied to the kings vſe, throughout all parts of the realme. Secondlie, for that the ſame archbiſhop refuſed to go ouer with the king into Normandie to helpe to make the marriage betwixt the French kings ſonne and his néece. Thirdlie, bicauſe he had excommunicated the ſame ſhiriffe and all the prouince of Yorke: wherevpon the king tooke diſpleaſure againſt him, and not onelie ſpoiled him (as I ſaid) of his goods, but alſo baniſhed him out of the court, not ſuffering him to come in his preſence for the ſpace of twelue moneths after.

Rog. Houed. A councell called at Weſtminſter by the archbiſhop of Canturburie.

In this yeare alſo, Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie held a councell at Weſtminſter againſt the prohibition of the lord chiefe iuſtice, Geffrey Fitz Peter earle of Eſſex. In the which councell or ſynod, diuerſe conſtitutions were made and ordeined for orders and cuſtomes to be vſed touching the ſeruice and adminiſtration of ſacraments in the church, and other articles concerning churchmen and eccleſiaſticall matters. About the ſame time, king Iohn and Philip king of France met togither néere the towne of Vernon, where Arthur duke of Britaine (as vaſſall to his vncle king Iohn) did his homage vnto him for the duchie of Britaine, & thoſe other places which he held of him on this ſide and beyond the riuer of Loir, and afterward ſtill miſtruſting his vncles curteſie, he returned backe againe with the French king, and would not commit himſelfe to his ſaid vncle, who (as he ſuppoſed) did beare him little good will. Theſe things being thus performed, king Iohn returned into England, and there cauſed his new married wife Iſabell to be crowned on the ſundaie before the feaſt of S. Deniſe, the eight of October.

Arthur duke of Britaine doth homage to the king of England.

King Iohn returneth into England. The quéene is crowned.

At the ſame time he gaue commandement vnto Hugh Neuill high iuſtice of his forreſts, that he ſhould award his precepts vnto all forreſters within the realme, to giue warning to all the white monks, that before the quindene of S. Michaell they ſhould remoue out of his forreſts all their horſſes of Haraz, and other cattell, vnder the penaltie to forfeit ſo manie of them, as after that day chanced to be found within the ſame forreſts. The cauſe, that moued the king to deale ſo hardlie with them was, for that they refuſed to helpe him with monie, when before his laſt going ouer into Normandie, he demanded it of them towards the paiment of the thirtie thouſand pounds which he had couenanted to pay the French king, to liue in reſt and peace, which he coueted to haue doone for reliefe of his people, and his owne ſuertie, knowing what enimies he had that laie in wait to deſtroie him, and againe, what diſcommodities had chanced to his father and brethren, by the often and continuall wars. But now to procéed with other doings.

An ambaſſage ſent vnto the K. of Scots.

Immediatlie after the ſolemnization of the quéens coronation ended, he ſent Philip biſhop of Dureſme, Roger Bigot earle of Northfolke, and Henrie de Bohun earle of Hereford, nephue to William king of Scotland, and Dauid earle of Huntington, brother to the ſaid king, and Roger de Lacie coneſtable of Cheſter, the lord William de Veſcie, and the lord Robert de Ros, which had married two of the daughters of the ſaid king, & Robert Fitz Roger ſhiriffe of Northumberland, as ambaſſadours from him vnto the foreſaid William king of Scotland, with letters patents, conteining a ſafe conduct for him to come into England, and to méet with king Iohn at Lincolne on the morrow after the feaſt of S. Edmund, who gladlie granted therevnto, and ſo according to that appointment, both the kings met at Lincolne the 21 day of Nouember. And on the morrow after king Iohn went to the cathedrall church, and offered vpon the high altar a chalice of gold.

The king of Scots came to the king of England at Lincolne. Matth. Paris. Ran. Higd. R. Houed. Polydor.

On the ſame day, vpon a hill without the citie, the king of Scots did homage vnto king Iohn, in the preſence and ſight of a great multitude of people, ſwearing fealtie of life, limme, and worldlie honour vnto king Iohn, which oth he made vpon the croſſe of Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie. There were preſent at that time, beſide other Noblemen, thrée archbiſhops, Canturburie, Yorke, and Raguſe, with other biſhops, to the number of thirtéene, as Dureſme London, Rocheſter, Elie, Bath, Saliſburie, Wincheſter, Hereford, Norwich, S. Andrews in Scotland, Landaffe, and Bangor in Wales, and Meth in Ireland, beſide a great multitude of earles, barons, and other Noblemen. When the king of Scots had thus doone his homage, he required reſtitution of Northumberland, Cumberland and Weſtmerland, which he claimed as his right and lawfull heritage. Much talke was had touching this matter, but they could not agrée, and therefore king Iohn aſked reſpit to conſider of it till the feaſt of Pentecoſt next inſuing, which being granted, the king of Scots the next morrow being the 23 of Nouember returned homewards, and was conducted backe againe into his countrie by the ſame Noble men that brought him to Lincolne.

The ſame day that the king of Scots tooke his iournie homewards from Lincolne, the corps of Hugh biſhop of that citie (latelie before, departed this life at London, after his returne from the parts of beyond the ſeas) was brought thither to be buried, the king and all the biſhops, earles and barons went to receiue it, and honoured his buriall with their preſence. On the morrow after being fridaie, he was interred within the new church which he had builded. This Hugh was a Frenchman by nation, borne at Granople, a man of a pregnant wit, and ſkilfull both in ſcience of holie ſcripture and humane knowledge. He was firſt a regular canon, and after became a Carthuſian monke. King Henrie the ſecond moued with the fame of his vertue and godlie life, ſent the biſhop of Bath to bring him into England, and after he was come, made him firſt abbat of Whithing in the dioceſſe of Welles, and after created him biſhop of Lincolne.

He was noted to be of a verie perfect life, namelie, bicauſe he would not ſticke to reproue men of their faults plainelie and frankelie, not regarding the fauour or diſfauour of any man, in ſomuch that he would not feare to pronounce them accurſſed, which being the kings officers, would take vpon them the puniſhment of any perſon within orders of the church, for hunting and killing of the kings game within his parkes, forreſts and chaſes, yea (and that which is more) he would denie paiments of ſuch ſubſidies and taxes as he was aſſeſſed to paie to the vſes of king Richard and king Iohn, towards the maintenance of their wars, and did oftentimes accurſſe by his eccleſiaſticall authoritie, ſuch ſhiriffes, collectors, or other officers, as did diſtreine vpon his lands and goods for to ſatiſfie theſe kings of their demands, alledging openlie, that he would not paie any monie towards the maintenance of wars, which one chriſtian prince, vpon priuate diſpleaſure and grudge, made againſt another prince of the ſame religion. This was his reaſon.

A preſumptuous part in a biſhop.

And when he came before the king to make anſwer to his diſobedience ſhewed herein, he would ſo handle the matter, partlie with gentle admoniſhments, partlie with ſharpe reproofes, and ſometime mixing merrie and pleaſant ſpéech amongſt his ſerious arguments, that often times he would ſo qualifie the kings mood, that being driuen from anger, he could not but laugh and ſmile at the biſhops pleaſant talke and merrie conceits, ſo that it might well be ſaid of him,

Omne tulit punctum qui miſcuit vtile dulci.

This maner he vſed, not onelie with the king alone, but with the father and the two ſonnes, that is to ſay, Henrie the ſecond, Richard and John, in whoſe time he ruled and gouerned the ſée of Lincolne. He was after his deceſſe, for the opinion which men conceiued of his holineſſe and vertues, admitted into the number of the ſaints.

Yee haue heard how king John had conceiued no ſmall diſpleaſure againſt the moonks of the white order, for that they would not part with any monie, excuſing themſelues that they might not doo it, without conſent of a generall chapiter of their order. Whervpon the king had cauſed them diuerſe waies to be moleſted, but chéefelie in reſtreining them of libertie to haue any horſſes or other cattell going to paſture within his forreſts. They therefore taking aduiſe togither, choſe foorth twelue abbats amongſt them of that order, the which in all their names went to Lincolne, there to make ſuit to the king (comming thither at this time to méet the king of Scots) that it would pleaſe him to remit his diſpleaſure conceiued againſt them, and to take them againe into his protection.

This ſuit was ſo followed, althongh with ſome difficultie, that at length, to wit, the ſundaie after that the king of Scots had doone his homage, through the helpe and furtherance of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, they came to the kings ſpéech, and obteined ſo much, as they in reaſon might deſire: for he pardoned them of all his paſſed diſpleaſure, receiued them againe into his fauour, tooke them into his protection, and commanded that all iniuries, gréeuances and moleſtations ſhould be reformed, redreſſed and amended, which in reſpect of his indignation had béene offered and doone to them by any manner of meanes. And to ſée the ſame accompliſhed, writs were directed vnto the ſhiriffes of the counties, bearing date from Lincolne the 27 of Nouember. And thus were thoſe moonks for that time reſtored to the kings fauour, to their great commoditie and comfort.

Fiue moones.

About the moneth of December, there were ſéene in the prouince of Yorke fiue moones, one in the eaſt, the ſecond in the weſt, the third in the north, the fourth in the ſouth, and the fift as it were ſet in the middeſt of the other, hauing manie ſtars about it, and went fiue or ſix times incompaſſing the other, as it were the ſpace of one houre, and ſhortlie after vaniſhed awaie. The winter after was extreamelie cold, more than the naturall courſe had béene aforetime. And in the ſpringtime came a great glutting and continuall raine, cauſing the riuers to riſe with higher flouds than they had béene accuſtomed.

Mat. Paris.
Anno. Reg. 3.

In the yeare 1201 king John held his Chriſtmas at Gilford, and there gaue to his ſeruants manie faire liueries and ſuits of apparell. The archbiſhop of Canturburie did alſo the like at Canturburie, ſéeming in déed to ſtriue with the king, which of them ſhould paſſe the other in ſuch ſumptuous appareling of their men: whereat the king (and not without good cauſe) was greatlie mooued to indignation againſt him, although for a time he coloured the ſame, going preſentlie into the north, where he gathered of the countrie there no ſmall ſumms of monie, as it were by way of fining them for their tranſgreſſions committed in his forreſts.

From thence he returned and came to Canturburie, where he held his eaſter, which fell that yeare on the day of the Annunciation of our ladie, in the which feaſt he ſat crowned, togither with his wife quéene Iſabell, the archbiſhop of Canturburie bearing the charges of them and their traines while they remained there. At the feaſt of the Aſcenſion next inſuing, king John ſet out a proclamation at Tewkeſburie, that all the earles and barons of the realme, and alſo all other that held of him by knights ſeruice, ſhould be readie in the feaſt of Pentecoſt next inſuing, with horſſe and armour at Porteſmouth, to paſſe ouer with him into Normandie, who made their appearance accordinglie. Howbeit, a great number of them in the end gat licence to tarrie at home, paieng for euerie knights fée two markes of ſiluer for a fine, which then was a great matter.

Rog. Houed.

But he ſent before him into Normandie William Marſhall earle of Striguille with an hundred knights or men of armes, which he had hired, and Roger de Lacie with an other hundred men of armes to defend the confines of Normandie againſt the enimies: and to his chamberleine Hubert de Burgh he deliuered the like number of knights or men of armes alſo, to kéepe the marches betwixt England and Wales as warden of the ſame. This doone, he pardoned his brother the archbiſhop of Yorke, and reſtored him to all his dignities, poſſeſſions and liberties, confirming the ſame vnto him in as full and large manner, as euer Roger late archbiſhop of that ſée had enioied the ſame: for the which confirmation his ſaid brother vndertooke to paie to the king within the terme of one yeare the ſumme of a thouſand pounds ſtarling: and for the aſſurance thereof, engaged his baronie to the king in pledge.

The archbiſh. of Yorke reſtored.

Ambaſſadors ſent to Scotland.

Moreouer, about the ſame time, the king ſent Geffrey biſhop of Cheſter, and Richard Malebiſſe, with Henrie de Poiſic, vnto William king of Scotland, requiring him that the time appointed for him to make anſwer touching his demand of Northumberland, might be proroged vntill the feaſt of ſaint Michaell the archangell next inſuing, which was obteined, and then the king and quéene (being come to Portſmouth on the mondaie in Whitſunwéeke) tooke the ſea to paſſe ouer into Normandie, but not both in one ſhip, ſo that the quéene with a proſperous gale of wind arriued there at hir owne deſire. But the king was driuen by reaſon of a pirrie, to take land in the Ile of Wight, and ſo was ſtaied there for a time: howbeit, within a few daies after, he tooke ſhip againe at Portſmouth, and ſo paſſed ouer into Normandie, where ſhortlie after his arriuall in thoſe parties he came to an enteruiew with the king of France, neere to Liſle Donelie, where comming a long time togither alone, they agréed ſo well, that within thrée daies after, king John at the French kings requeſt went into France, and was receiued of him with much honour, firſt at S. Deniſe with proceſſion of the cleargie: and there lodging one night, vpon the morrow the French king accompanied him vnto Paris, where he was receiued of the citizens with great reuerence, the prouoſt preſenting vnto him in the name of the whole citie manie rich gifts for his welcome. K. Philip feaſted him alſo in his owne palace, & for his part gaue to him, to his lords, and to his ſeruants manie great and princelie gifts. Moreouer, the league at this time was renewed betwixt them, and put in writing, with this caution, that whether of them firſt brake the couenants; ſuch lords on his part as were become ſuerties for performance, ſhould be releaſed of their allegiance which they owght to him that ſo ſhould breake, & that they might therevpon fréelie become ſubiects to the other prince.

The king paſſeth ouer into Normandie.

He commeth to talke with the king of France.

King John entreth into Paris.

The league renewed.
Matth. Paris.
R. Houed.

These things doone, at length when as king John had remained at Paris with great mirth and ſolace certeine daies, the French king brought him foorth of the citie, and tooke leaue of him in verie louing wiſe.

Walter Lacie meant to haue taken the lord Curcie.

After this king Iohn went to Chinon, & from thence into Normandie; about which time there chanced ſome troubles in Ireland, for where Walter Lacie vnder pretenſe of a communication that was appointed betwixt him and Iohn de Curcie, lord of Vlneſter, meant to haue taken the ſaid Curcie, and for the accompliſhment of his purpoſe ſet vpon him, ſlue manie of his men, and for his ſafegard conſtreined Curcie in the end to take a caſtell which belonged vnto Hugh Lacie, vpon faire promiſes made to him by the ſame Hugh, to be preſerued out of all danger, it came to paſſe, that when he was once got in, he might no more be ſuffered to depart. For the Lacies thought to haue deliuered him to king Iohn, but the ſeruants and fréends of the ſaid Curcie made ſuch cruell war, in waſting and deſtroieng the lands and poſſeſſions that belonged vnto the ſaid Walter and Hugh Lacies, that finallie they were conſtreined to ſet him againe at libertie whether they would or no.

Matth. Paris.

At the ſame time alſo, the kings of France and England gaue large monie towards the maintenance of the armie, which at this preſent went foorth vnder the leading of the earle of Flanders and other, to warre againſt the enimies of the chriſtian faith, at the inſtance of pope Innocent. There was furthermore granted vnto them the fortith part of all the reuenues belonging to eccleſiaſticall perſons, towards the aid of the chriſtians then being in the holie land, and all ſuch as well of the Nobilitie as other of the weaker ſort, which had taken vpon them the croſſe, and ſecretlie laid it downe, were compelled eftſoones to receiue it now againe.

Vnſeaſonable weather.

There chanced this yeare woonderfull tempeſts of thunder, lightning, haile, and abundance of raine, in ſuch wiſe, that mens minds were greatlie aſtonied therwith: medowes and marſh grounds were quite ouerflowne, bridges broken and borne downe, and great quantitie of corne and haie loſt and carried awaie, and diuerſe men and women drowned. Margaret mother of Conſtance, duches of Britaine, ſiſter to William king of Scots, and mother to Henrie Boun earle of Hereford, deceaſſed. This yeare alſo by the counſell and aduice of the burgeſſes of London, there were choſen 35 of the moſt ſubſtantiall and wiſeſt men, which after the report of ſome writers, were called the councell of the citie of London, out of which number the Maior and Bailiffes were yearelie choſen.

Matth. Paris.

In the yeare 1202 king Iohn held his Chriſtmaſſe at Argenton in Normandie, and in the Lent following he and the French king met togither, néere vnto the caſtell of Gulleton, and there in talke had betwéene them, he commanded king Iohn with no ſmall arrogancie, and contrarie to his former promiſe, to reſtore vnto his nephue Arthur duke of Britaine, all thoſe lands now in his poſſeſſion on that ſide the ſea, which king Iohn earneſtlie denied to doo, wherevpon the French king immediatlie after, began war againſt him, and tooke Buteuant, Augi, and the caſtell of Linos. Moreouer, he beſieged the caſtell of Radepont for the ſpace of eight daies, till king Iohn came thither, and forced him to depart with much diſhonor. Howbeit after this, the French king wan Gourney, and then returning to Paris, he appointed certeine perſons to haue the gouernement of the foreſaid Arthur duke of Britaine, and then ſent him foorth with 200 men of armes into Poictou, that he might bring the countrie alſo vnder his ſubiection.

The French K. beginneth to make war againſt king Iohn.

Hugh earle of March.

Herevpon Hugh le Brun earle of March (vnto whome quéene Iſabell the wife of king Iohn had béene promiſed in mariage, before that king Iohn was motioned vnto hir, and therefore bare an inward diſpleaſure towards the king of England, for that he had ſo bereft him of his promiſed ſpouſe) being now deſirous to procure ſome trouble alſo vnto king Iohn, ioined himſelfe with Arthur duke of Britaine, and found meanes to cauſe them of Poictou (a people euer ſubiect to rebellion) to reuolt from king Iohn, and to take armour againſt him, ſo that the yoong Arthur being incouraged with this new ſupplie of aſſociats, firſt went into Touraine, and after into Aniou, compelling both thoſe countries to ſubmit themſelues vnto him, and proclaimed himſelfe earle of thoſe places, by commiſſion and grant obteined from king Philip.

The Poictouins reuolt from king Iohn.

Arthur proclaimeth himſelfe earle of Aniou, &c.

Quéene Elianor.

Quéene Elianor that was regent in thoſe parties being put in great feare with the newes of this ſudden ſturre, got hir into Mirabeau a ſtrong towne, ſituat in the countrie of Aniou, and foorthwith diſpatched a meſſenger with letters vnto king Iohn, requiring him of ſpéedie ſuccour in this hir preſent danger. In the meane time, Arthur following the victorie, ſhortlie after followed hir, and woone Mirabeau, where he tooke his grandmother within the ſame, whom he yet intreated verie honorablie, and with great reuerence (as ſome haue reported.) ¶ But other write far more trulie, that ſhe was not taken, but eſcaped into a tower, within the which ſhe was ſtraitlie beſieged. Thither came alſo to aid Arthur all the Nobles and men of armes in Poictou, and namelie the foreſaid earle of March according to appointment betwixt them: ſo that by this meanes Arthur had a great armie togither in the field.

Matth. Paris.
Matth. Weſt.

King Iohn in the meane time, hauing receiued his mothers letters, and vnderſtanding thereby in what danger ſhe ſtood, was maruellouſlie troubled with the ſtrangeneſſe of the newes, and with manie bitter words accuſed the French king as an vntrue prince, and a fraudulent league-breaker: and in all poſſible haſt ſpéedeth him foorth, continuing his iournie for the moſt part both day and night to come to the ſuccour of his people. To be briefe, he vſed ſuch diligence, that he was vpon his enimies necks yer they could vnderſtand any thing of his comming, or geſſe what the matter meant; when they ſaw ſuch a companie of ſouldiers as he brought with him to approch ſo néere the citie. For ſo negligent were they, that hauing once woone the towne, they ranged abroad ouer the countrie hither and thither at their libertie without any care. So that now being put in a ſudden feare, as preuented by the haſtie comming of the enimies vpon them, and wanting leiſure to take aduice what was beſt to be doone, and hauing not time in manner to get any armour on their backs, they were in a maruellous trouble, not knowing whether it were beſt for them to fight or to flée, to yéeld or to reſiſt.

Polydor.

K. Iohn commeth vpon his enimies not looked for.

This their feare being apparent to the Engliſhmen (by their diſorder ſhewed in running vp and downe from place to place with great noiſe and turmoile) they ſet vpon them with great violence, and compaſſing them round about, they either tooke or ſlue them in a manner at their pleaſure. And hauing thus put them all to flight, they purſued the chaſe towards the towne of Mirabeau, into which the enimies made verie great haſt to enter: but ſuch ſpéed was vſed by the Engliſh ſouldiers at that preſent, that they entred and wan the ſaid towne before their enimies could come néere to get into it. Great ſlaughter was made within Mirabeau it ſelfe, and Arthur with the reſidue of the armie that eſcaped with life from the firſt bickering was taken, who being herevpon committed to priſon, firſt at Falais, and after within the citie of Rouen, liued not long after as you ſhall heare. The other of the priſoners were alſo committed vnto ſafe kéeping, ſome into caſtels within Normandie, and ſome were ſent into England.

Arthur duke of Britaine takẽ priſoner.

Matth. Paris.

King Iohn hauing gotten this victorie, and taken his nephue Arthur, he wrote the maner of that his ſucceſſe vnto his barons in England, in manner as followeth.

IOhn by the grace of God king of England, and lord of Ireland, to all his barons ſendeth greeting. Know yee that we by Gods good fauour are in ſound and perfect health, and through Gods grace that maruelouſlie worketh with vs, on tueſdaie before Lammas daie, we being before the citie of Mauns, were aduertiſed that our mother was beſieged in Mirabeau, and therfore we haſted ſo faſt as we poſſibly might, ſo that we came thither on Lammas daie, and there we tooke our nephue Arthur, Hugh le Brun, Andrew de Chauenie, the vicount of Chateau Erald, Raimond de Touars, Sauerie de Mauleon, and Hugh Bangi, and all other enimies of Poictou that were there aſſembled againſt vs, to the number of two hundred knights and aboue, ſo that not one of them eſcaped. Giue God therefore thanks, and reioiſe at our good ſucceſſe.

252 knights or men of armes beſides demilances.

The French king at the ſame time lieng in ſiege before Arques, immediatlie vpon the newes of this ouerthrow, raiſed from thence, and returned homewards, deſtroieng all that came in his waie, till he was entred into his owne countrie. It is ſaid that king John cauſed his nephue Arthur to be brought before him at Falais, and there went about to perſuade him all that he could to forſake his freendſhip and aliance with the French king, and to leane and ſticke to him being his naturall vncle. But Arthur like one that wanted good counſell, and abounding too much in his owne wilfull opinion, made a preſumptuous anſwer, not onelie denieng ſo to doo, but alſo commanding king John to reſtore vnto him the realme of England, with all thoſe other lands and poſſeſſions which king Richard had in his hand at the houre of his death. For ſith the ſame apperteined to him by right of inheritance, he aſſured him, except reſtitution were made the ſooner, he ſhould not long continue quiet. King John being ſore mooued with ſuch words thus vttered by his nephue, appointed (as before is ſaid) that he ſhould be ſtraitlie kept in priſon, as firſt in Falais, and after at Roan within the new caſtell there. Thus by means of this good ſucceſſe, the countries of Poictou, Touraine, and Aniou were recouered.

Anno Reg. 4.

Shortlie after king John comming ouer into England, cauſed himſelfe to be crowned againe at Canturburie by the hands of Hubert the archbiſhop there, on the fourteenth day of Aprill, and then went backe againe into Normandie, where immediatlie vpon his arriuall, a rumour was spred through all France, of the death of his nephue Arthur. True it is that great ſuit was made to haue Arthur ſet at libertie, as well by the French king, as by William de Riches a valiant baron of Poictou, and diuerſe other Noble men of the Britains, who when they could not preuaile in their ſuit, they banded themſelues togither, and ioining in confederacie with Robert earle of Alanſon, the vicount Beaumont, William de Fulgiers, and other, they began to leuie ſharpe wars againſt king John in diuerſe places, inſomuch (as it was thought) that ſo long as Arthur liued, there would be no quiet in thoſe parts: whervpon it was reported, that king John through perſuaſion of his councellors, appointed certeine perſons to go vnto Falais, where Arthur was kept in priſon, vnder the charge of Hubert de Burgh, and there to put out the yoong gentlemans eies.

But through ſuch reſiſtance as he made againſt one of the tormentors that came to execute the kings commandement (for the other rather forſooke their prince and countrie, than they would conſent to obeie the kings authoritie héerein) and ſuch lamentable words as he vttered, Hubert de Burgh did preſerue him from that iniurie, not doubting but rather to haue thanks than diſpleaſure at the kings hands, for deliuering him of ſuch infamie as would haue redounded vnto his highneſſe, if the yoong gentleman had béene ſo cruellie dealt withall. For he conſidered, that king John had reſolued vpon this point onelie in his heat and furie (which moueth men to vndertake manie an inconuenient enterpriſe, vnbeſeeming the perſon of a common man, much more reprochfull to a prince, all men in that mood being meere fooliſh and furious, and prone to accompliſh the peruerſe conceits of their ill poſſeſſed heart; as one ſaith right well, and that afterwards, vpon better aduiſement, he would both repent himſelfe ſo to haue commanded, and giue them ſmall thanke that ſhould ſée it put in execution. Howbeit to ſatiſfie his mind for the time, and to ſtaie the rage of the Britains, he cauſed it to be bruted abroad through the countrie, that the kings commandement was fulfilled, and that Arthur alſo through ſorrow and greefe was departed out of this life. For the ſpace of fiftéene daies this rumour inceſſantlie ran through both the realmes of England and France, and there was ringing for him through townes and villages, as it had béene for his funerals. It was alſo bruted, that his bodie was buried in the monaſterie of ſaint Andrewes of the Ciſteaux order.

But when the Britains were nothing pacified, but rather kindled more vehementlie to worke all the miſcheefe they could deuiſe, in reuenge of their ſouereignes death, there was no remedie but to ſignifie abroad againe, that Arthur was as yet liuing and in health. Now when the king heard the truth of all this matter, he was nothing diſpleaſed for that his commandement was not executed, ſith there were diuerſe of his capteins which vttered in plaine words, that he ſhould not find knights to keepe his caſtels, if he dealt ſo cruellie with his nephue. For if it chanced any of them to be taken by the king of France or other their aduerſaries, they ſhould be ſure to taſt of the like cup. ¶ But now touching the maner in verie deed of the end of this Arthur, writers make ſundrie reports. Neuertheleſſe certeine it is, that in the yeare next inſuing, he was remooued from Falais vnto the caſtell or tower of Rouen, out of the which there was not any that would confeſſe that euer he ſaw him go aliue. Some haue written, that as he aſſaied to haue eſcaped out of priſon, and prooning to clime ouer the wals of the caſtell, he fell into the riuer of Saine, and ſo was drowned. Other write, that through verie gréefe and languor he pined awaie, and died of naturall ſickneſſe. But ſome affirme, that king John ſecretlie cauſed him to be murthered and made awaie, ſo as it is not throughlie agréed vpon, in what ſort he finiſhed his daies: but verelie king John was had in great ſuſpicion, whether worthilie or not, the lord knoweth. Yet how extreamelie ſoeuer he delt with his nephue, he releaſed and ſet at libertie diuerſe of thoſe lords that were taken priſoners with him, namelie Hugh le Brun, and Sauerie de Mauleon, the one to his great trouble and hinderance, and the other to his gaine: for Hugh le Brun afterwards leuied and occaſioned ſore warres againſt him, but Sauerie de Mauleon continued euer after his loiall ſubiect, dooing to him verie agréeable ſeruice, as hereafter may appeare.

But king Philip after he was aduertiſed of Arthurs death, tooke the matter verie gréeuouſlie, and vpon occaſion therof, cited king Iohn to appeare before him at a certeine day, to anſwer ſuch obiections as Conſtance the duches of Britaine mother to the ſaid Arthur ſhould lay to his charge, touching the murther of hir ſonne. And bicauſe king Iohn appeared not, he was therefore condemned in the action, and adiudged to forfeit all that he held within the precinct of France, aſwell Normandie as all his other lands and dominions.

The ordinãce for the aſſiſe of bread.

About the ſame time the king cauſed a proclamation to be publiſhed for the lawfull aſſiſe of bread to be made by the bakers, vpon paine to be puniſhed by the pillorie: which aſſiſe was approued and aſſeſſed by the baker of Geffrey Fitz Peter, lord chéefe iuſtice of England, and by the baker of Robert de Tuinham. So that the baker might ſell and gaine in euerie quarter thrée pence, beſides the bran, and two loaues for the heater of the ouen, and for foure ſeruants foure halfepence, for two boies a farthing, for allowance in ſalt an halfepenie, yeſt an halfepenie, for candell a farthing, for fewell thrée pence, and for a bulter an halfepenie. And this was the rate.

When wheat was ſold for ſix ſhillings the quarter, then ſhall euerie loafe of fine manchet wey 41 ſhillings, and euerie loafe of cheat ſhall wey 24 ſhillings. When wheat is ſold for fiue ſhillings and ſix pence, then manchet ſhall wey 20 ſhillings, and cheat 28 ſhillings. When wheat is ſold for fiue ſhillings, then manchet ſhall wey 24 ſhillings, and the cheat bread 32 ſhillings. When wheat is ſold for foure ſhillings ſix pence, manchet ſhall wey 32 ſhillings, and cheat 42 ſhillings. When wheat is ſold for foure ſhillings, manchet ſhall wey 36 ſhillings, and cheat 46 ſhillings. When wheat is ſold for thrée ſhillings ſix pence, then ſhall manchet wey 42 ſhillings, and cheat 54 ſhillings. When wheat is ſold for thrée ſhillings, manchet ſhall wey 48 ſhillings, and cheat 44 ſhillings. When wheat is ſold for two ſhillings and ſix pence, manchet ſhall wey 54 ſhillings, and cheat 72 ſhillings. When wheat is ſold for two ſhillings, manchet ſhall wey ſixtie ſhillings, and cheat foure pound. When wheat is ſold for 18 pence the quarter, manchet ſhall wey 77 ſhillings, & cheat foure pound and eight ſhillings. This ordinance was proclaimed throughout the realme, as moſt neceſſarie and profitable for the common-wealth.

Great tempeſts.

This yeare manie woonderfull things happened, for beſides the ſore winter, which paſſed any other that had béene heard of in manie yeares before, both for continuance in length and extreame coldneſſe of froſts, there followed griſelie tempeſts, with thunder, lightning, and ſtormes of raine, and haile of the bigneſſe of hens egs, wherewith much fruit & great ſtore of corne was periſhed, beſide other great hurts doone vpon houſes and yoong cattell. Alſo ſpirits (as it was thought) in likeneſſe of birds and foules were ſéene in the aire flieng with fire in their beaks, wherewith they ſet diuerſe houſes on fire: which did import great troubles yer long to inſue, and followed in déed, as ſhall appeare hereafter.

Roger de Lacie coneſtable of Cheſter taken.

In this meane time the French king, to bring his purpoſe to full effect, entred into Normandie, waſted the countries, and wan the townes of Cowches, le Val de Rueil, and Liſle Dandele. Le Val de Rueil wis giuen ouer without any great inforcement of aſſault, by two noble men that had charge thereof, the one named Robert Fitz Walter, and the other Saer de Quincie. Howbeit Liſle Dandele was valiantlie for a certeine time defended by Roger de Lacie the coneſtable of Cheſter. But at length they within were ſo conſtreined by famine and long ſiege, that the ſaid Lacie and others perceiuing it to be more honourable for them to die by the ſword, than to ſtarue through want of food, brake out vpon their enimies, and ſlue a great ſort of the Frenchmen, but yet in the end they were taken priſoners, and ſo theſe fortreſſes came into the French kings hands.

Theſe two abbats tooke ſuch paines in the matter, that the kings were almoſt brought to agréement. But the French king perceiuing himſelfe to be aforehand in his buſineſſe, ſticked at one article, which was to repaire all ſuch abbeies as he had deſtroied within the dominions of king Iohn: and king Iohn to doo the like by all thoſe that he had waſted within the French kings countries. The popes Nuncij would haue excommunicated king Philip, bicauſe he would not thus agrée. But king Philip appealing from them, purſued the warre, and beſieged the towne of Radpont. The ſouldiers within the towne defended the firſt aſſault verie manfullie, and cauſed the Frenchmen to retire backe: but king Philip meaning to haue the towne yer he departed, did ſo incloſe it about, that within ten daies he wan it, and tooke there twentie men of armes, an hundred demilances, and twentie arcubaliſters.

K. Iohn commeth backe into England.

After this, when he had fortified this place, he went to caſtell Galiard, which he beſieged; and though by the high valiancie of Hugh de Gourney the capteine there, the Frenchmen were manfullie beaten backe, and kept out for a moneth and more, yet at length by ſtreict ſiege and neare approches hardlie made, the fortreſſe was deliuered into the French kings hands. And in the end the ſaid Hugh Gourney reuolted from his obedience, deliuering alſo the caſtell of Mountfort vnto the French king, which caſtell with the honor thereto apperteining king Iohn had giuen to the ſame Hugh, not verie long before. All this while king Iohn did lie at Rouen: but forſomuch as he could not well remedie the matter as then, bicauſe he wanted ſuch helpe as he dailie looked for out of England, and durſt not truſt any of that ſide, he paſſed it ouer with a ſtout countenance for a while, and would ſaie oftentimes to ſuch as ſtood about him; What elſe dooth my coſen the French K. now, than ſteale thoſe things from me, which hereafter I ſhall indeuour my ſelfe to cauſe him to reſtore with intereſt? But when he ſaw that his enimies would ſtill procéed, and that no aid came out of England, he came ouer himſelfe, and landed at Porteſmouth on S. Nicholas day.

King Philip doubting by vſing the victorie with to much rigor, leaſt he ſhould bring the Normans into a deſperate boldneſſe, and ſo cauſe them for ſafegard of their liues to hazard all vpon reſiſtance, he ſtaied for a time, and withdrew his ſouldiers backe againe into France, hauing not onelie furniſhed thoſe places in the meane time which he had wun, with ſtrong gariſons of his ſouldiers, but alſo appointed certeine perſonages to trauell with the people, yet remaining in the Engliſh ſubiection, to reuolt and turne from king Iohn, to his obeiſance and ſubiection.

King Iohn being returned into England, accuſed diuerſe of his Nobles for ſhewing themſelues negligent and ſlouthfull in aiding him, according to his commandement, alledging furthermore, that being deſtitute of their due and requiſite ſeruice, he was conſtreined to loſe his time in Normandie, as not being able for want of their aid to reſiſt his enimies. Wherefore for this and other matters laid to their charges, he did put them to greeuous fines. By meanes whereof, and by leauieng a ſubſidie of his people, he got togither an huge ſumme of monie. This ſubſidie was granted him in a parlement holden at Oxenford, and begun there vpon the ſecond of Ianuarie 1204, wherein of euerie knights fée was granted the ſumme of two markes and an halfe. Neither were the biſhops, abbats, nor any other eccleſiaſticall perſons exempted, by meanes whereof he ran firſt into the hatred of the clergie, and conſequentlie of manie other of his ſubiects: ſo that they failed him at his néed, whereby he often ſuſteined no ſmall damage, which he might haue preuented and withſtood, if he had béene ſo qualified with diſcretion as to haue ſéene what was conuenient and what inconuenient for his roiall eſtate. Ambaſſadors ſent into France.

King Iohn about the beginning of this ſixt yeare of his reigne, ſent in ambaſſage to the French king the archbiſhop of Canturburie, the biſhops of Norwich and Elie, the earles Marſhall and Leiceſter, to treat with him of peace: but he was ſo far off from comming néere to any reaſonable motions, bicauſe he ſaw the world frame as he wiſhed, that ſtill by demanding ſomewhat that might not be granted, he kept off, and brought in ſuch hard conditions, that it was not poſſible to conclude anie agréement. And this he did of purpoſe, hoping within ſhort time to conquer all that the king of England poſſeſſed as yet on that ſide the ſeas. He was the more vntoward to compound, for that he was informed how Arthur the duke of Britaine was diſpatched of his life, and therfore not doubting but to haue manie to take part with him in ſéeking reuenge of his death, he made that his chéefe quarell, ſwearing that he would not ceaſſe to purſue the warre againſt king Iohn, till he had depriued him of his whole kingdome. So the ambaſſadors departed without all hope to come to any agréement. ¶ This yeare Eaſter day fell ſo high as it poſſiblie might, that is to ſaie, on ſaint Marks day.

King Philip vnderſtanding that king Iohn remained ſtill in England, rather occupied in gathering of monie amongſt his ſubiects, than in making other prouiſion to bring them into the field (to the great offenſe of his ſaid people) thought now for his part to loſe no time: but aſſembling a mightie armie, he came with the ſame into Normandie, and vpon his firſt comming, he wan the towne of Falaiſe, and ſhortlie after was Dampfront deliuered vnto him by ſurrender. This doone, he marched further into the countrie, and with his ſudden inuaſion ſo oppreſſed the people euerie where, that they could haue no time to make ſhift by flight to get into the townes. With this ſwiftneſſe of ſpéed, he brought alſo ſuch a feare into the hearts of moſt men, that he wan all the countrie of Normandie euen to Mount S. Michaell. The inhabitants in euerie place ſubmitted themſelues, as thoſe of Baieulx, Conſtances, Liſeux, and other townes thereabouts.

Towns wun by the French king.

Finallie, he came before Rouen, the principall citie of all the countrie, and incamped ſo in ſundrie places about the citie, that all the iſſues, entries and waies were cloſed vp by his armie, being ſo diuided into ſeuerall camps, that the diſtance was not great from one to another, making a terrible ſhew to them within. At length after he had prouided all things neceſſarie for his purpoſe, and taken good aduiſe of his capteins how he ſhould beſt imploie his force for the winning of this citie (in which exploit he knew the full perfection of all his paſſed conqueſts chéefelie to conſiſt) he did manfullie aſſault it, and they within as manfullie defended themſelues, ſo that he got little by the aſſaults and approches which he made. Wherevpon he fell in hand to practiſe with the citizens to win them with méed, curteſie, gentle ſpéech, and great promiſes. So that in fine, they within were ſo mooued with ſuch reaſons as he vſed to perſuade them withall, that they made requeſt for a truce to be had for certeine daies, within the terme whereof if no ſuccour came, they couenanted to yéeld without any further trouble.

Rouen beſieged by the French king.

This truce being obteined, ambaſſadours were ſent from them of Rouen into England, to ſignifie vnto king Iohn the whole ſtate of the citie, and of the truce, ſo that if aid came not within the time appointed, the citie muſt néeds be deliuered into the enimies hands. The king hauing no armie in readineſſe to ſend ouer, nor other ſhift to make for the ſuccour of the citie, permitted the ambaſſadours to depart without comfort of any aid, who herevpon returning to Rouen, and reporting what they had hard, ſéene, and found, brought the citie into great ſorrow. For whereas that citie had euer béene accuſtomed to glorie for the great loialtie and faithfull fidelitie which the ſame had euer ſhewed towards their liege lords and naturall princes; now the citizens perceiued manifeſtlie, that vnleſſe they would caſt awaie themſelues, and loſe all they had, they muſt of force yéeld into the hands of their enimies. Wherefore to make their true allegiance more apparant to the world, they ſtaied the ſurrender as long as they had any ſtore of vittels within the citie to reléeue their fainting bodies withall: and ſo in the end being vanquiſhed with hunger, they ſubmitted themſelues to the French king. Their ſubmiſſion being once knowne, cauſed all thoſe other townes which had not yéelded, to deliuer vp their keies vnto the Frenchmen, as Arques, Vernueill, and others.

The great fidelitie of the citizens of Rouen.

Rouē through famine is ſurrendred to the French king.

Moreouer the townes in Poictou, Touraine, and Aniou, which king Iohn had recouered latelie before, did now againe (being in no ſmall feare) yéeld themſelues vnto king Philip: ſo that of all the townes within thoſe countries, there remained none vnder the Engliſh obeiſance, ſaue onelie Rochell, Tours, Niort, and a few other. Thus Normandie which king Rollo had purchaſed and gotten 316 yeares before that preſent time, was then recouered by the Frenchmen, to the great reproch and diſhonour of the Engliſh, in this yeare 1204. By Rafe Coghſhals report this ſhould ſeeme to haue chanced in the daies of K. Henrie the ſecond.

A fiſh like to a man.

In this firſt yeare of king Iohns reigne, at Oreford in Suffolke, as Fabian ſaith (although I thinke he be deceiued in the time) a fiſh was taken by fiſhers in their nets as they were at ſea, reſembling in ſhape a wild or ſauage man, whome they preſented vnto ſir Bartholomew de Glanuille knight, that had then the kéeping of the caſtell of Oreford in Suffolke. He was naked, and in all his lims and members reſembling the right proportion of a man; he had haires alſo in the vſuall parts of his bodie, albeit that the crowne of his head was bald, his beard was long and rugged, and his breaſt hairie. The knight cauſed him to be kept certeine daies & nights from the ſea, meat ſet afore him he gréedilie deuoured, & did eat fiſh both raw and ſod. Thoſe that were raw he preſſed in his hand till he had thruſt out all the moiſture, and ſo then did eat them. He would not or could not vtter any ſpeach, although to trie him they hung him vp by the héeles, and miſerablie tormented him. He would get him to his couch at the ſetting of the ſunne, and riſe againe at the riſing of the ſame.

One day they brought him to the hauen, and ſuffered him to go into the ſea, but to be ſure he ſhould not eſcape from them, they ſet thrée ranks of mightie ſtrong nets before him, ſo to catch him againe at their pleaſure (as they imagined) but he ſtreightwaies diuing downe to the bottome of the water, got paſt all the nets, and comming vp, ſhewed himſelfe to them againe that ſtood waiting for him, and dowking diuerſe times vnder water and comming vp againe he beheld them on the ſhore that ſtood ſtill looking at him, who ſéemed as it were to mocke them, for that he had deceiued them, & got paſt their nets. At length after he had thus ſported himſelfe a great while in the water, and that there was no more hope of his returne, he came to them againe of his owne accord, ſwimming through the water, and remained with them two moneths after. But finallie, when he was negligentlie looked to, and now ſéemed not to be regarded, he fled ſecretlie to the ſea, and was neuer after ſéene nor heard of.

Iohn Stow.

¶ Thus much out of Rafe Coghſhall, who affirmeth that this chanced in the daies of Henrie the ſecond, about the 33 of his reigne, as Iohn Stow in his ſummarie hath alſo noted. Which report of theirs in reſpect of the ſtrangneſſe thereof might ſéeme incredible, ſpeciallie to ſuch as be hard of beléefe, and refuſe to giue faith and credit to any thing but what their owne eies haue ſealed to their conſciences, ſo that the reading of ſuch woonders as theſe, is no more beneficiall to them, than to carrie a candle before a blind man, or to ſing a ſong to him that is ſtarke deafe. Neuertheleſſe, of all vncouth and rare ſights, ſpeciallie of monſtruous appearances we ought to be ſo farre from hauing little regard; that we ſhould rather in them and by them obſerue the euent and falling out of ſome future thing, no leſſe miraculous in the iſſue, than they be woonderfull at the ſudden ſight. This was well noted of a philoſopher, who to the purpoſe (among other matters by him touched) hath ſpoken no leſſe pithilie than credibilie, ſaieng;

The war was mightilie mainteined all this while betwixt them of Poictou and Aquitaine, and manie ſharpe incounters chanced betwixt the parties, of which the one following the king of Englands lieutenant Robert de Turneham, valiantlie reſiſted the other that held with the French king vnder the conduct of William de Roches, & Hugh le Brun earle of March, chiefe leaders of that faction. But Robert Turneham, togither with Sauerie de Mauleon, and Gerard de Atie, bare themſelues ſo manfullie, that in all conflicts for the moſt part the victorie remained on their ſides. The Gaſcoignes alſo tooke part with king Iohn, and continued in dutifull obedience towards him, for the which their loialtie he was readie to conſider them with princelie gifts and beneficiall rewards, in ſuch bountifull wiſe, that he gaue vnto a Noble man of that countrie named Moreue, the ſumme of 28 thouſand marks, to leuie & wage thirtie thouſand men to aid him at his comming ouer into thoſe parties. The archbiſhop of Burdeaux, that was brother vnto the foreſaid Moreue, became ſuertie for performance of the couenants, and remained in England a long time, bicauſe the ſame couenants were not in all points accompliſhed.

The biſhop of London was ſent ambaſſadour from king Iohn vnto the emperour vpon certeine earneſt buſineſſe. The duke of Louaine, and the earle of Bullongne were made friends by the French kings drift, and promiſed to inuade England with an armie, and to make warre againſt king Iohn for the withholding of ſuch lands and reuenues as they claimed to be due vnto them, in right of their wiues. King Philip alſo vndertooke to follow them within a moneth after they ſhould be entred into England, & thus did the French king ſéeke to make him ſtrong with fréends, which dailie fell from king Iohn on ech hand. ¶ Godfrey biſhop of Wincheſter, that was ſon to the lord Richard de Lucie departed this life. An extreame froſt.

The 14 day of Ianuarie it began to fréeze, and ſo continued till the 22 of March, with ſuch extremitie, that the huſbandmen could not make their tilth, by reaſon wherof in the ſummer following, corne began to grow to an exceſſiue price, ſo that wheat was ſold by the quarter at 12 ſhillings of monie then currant. This yeare about the feaſt of Pentecoſt, the king (by the aduiſe of his councell aſſembled at Northampton) prepared a nauie of ſhips, muſtered ſouldiers, and ſhewed great tokens that he would renew the war, and ſéeke to be reuenged of his enimie the French king. The Nobles of the realme indeuoured themſelues alſo to match the diligence of the king in this preparation, vpon an earneſt deſire to reuenge the iniuries latelie doone to the common-wealth.

King Iohn prepareth an armie to go into France.

Now when all things were readie, and the ſhips fraught with vittels, armour, and all other prouiſions neceſſarie, the king came to Porcheſter, there to take the ſea, purpoſing verelie to paſſe ouer into France, in hope of ſuch faire promiſes as his fréends of Normandie and Poictou had made, in ſending oftentimes to him, to procure him with ſpéed to come to their ſuccours. But as the king was readie to enter on ſhipboord, Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie, and William Marſhall earle of Penbroke came to him, and with manie great reaſons went about to perſuade him to ſtaie his iournie. Who although he was verie loath to follow their counſell, yet they put forth ſo manie doubts and dangers that might follow of his departing the realme at that preſent, to the hazarding of the whole ſtate, that in the end (ſore to his gréefe) he was ouercome by their importunate perſuaſions, and ſo diſmiſſing the moſt part of his armie, appointed his brother the earle of Saliſburie with a certeine number of knights & men of armes to paſſe ouer into Rochell, whither the lord Geffrey the kings baſe ſonne was gone before him, with manie other knights and men of armes.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the earle of Penbroke perſuade the king to ſtaie at home.

The lords and other that were diſmiſſed, tooke it verie euill, conſidering the great preparation that had béene made for that iournie. But ſpeciallie the mariners were ſore offended, curſing the archbiſhop and the ſaid earle of Penbroke, that were knowne to be authors of ſo naughtie counſell as they tooke this to be. It was thought there was neuer ſo manie ſhips gotten togither at one time before, as were at that preſent, to haue attended the king: for (as writers haue recorded) there were to the number of fourtéene thouſand mariners that had brought their ſhips thither for that purpoſe. But as the breaking vp of this voiage gréeued others, ſo it pinched the king ſo néere the heart, that he being come backe from the ſea ſide to Wincheſter, repented ſo much that he had not gone forward with his iournie, that the next daie he returned againe to the coaſt, and at Porteſmouth, entring the ſea with his ſhips, on the fiftéenth of Iulie he ſailed to the Ile of Wight, and wafted vp and downe for the ſpace of two daies togither, till by aduiſe of his fréends he was perſuaded not to aduenture to paſſe ouer, ſith his armie was diſmiſſed and gone home, and ſo he returned backe to the ſhore againe, arriuing at Scotland, néere vnto Warham, the third daie after his ſetting forth: yet ſuch as were behind, and haſted after him, thought verelie he had béene gone ouer, and ſuch a brute was ſpred ouer all, till at length in time the truth was knowne.

e goeth to e ſea the 15 Iulie, as me authors aue.

At his comming backe (as ſome write) he charged certeine of the Nobilitie with treaſon, bicauſe they did not follow him: wherevpon ſhortlie after he puniſhed them verie gréeuouſlie, and peraduenture not without ſome ground of iuſt cauſe. For likelie it is, that ſome greater matter forced him to breake vp his iournie, than appeareth in our writers, although Rafe Cogheſhall ſetteth downe ſome reaſons alledged by the archbiſhop Hubert, and earle Marſhall, to perſuade him not to depart the realme. But peraduenture other cauſes there were alſo of farre more importance that conſtreined him ſo greatlie againſt his mind & full reſolution, both at the firſt, and now at this ſecond time to returne. ¶ Verelie to vtter my coniecture, it may be that vpon his laſt determination to go ouer, he gaue new commandement to his lords to follow him, and they peraduenture vſed not ſuch diligence in accompliſhing his pleaſure therein, as he looked they ſhould haue doone: or it may be, when the armie was once diſcharged, the ſouldiers made ſuch haſt homewards, ech man towards his countrie, that it was no eaſie matter to bring them backe againe in any conuenient time. But howſoeuer it was, as it had béene vpon a change of purpoſe, he came backe againe (as before yée haue heard.)

The death of the archb. of Canturburie. Matt. Paris. Polydor.

The thirtéenth of Iulie Hubert archbiſhop of Canturburie departed this life at Tenham, the king not being gratlie ſorie for his death (as ſome haue written) bicauſe he gathered ſome ſuſpicion that he bare too much good will towards the French king. In verie déed (as ſome write) the archbiſhop repented himſelfe of nothing ſo much, as for that he had commended king Iohn to the Noblemen and Péeres of the realme, ſith he proued an other manner of man than he looked to haue found him. This archbiſhop had gouerned the ſée of Canturburie eleuen yeares, eight moneths, and ſix daies.

An archbiſhop choſen.

After his deceaſſe, the moonks of Canturburie without knowledge of the king, choſe one Reignold the ſubprior of their houſe to be their archbiſhop, who ſecretlie went to Rome to obteine his confirmation of the pope. Which thing bred much miſchéefe and great diſcord betwixt pope Innocent & king Iohn, ſince the pope would not confirme the election, bicauſe he ſaw ſome péece of ſecret practiſe, till he might vnderſtand and be certified by report of ſufficient witneſſe (for that he wanted the letters commendatorie from the king) that the ſame election was lawfull and orderlie made. Of this delaie alſo the moonks being ſpéedilie aduertiſed, and to the end they might now recouer the kings fauour, whome they had verie ſore offended in not making him priuie to the firſt election, they made requeſt vnto him, that by his nomination it might be lawfull for them to chooſe an other archbiſhop.

Matth. Weſt. Iohn Gray biſhop of Norwich preſident of the councell. Matth. Paris.

The king gladlie herevnto aſſented, requiring them to grant their voices vnto Iohn Gray the biſhop of Norwich, being both his chapleine and preſident of his councell. The moonks to gratifie the king obeied his requeſt, and ſo electing the ſame biſhop of Norwich, they ſent their procurators to Rome in the yeare following, to ſignifie the ſame vnto the pope, and to require him to confirme this their ſecond election, as vnmindfull of their firſt, and clearelie adnihilating the ſame to all intents and purpoſes. Amongſt other that were ſent to Rome about this buſineſſe, Helias de Brantfield was one, a moonke of great eſtimation, and had in good credit with the king, who miniſtred vnto them that were thus ſent, ſufficient allowance wherewith to beare their charges and expenſes.

Helias de Brantfield.

The biſhops quarell with the moonks of Canturburie about the election of an archbiſhep.

Alſo at the ſame time the biſhops that were ſuffragans to the ſée of Canturburie, ſent their procurators to Rome, about a quarrell which they had againſt the moonks there, for that the ſame moonks preſumed to procéed to the election of an archbiſhop without their conſent, hauing (as they alledged) a right by ancient decrées and cuſtomes to be aſſociat with them in the ſaid elections. But how this matter was anſwered, yée ſhall ſée hereafter. In the meane time, theſe and other like things procured the pope to reiect both the elections, and of his owne authoritie to nominate the third perſon, whereby the trouble begun was not a little augmented (as you ſhall heare héereafter.) Now whileſt theſe procurators were thus occupied in Rome, Philip the French king minding to conquer all that which king Iohn yet held within France, aſſembled an armie, and comming before the towne of Loches, wan it, and tooke Gerard de Atie priſoner, that had ſo long time and with ſuch valiancie defended it. The ſame time alſo was Robert de Turnham taken priſoner, who with great manhood had all this while repreſſed and chaſtiſed the rebellious Poictouins.

Hubert de Burgh a valiant capteine.

Moreouer, when the French king had wonne Loches, he went to Chinon, within the which Hubert de Burgh was capteine, a right valiant man of warre as was any where to be found, who hauing prepared all things neceſſarie for defenſe, manfullie repelled the Frenchmen, who inforced themſelues to win the towne with continuall aſſaults and alarms, not ſuffering them within to reſt neither day nor night, who yet for certeine daies togither, by the valiant incouragement of their capteine defended the towne, with great ſlaughter of the Frenchmen. Neuertheleſſe, at length beginning to deſpaire by reaſon of their inceſſant trauell, certeine of them that were ſomewhat faintharted ſtale ouer the walles in the night, and ran to the Frenchmen, and for ſafegard of their liues inſtructed them of the whole eſtate of the towne. The French vnderſtanding that they within were in no ſmall feare of themſelues, with ſuch violence came vnto the walles, and renewed the aſſault vpon all ſides, that ſtreightwaies they entred by force. A great number of Engliſhmen were taken, and amongſt other their capteine the foreſaid Hubert de Burgh. [This chanced on the vigill of S. Iohn Baptiſt.]

After this, king Philip tooke diuerſe other townes and caſtels in that countrie, of the which ſome he raſed, and ſome he fortified and ſtored with gariſons of his ſouldiers. This doone he paſſed ouer the riuer of Loir, and wan a caſtell ſituat néere vnto a promontorie or head of land called Grapelitum, which was woont to be a great ſuccour & aid to Engliſhmen arriuing on that coaſt. The occaſion why he made wars thus vpon the Britains, was (as ſome write) for that Guie duke of Britaine, who had married the ducheſſe Conſtance, and ſucceded in the duchie after hir ſon Arthur, without regard to reuenge the death of the ſame Arthur, was ioined in league with king Iohn togither with Sauerie de Mauleon, and Almerike de Luſignian, lords of great honour, power, and ſtoutneſſe of ſtomach.

King Iohn alſo in this meane while, moued with the increaſe of theſe his new aſſociats, and alſo with deſire to reuenge ſo manie iniuries and loſſes ſuſteined at the French kings hands, preparing an armie of men, and a nauie of ſhips, tooke the ſea with them and landed at Rochell the ninth of Iulie, where he was receiued with great ioy and gladneſſe of the people; and no ſmall number of gentlemen and others that inhabited thereabout repaired vnto him, offering to aid him to the vttermoſt of their powers. He therefore with aſſured hope of good ſpéed departed from thence, and wan the towne of Montalban, with a great part of all the countrie thereabouts. Finallie he entred into Aniou, and comming to the citie of Angiers, appointed certeine bands of his footmen, & all his light horſſemen to compaſſe the towne about, whileſt he, with the reſidue of the footmen, & all the men of armes, did go to aſſault the gates. Which enterpriſe with fire and ſword he ſo manfullie executed, that the gates being in a moment broken open, the citie was entered and deliuered to the ſouldiers for a preie. So that of the citizens ſome were taken, ſome killed, and the wals of the citie beaten flat to the ground. This doone, he went abroad into the countrie, and put all things that were in his way to the like deſtruction. Then came the people of the countries next adioining, of their owne accord to ſubmit themſelues vnto him, promiſing to aid him with men and vittels moſt plentifullie.

King Iohn being verie ioyfull of this good ſucceſſe, marched towards Poictou, ſending out his troops of horſſemen to waſte the countrie on euerie ſide. In the meane while the French king being hereof aduertiſed, came forth with his armie readie furniſhed to reſiſt king Iohn, and by the way encountred with the duke of Britaine, Sauerie de Mauleon, and Almerike de Luſignian, which had béene abroad to ſpoile the French kings countries. But being now ouerſet with the kings puiſſance, they were taken, and all their companie ſtripped out of their armour, to their great confuſion. This miſhap ſore weakened the power and courage of king Iohn. But the French king proud of the victorie, kept on his iournie, and approching néere vnto the place where king Iohn was as then lodged, did cauſe his tents to be pitched downe for the firſt night, and on the morrow after, as one deſirous of battell, brought his armie into the fields, ranged in good order and readie to fight.

The like did king Iohn, ſo that with ſtout ſtomachs and eger minds, they ſtood there in the field readie to trie the matter with dint of ſword vpon ſound of the warning-blaſt giuen by the trumpets. Howbeit, by the mediation of certeine graue perſonages, as well of the ſpiritualtie as of the temporaltie, which were in good eſtimation with both the princes, a communication was appointed, which tooke ſuch effect, that a truce was taken betwixt them for the terme of two yeares, the priſoners on either ſide being releaſed by waie of exchange: and thus the wars ceaſed for that time. Then king Philip returned into France, and king Iohn into England, where he landed at Porteſmouth the 12 of December.

About the ſame ſeaſon alſo pope Innocent confirmed the authoritie and power which the prior and moonks of Canturburie had to elect and chooſe the archbiſhop of that ſée, giuing ſentence againſt the ſuffragans which claimed a right to be ioined with the ſaid prior and moonks in the election, as by a letter directed to the ſame ſuffragans from the ſaid pope it may more plainelie appeare.

After this it chanced that king Iohn remembring himſelfe of the deſtruction of the citie of Angiers, which (bicauſe he was deſcended from thence) he had before time greatlie loued, began now to repent him, in that he had deſtroied it, and therefore with all ſpéed he tooke order to haue it againe repaired, which was doone in moſt beautifull wiſe, to his great coſt and expenſes, which he might haue ſaued, had not his fooliſh raſhneſſe driuen him to attempt that, whereof vpon ſober aduiſement afterwards he was aſhamed. But what will not an ordinarie man do in the full tide of his furie; much more princes & great men, whoſe anger is reſembled to the roring of a lion, euen vpon light occaſions oftentimes, to ſatiſfie their vnbrideled and braineſicke affections, which carrie them with a ſwift and full ſtreame into ſuch follies and dotages as are vndecent for their degrées. King Iohn
the pope.

How gainfull England was to the court of Rome

The popes
anſwer vnto
the king.

Stephan Langton choſen archbiſhop of Canturburie by ý popes appointment.

after the pope was fullie informed of the manner of their elections, he diſanulled them both, and procured by his papall authoritie the monks of Canturburie (of whome manie were then come to Rome about that matter) to chooſe one Stephan Langton the cardinall of S. Chryſogon an Engliſhman borne, and of good eſtimation and learning in the court of Rome to be their archbiſhop. The monks at the firſt were loth to conſent thereto, alledging that they might not lawfullie doo it without conſent of their king, and of their couent.

But the pope as it were taking the word out of their mouths, ſaid vnto them: Doo yée not conſider that we haue full authoritie and power in the church of Canturburie: neither is the aſſent of kings or princes to be looked for vpon elections celebrated in the preſence of the apoſtolike ſée. Wherefore I command you by vertue of your obedience, and vpon paine of curſſing, that you being ſuch and ſo manie here as are ſufficient for the election, to chooſe him to your archbiſhop, whome I ſhall appoint to you for father and paſtor of your ſoules. The monks doubting to offend the pope, conſented all of them to gratifie him, except Helias de Brantfield, who refuſed. And ſo the foreſaid Stephan Langton being elected of them, was confirmed of the pope, who ſignified by letters the whole ſtate thereof to king Iohn, commending the ſaid Stephan as archbiſhop vnto him.

The monks of Canturburie baniſhed. King Iohn writeth to the pope.

The king ſore offended in his mind that the biſhop of Norwich was thus put beſide that dignitie, to the which he had aduanced him, cauſed forthwith all the goods of the monks of Canturburie to be confiſcate to his vſe, and after baniſhed them the relme, as well I meane thoſe at home, as thoſe that were at Rome, and herewith wrote his letters vnto the pope, giuing him to vnderſtand for anſwer, that he would neuer conſent that Stephan which had béene brought vp & alwaies conuerſant with his enimies the Frenchmen, ſhould now enioy the rule of the biſhoprike and dioces of Canturburie. Moreouer, he declared in the ſame letters, that he maruelled not a little what the pope ment, in that he did not conſider how neceſſarie the fréendſhip of the king of England was to the ſée of Rome, ſith there came more gains to the Romane church out of that kingdome, than out of any other realme on this ſide the mountaines. He added hereto, that for the liberties of his crowne he would ſtand to the death, if the matter ſo required. And as for the election of the biſhop of Norwich vnto the ſée of Canturburie, ſith it was profitable to him and to his realme, he meant not to releaſe it.

How gainfull England was to the court of Rome

Moreouer, he declared that if he might not be heard and haue his mind, he would ſuerlie reſtraine the paſſages out of this realme, that none ſhould go to Rome, leaſt his land ſhould be ſo emptied of monie and treaſure, that he ſhould want ſufficient abilitie to beat backe and expell his enimies that might attempt inuaſion againſt the ſame. Laſtlie of all he concluded, ſith the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbats, and other eccleſiaſticall perſons, as well of his realme of England, as of other his lands and dominions, were ſufficientlie furniſhed with knowlege, that he would not go for anie néed that ſhould driue him thereto, to ſéeke iuſtice or iudgement at the preſcript of any forren perſons.

The popes anſwer vnto the king.

The pope greatlie maruelling hereat, wrote againe to the king, requiring him to abſteine from the ſpoiling of thoſe men that were priuileged by the canons of the church, that he would place the monks againe in their houſe and poſſeſſions, and receiue the archbiſhop canonicallie elected and confirmed, the which for his learning and knowledge, as well in the liberall ſciences, as in holie ſcripture, was thought worthie to be admitted to a prebend in Paris: and what eſtimation he himſelfe had of him it appeared, in that he had written to him thrice ſince he was made cardinall, declaring that although he was minded to call him to his ſeruice, yet he was glad that he was promoted to an higher roome; adding further, how there was good cauſe that he ſhould haue conſideration of him, bicauſe he was borne within his land, of father and mother that were his faithfull ſubiects, and for that he had a prebend in the church of Yorke, which was greater and of more dignitie than that he had in Paris. Whereby not onelie by reaſon of fleſh and blood, but alſo by hauing eccleſiaſticall dignitie and office, it could not be but that he loued him and his realme with ſincere affection.

Manie other reaſons the pope alledged in his letters to king Iohn, to haue perſuaded him to the allowing of the election of Stephan Langton. But king Iohn was ſo far from giuing eare to the popes admonitions, that he with more crueltie handled all ſuch, not onelie of the ſpiritualtie, but alſo of the temporaltie, which by any manner means had aided the forenamed Stephan. The pope being hereof aduertiſed, thought good not to ſuffer ſuch contempt of his authoritie, as he interpreted it; namelie, in a matter that touched the iniurious handling of men within orders of the church. Which example might procure hinderance, not to one priuat perſon alone, but to the whole eſtate of the ſpiritualtie, which he would not ſuffer in any wiſe to be ſuppreſſed. Wherefore he decréed with ſpéed to deuiſe remedie againſt that large increaſing miſchéefe. And though there was no ſpéedier waie to redreſſe the ſame, but by excommunication, yet he would not vſe it at the firſt towards ſo mightie a prince, but gaue him libertie and time to conſider his offenſe and treſpaſſe ſo committed.

Bailiffes of London diſcharged and committed to ward.

¶ Theſe things being brought to this iſſue, the further narration of them ſhall ſtaie for a time, till I haue told you of a little trouble which about this time happened in London. For vpon the ſeuenth of Iune, the bailiffes of London, Roger Wincheſter and Edmund Hardell were diſcharged, and Serle the mercer and Hugh of ſaint Albons choſen in their roomes. The two former bailiffes were diſcharged and committed to priſon by the kings commandement, vpon diſpleaſure taken againſt them, bicauſe they had reſiſted his puruéier of wheat, and would not ſuffer him to conueie anie of that kind of graine out of the citie, till the citie was ſtored. The thirtie & fiue rulers of the citie, hauing fulfilled the kings commandement to them directed for the diſcharging of thoſe bailiffes, and impriſoning them, did after take aduice togither, and appointed a certeine number of themſelues with other to ride vnto the king, as then being at Langley, to obteine pardon for the ſaid bailiffes, and ſo comming thither, they made ſuch excuſe in the matter, ſhewing further, that at the ſame ſeaſon there was ſuch ſcarſitie of wheat in the citie, that the common people were at point to haue made an inſurrection about the ſame. By which means, and through fréendſhip which they had in the court, the king was ſo ſatiſfied, that he releaſed them from priſon, and pardoned their offenſes.

The birth of king Henrie the third. N.Triuet.

The pope writeth to the biſhops. Matt. Paris. Nic. Treuet.

Alſo vpon the firſt of October, Henrie the ſonne of king Iohn, begotten of his wife quéene Iſabell, was borne at Wincheſter, who after ſucceeded his father in the kingdome. But now againe to our purpoſe. The pope perceiuing that king Iohn continued ſtill in his former mind (which he called obſtinacie) ſent ouer his bulles into England, directed to William biſhop of London, to Euſtace biſhop of Elie, and to Mauger biſhop of Worceſter, commanding them that vnleſſe king Iohn would ſuffer peaceablie the archbiſhop of Canturburie to occupie his ſée, and his monks their abbie, they ſhould put both him and his his land vnder the ſentence of interdiction, denouncing him and his land plainelie accurſſed. And further he wrote expreſſe letters vnto all the ſuffragans of the church of Canturburie, that they ſhould by vertue of their obedience, which they owght to the apoſtolike ſée, receiue and obeie the archbiſhop Stephan for their father and metropolitane.

Theſe biſhops with other to them aſſociate, made inſtant requeſt and ſuit to the king for the obſeruing of the popes commandement, and to eſchew the cenſures of the church, but that was in vaine: for the king in a great rage ſware, that if either they or any other preſumed to put his land vnder interdiction, he would incontinentlie therevpon ſend all the prelats within the realme out of the ſame vnto the pope, and ſeize all their goods vnto his owne vſe. And further he added, that what Romans ſoeuer he found within the precinct of any his dominions, he would put out their eies, and ſlit their noſes, and ſo ſend them packing to Rome, that by ſuch marks they might be knowne from all other nations of the world. And herewith he commanded the biſhops to packe out of his ſight, if they loued their owne health and preſeruation.

Herevpon the ſaid biſhops departed, and according to the popes commiſſion to them ſent, vpon the euen of the Annuntiation of our Ladie, denounced both the king and the realme of England accurſed, and furthermore cauſed the doores of churches to be cloſed vp, and all other places where diuine ſeruice was accuſtomed to be vſed, firſt at London, and after in all other places where they came. Then perceiuing that the K. ment not to ſtoope for all this which they had doone, but rather ſought to be reuenged vpon them, they fled the realme, and got them ouer vnto Stephan the archbiſhop of Canturburie, to wit, William biſhop of London, Euſtace biſhop of Elie, Malger biſhop of Worceſter, Joceline biſhop of Bath, and Giles biſhop of Hereford.

¶ It was a miſerable time now for preeſts and churchmen, which were ſpoiled on euerie hand, without finding remedie againſt thoſe that offered them wrong. It is reported that in the borders of Wales, the officers of a ſhiriffe brought before the king a fellow which had robbed and ſlaine a preeſt, deſiring to vnderſtand his pleaſure what ſhould be doone with that offender: vnto whome the king made this anſwer, He hath ſlaine mine enimie, and therefore ſet him at libertie.

The king alſo doubting leaſt the pope ſhould proceed further, and abſolue all his ſubiects of their allegiance which they owght to him, and that his lords would happilie reuolt and forſake him in this his trouble, tooke hoſtages of them whom he moſt ſuſpected. And as the meſſengers, which were ſent abroad for that purpoſe, came vnto the lord William de Breuſe, requiring to haue his ſonnes for the ſaid purpoſe, his wife (like a quicke and haſtie dame) taking the word out of hir huſbands mouth, made this round anſwer, that ſhe would not deliuer hir ſonnes vnto king John, who alreadie had ſlaine his owne nephue Arthur, whome he ought rather honourablie to haue loued and preſerued. Theſe words being ſignified vnto the king, ſet him in ſuch an heat againſt hir huſband (though he rebuked hir ſharpelie for the ſame) that the ſaid lord was glad togither with his wife and children to flee out of the realme into Ireland for ſafegard of their liues.

And in the ſame yeare S. Marie Oueries in Southwarke was begun to be repaired. The ſame yeare alſo, the citizens of London made ſuch ſuit vnto the king, that he granted vnto them by his letters patents, licence to chooſe to themſelues a maior, and two ſhiriffes euerie yeare. After which grant vnto them confirmed, they choſe for their maior Henrie Fitz Alwin, who was ſworne and charged at that preſent maior of that citie, vpon the day of ſaint Michaell the archangell, in the ſaid tenth yeare of king John his reigne. On the ſame day and yeare, were Peter Duke & Thomas Nele ſworne for ſhiriffes. Thus the name of bailiffes from thenceforth was clearelie extinguiſhed.

But here yée haue to vnderſtand, that this Henrie Fitz Alwin had béene maior of London long before this time, euen from the firſt yeare of king Richard (as Iohn Stow hath gathered out of ancient inſtruments and records) vnto this preſent tenth yeare of king John, and now vpon grant made to the citizens, that it ſhould be lawfull for them to chooſe euerie yeare a maior, and two ſhiriffes, for the better gouernment of their citie, the ſaid Henrie Fitz Alwin was newlie by them elected, and likewiſe afterwards from yeare to yeare, till he departed this life, which chanced in the yeare 1213, and fifteenth of king Johns reigne, ſo that he continued maior of the ſame citie of London, by the terme of twentie and foure yeares.

¶ Now therefore bicauſe it appeareth here how the gouernors of the citie of London had their names altered for their greater honour, and the ſtate of gouernment thereby partlie changed, or rather confirmed; I haue thought good (though verie breefelie) to touch ſomewhat the ſignification of this word Maire, before I procéed any further with the reſt of this hiſtorie. The ancient inhabitants of Franconia, or Frankenland, from whome the Frenchmen are deſcended, and their neighbors the old Saxons, of whom the Engliſhmen haue their originall, being people of Germanie, and deſcended (as Beroſus ſaith) of the the old Hebrues, haue reteined manie Hebrue words, either from the beginning, or elſe borowed them abroad in other regions which they conquered, paſſing by force of armes through a great part of the world. For no doubt, by conuerſation with thoſe people whom they ſubdued, they brought home into their owne countrie and toong manie borowed words, ſo that their language hath no ſmall ſtore of them fetched out of ſundrie ſtrange toongs.

Now among other old words remaining in their toong, this word Mar was one, which in Hebrue ſignifieth Dominus, (that is to ſaie, lord) but pronounced now ſomewhat corruptlie Maire. So as it is to be ſuppoſed, hereof it came to paſſe that the head officer and lieutenant to the prince, as well in London as in other cities and townes of the realme, are called by that name of maior, though in the cities of London and Yorke, for an augmentation of honour by an ancient cuſtome (through ignorance what the title of King Iohn holding his Chriſtmaſſe this yeare at Briſtow, ſet forth a commandement, whereby he reſtreined the taking of wild foule. About the ſame time, Henrie duke of Suaben came into England from the emperour Otho, and receiuing no ſmall portion of monie of the king, departed backe into his owne countrie againe. In the vigill of the Epiphanie alſo, the kings ſecond ſonne was borne, and named Richard after his vncles name. And the court of the eſchequer was remoued from Weſtminſter vnto Northampton. Moreouer in the ſame yeare, Walter Gray was made lord chancellour, who in all things ſtudied to ſatiſfie the kings will and purpoſe, for the which he incurred great indignation of the cleargie, and other that fauoured not the procéedings of the king.

The eſchequer remoued.

¶ It was ſuerlie a rufull thing to conſider the eſtate of this realme at that preſent, when as the king neither truſted his péeres, neither the nobilitie fauoured the king; no, there were verie few that truſted one another, but ech one hid & hourded vp his wealth, looking dailie when another ſhould come and enter vpon the ſpoile. The communaltie alſo grew into factions, ſome fauouring, & ſome curſing the king, as they bare affection. The cleargie was likewiſe at diſſention, ſo that nothing preuailed but malice and ſpite, which brought forth and ſpred abroad the fruits of diſobedience to all good lawes and orders, greatlie to the diſquieting of the whole ſtate. So that herein we haue a perfect view of the perplexed ſtate of princes, chéeflie when they are ouerſwaied with forren & prophane power, and not able to aſſure themſelues of their ſubiects allegiance and loialtie. King Iohn notwithſtanding that the realme was thus wholie interdicted and vexed, ſo that no préeſts could be found to ſaie ſeruice in churches or chapels, made no great account thereof as touching any offenſe towards God or the pope: but rather miſtruſting the hollow hearts of his people, he tooke a new oth of them for their faithfull allegiance, and immediatlie therevpon aſſembled an armie to go againſt Alexander king of Scots, vnto whome (as he had heard) diuerſe of the nobilitie of this realme were fled, which Alexander was the ſecond of that name that had ruled the Scots, and latelie before was entred into the rule as lawfull ſucceſſor to the crowne of Scotland, by the death of his father K. William.

In this meane while alſo Stephan archbiſhop of Canturburie lamenting (as ſome haue reported) the ſtate of his natiue countrie, and yet not minding to giue ouer his hold, obteined of pope Innocent, that vpon certeine dais it might be lawfull for an appointed number of préeſts within the realme of England, to celebrate diuine ſeruice, that is to ſay, for thoſe of conuentuall churches once in the wéeke. But the moonks of the white order were forbidden to vſe that priuilege, bicauſe in the beginning of the interdiction they had at the appointment of their principall abbat preſumed to celebrate the ſacraments without the popes conſent or knowledge.

In like maner on the other ſide, king Iohn hauing his armie in a readineſſe, haſted forth towards the borders of Scotland, and comming to the caſtell of Norham, prepared to inuade the Scots. But king Alexander wanting power to giue him battell, ſought to come vnto ſome fréendlie agréement with him, and ſo by counſell of his lords, caſting off his armour, he came to the king, and for a great ſumme of gold (or 11 thouſand marks of ſiluer as ſome write) with much adoo he purchaſed peace, deliuering two of his daughters in hoſtage for more aſſurance of his dealing. Wherevpon king Iohn, after his returne from Norham, which was about the 24 of Iune, ſhewed himſelfe not a little diſpleaſed with thoſe of the nobilitie, which had refuſed to attend vpon him in that iournie, hauing receiued ſtreit commandement from him to attend vpon him at that time. Certes the cauſe why they refuſed to follow him, was euident, as they ſaid, in that they knew him to ſtand accurſed by the pope. About the ſame time alſo, when corne began to wax ripe, to reuenge himſelfe of them that had refuſed to go with him in that iournie, he cauſed the pales of all the parks & forreſts which he had within his realme to be throwne downe, & the diches to be made plaine, that the déere breaking out and ranging abroad in the corne fields, might deſtroie & eat vp the ſame before it could be ripened, for which act (if it were ſo in déed) manie a bitter curſſe procéeded from the mouths of the poore husbandmen towards the kings perſon, and not vnworthilie. Moreouer in this ſeaſon the Welſhmen (which thing had not béene ſéene afore time) came vnto Woodſtoke, and there did homage vnto the king, although the ſame was chargeable, aſwell to the rich as the poore ſo to come out of their countrie.

About the ſame time alſo, it thanced that a préeſt ſlue a woman at Oxford, and when the kings officers could not find him that had committed the murther, they apprehended thrée other préeſts not guiltie of the fact, and ſtreightway hanged them vp without iudgement. With which crueltie others of the Vniuerſitie being put in feare, departed thence in great numbers, and came not thither againe of a long time after, ſome of them repairing to Cambridge, and ſome to Reading to applie their ſtudies in thoſe places, leauing Oxford void. The ſame yeare one Hugh archdeacon of Welles, and kéeper of the kings great ſeale, was nominated biſhop of Lincolne; and herewithall he craued licence to go ouer into France vnto the archbiſhop of Rouen, that he might be conſecrated of him. Wherewith the king was contented and gladlie gaue him leaue, who no ſooner got ouer into Normandie, but he ſtreight tooke the high waie to Rome, and there receiued his conſecration of Stephan archbiſhop of Canturburie. Now when the king vnderſtood this matter, and ſaw the dulneſſe of the biſhop, he was in a wonderfull chaſe toward him, and therevpon made port-ſale of all his goods, and receiued the profit of the reuenues belonging to the ſée of Lincolne for his owne vſe.

¶ There liued in thoſe daies a diuine named Alexander Cementarius, ſurnamed Theologus, who by his preaching incenſed the king greatlie vnto all crueltie (as the moonks and friers ſaie) againſt his ſubiects, affirming that the generall ſcourge wherewith the people were afflicted, chanced not through the princes fault, but for the wickedneſſe of his people, for the king was but the rod of the Lords wrath, and to this end a prince was ordeined, that he might rule the people with a rod of iron, and breake them as an earthen veſſell, to chaine the mighty in fetters, & the noble men in iron manacles. He did ſée (as it ſhould ſéeme) the euill diſpoſed humors of the people concerning their dutifull obedience which they ought to haue borne to their naturall prince king Iohn, and therefore as a doctrine moſt neceſſarie in that dangerous time, he taught the people how they were by Gods lawes bound in dutie to obeie their lawfull prince, and not through any wicked perſuaſion of buſie heads and lewd diſcourſers, to be carried away to forget their loiall allegiance, and ſo to fall into the damnable ſinke of rebellion.

He went about alſo to proue with likelie arguments, that it apperteined not to the pope, to haue to doo concerning the temporall poſſeſſions of any kings or other potentats touching the rule and gouernment of their ſubiects, ſith no power was granted to Peter (the ſpeciall and cheefe of the apoſtles of the Lord) but onlie touching the church, and matters apperteining therevnto. By ſuch doctrine of him ſet foorth, he wan in ſuch wiſe the kings fauour, that he obteined manie great preferments at the kings hands, and was abbat of ſaint Auſtines in Canturburie: but at length, when his manners were notified to the pope, he tooke ſuch order for him, that he was deſpoiled of all his goods and benefices, ſo that afterwards he was driuen in great miſerie to beg his bread from doore to doore, as ſome write. This did he procure to himſelfe by telling the trueth againſt that beaſt, whoſe hornes were pricking at euerie chriſtian prince, that he might ſet himſelfe in a ſeat of ſupremaſie aboue all principalities: ſo that we may ſaie,

Furthermore, about the ſame time the king taxed the Iewes, and greeuouſlie tormented and empriſoned them, bicauſe diuers of them would not willinglie pay the ſummes that they were taxed at. Amongſt other, there was one of them at Briſtow, which would not conſent to giue anie fine for his deliuerance: wherefore by the kings commandement he was put vnto this penance, that euerie daie, till he would agree to giue to the king thoſe ten thouſand marks that he was ſeized at, he ſhould haue one of his teeth plucked out of his head. By the ſpace of ſeauen daies togither he ſtood ſtedfaſt, loſing euerie of thoſe daies a tooth, but on the eight day, when he ſhuld come to haue the eight tooth and the laſt (for he had but eight in all) drawne out, he paid the monie to ſaue that one, who with more wiſedome and leſſe paine might haue doone ſo before, and haue ſaued his ſeauen teeth, which he loſt with ſuch torments, for thoſe homelie toothdrawers vſed no great cunning in plucking them foorth (as may be coniectured.)

King Iohn paſſeth ouer into Ireland.
Polydor.
Matth. Paris.

Whileſt king Iohn was thus occupied, newes came to him, that the Iriſh rebels made foule worke and ſore annoied the Engliſh ſubiects. He therefore aſſembling a mightie armie, imbarked at Penbroke in Wales, and ſo haſting towards Ireland, arriued there the twentie fiue of Maie, and brought the people in ſuch feare immediatlie vpon his arriuall, that all thoſe that inhabited vpon the ſea coaſts in the champaine countries, came in, and yeelded themſelues, receiuing an oth to be true and faithfull vnto him. There were twentie of the cheefeſt rulers within Ireland, which came to the king at his comming to Dublin, and there did to him homage and fealtie as apperteined. The king at the ſame time ordeined alſo, that the Engliſh lawes ſhould be vſed in that land, and appointed ſhiriffes and other officers to haue the order of the countrie, to rule the ſame according to the Engliſh ordinances. After this, he marched forward into the land, and tooke diuerſe fortreſſes and ſtrong holds of his enimies, which fled before him, for feare to be apprehended, as Walter de Lacie and manie other. At length, comming into the countrie of Meth, he beſieged a caſtell, wherein the wife of William de Breuſe, and hir ſonne named alſo William were incloſed, but they found meanes to eſcape before the caſtell was wonne, though afterward they were taken in the Ile of Man, and ſent by the king into England, where they were ſo ſtraitlie kept within the caſtell of Windſor, that (as the fame went) they were famiſhed to death.

Walter de Lacie.

The Ladie de Breuſe & hir ſonne taken.

¶ We read in an old hiſtorie of Flanders, written by one whoſe name is not knowne, but printed at Lions by Guillaume Rouille, in the yeare 1562, that the ſaid ladie, wife to the lord William de Breuſe, preſented vpon a time vnto the queene of England, a gift of foure hundred kine, and one bull, of colour all white, the eares excepted, which were red. Although this tale may ſeeme incredible, yet if we ſhall conſider that the ſaid Breuſe was a lord marcher, and had goodlie poſſeſſions in Wales, and on the marſhes, in which countries the moſt part of the peoples ſubſtance conſiſteth in cattell, it may carrie with it the more likelihood of truth. And ſuerlie the ſame author writeth of the iournie made this yeare into Ireland, ſo ſenſiblie, and namelie touching the manners of the Iriſh, that he ſeemeth to haue had good informations, ſauing that he miſſeth in the names of men and places, which is a fault in maner common to all forreine writers. Touching the death of the ſaid ladie, he ſaith, that within eleuen daies after ſhe was committed to priſon heere in England, ſhe was found dead, ſitting betwixt hir ſonnes legs, who likewiſe being dead, ſate directlie vp againſt a wall of the chamber, wherein they were kept with hard pitance (as writers doo report.) William the father eſcaped, and got away into France.

A preſent of white kine.

He himſelfe eſcapeth.

Thus the more part of the Iriſh people being brought vnder, he appointed Iohn Gray the biſhop of Norwich, to be his deputie there, remouing out of that office Hugh Lacie, which bare great rule in that quarter before. The biſhop then being appointed deputie and cheefe iuſtice of Ireland, reformed the coine there, cauſing the ſame to be made of like weight and fineneſſe to the Engliſh coine, ſo that the Iriſh monie was currant, as well in England, as in Ireland, being of the like weight, forme, and fineneſſe to the Engliſh. Moreouer, thoſe that inhabited the woodcountries and the mounteine places, though they would not as then ſubmit themſelues, he would not at that time further purſue, bicauſe winter was at hand, which in that countrie approcheth timelie in the yeare. Hauing thus ſubdued the more part of all Ireland, and ordered things there at his pleaſure, he tooke the ſea againe with much triumph, and landed in England about the thirtith day of Auguſt.

From hence he made haſt to London, and at his comming thither, tooke counſell how to recouer the great charges and expenſes that he had beene at in this iournie, and by the aduiſe of William Brewer, Robert de Turnham, Reignold de Cornhill, and Richard de Mariſh, he cauſed all the cheefe prelats of England to aſſemble before him at S. Brides in London. So that thither came all the abbats, abbeſſes, templers, hoſpitallers, keepers of farmes and poſſeſſions of the order of Clugnie, and other ſuch forreners as had lands within this realme belonging to their houſes. All which were conſtreined to paie ſuch a greeuous tax, that the whole amounted to the ſumme of an hundred thouſand pounds. The monks of the Ciſteaux order, otherwiſe called white monks, were conſtreined to paie 40 thouſand pounds of ſiluer at this time, all their priuileges to the contrarie notwithſtanding. Moreouer, the abbats of that order might not get licence to go to their generall chapter that yeere, which yeerelie was vſed to be holden, leaſt their complaint ſhould mooue all the world againſt the king, for his too too hard and ſeuere handling of them.

all that came in his way, ſo that he ſubdued all the rulers and princes, without contradiction. And to be the better aſſured for their ſubiection in time following, he tooke pledges of them, to the number of 28, & ſo returned to Album Monaſterium on the date of the Aſſumption of our ladie, from whence he firſt ſet forth into the Welſh confines. In the ſame yeare alſo, the pope ſent two legats into England, the one named Pandulph a lawier, and the other Durant a templer, who comming vnto king Iohn, exhorted him with manie terrible words to leaue his ſtubborne diſobedience to the church, and to reforme his miſdoings. The king for his part quietlie heard them, and bringing them to Northampton, being not farre diſtant from the place where he met them vpon his returne forth of Wales had much conference with them; but at length, when they perceiued that they could not haue their purpoſe, neither for reſtitution of the goods belonging to préeſts which he had ſeized vpon, neither of thoſe that apperteined to certeine other perſons, which the king had gotten alſo into his hands, by meanes of the controuerſie betwixt him and the pope the legats departed, leauing him accurſed, and the land interdicted, as they found it at their comming.

¶ Touching the maner of this interdiction there haue béene diuerſe opinions, ſome haue ſaid, that the land was interdicted throughlie, and the churches and houſes of religion cloſed vp, that no where was anie diuine ſeruice vſed: but it was not ſo ſtreit, for there were diuerſe places occupied with diuine ſeruice all that time, by certeine priuiledges purchaſed either then or before. Children were alſo chriſtened, and men houſeled and annoiled through all the land, except ſuch as were in the bill of excommunication by name expreſſed. But to our purpoſe.

King Iohn, after that the legats were returned toward Rome againe, puniſhed diuerſe of thoſe perſons which had refuſed to go with him into Wales, in like maner as he had doone thoſe that refuſed to go with him into Scotland: he tooke now of ech of them for euerie knights fée two marks of ſiluer, as before is recited. About the ſame time alſo, Reginald earle of Bullongne being accurſed in like maner as king Iohn was, for certeine oppreſſions doone to poore men, and namelie to certeine préeſts, fled ouer into England, bicauſe the French king had baniſhed him out of France.

Reginald erle of Bullongne.

The chéefeſt cauſe of the French kings diſpleaſure towards this earle, may ſéeme to procéed of the amitie and league which was concluded betwixt king Iohn, and the ſaid earle, in the firſt yeare of the ſaid kings reigne, whereby they bound themſelues either to other, not to make anie peace, or to take anie truce with the king of France, without either others conſent firſt thereto had, and that if after anie agréement taken betwixt them and the king of France, he ſhould chance to make warre againſt either of them, then ſhould the other aid and aſſiſt him, againſt whom ſuch warre ſhould be made, to the vttermoſt of his power.

The like league was made in the ſame firſt yeare of king Iohn betwixt him & Ferdinando earle of Flanders.

This league was accorded to remaine for euer betwixt them and their heires, with ſuerties ſworne on either part: and for the king of England, theſe, whoſe names inſue, William Marſhall earle of Penbroke, Ranulfe earle of Cheſter, Robert earle of Leiceſter, Baldwine earle of Albemarle, William earle of Arundell, Ralfe earle of Augi, Robert de Mellet, Hugh de Gourney, William de Kaen, Geffrey de Tella, Roger coneſtable of Cheſter, Ralfe Fitz Water, William de Albanie, Robert de Ros, Richard de Montfichet, Roger de Thoney, Saer de Quincie, William de Montcheniſe, Peter de Pratellis, William de Poole aliàs de Stagno, Adam de Port, Robert de Turneham, William Mallet, Euſtace de Veſcie, Peter de Brus, William de Preſennie, Hubert de Burgh, William de Manſey, and Peter Sauenie. For the earle, theſe were ſuerties, Anſelme de Kaen, Guy Lieſchans, Ralfe the ſaid earles brother, &c. But now to returne.

After that the earle of Bullongne was expelled out of France (as before ye haue heard) he came ouer to king Iohn, and was of him ioifullie receiued, hauing thrée hundred pounds of reuenues in land to him aſſigned within England, for the which he did homage and fealtie vnto him. Shortlie after this alſo, died William de Breuſe the elder, which fled from the face of king Iohn out of Ireland into France, and departing this life at Corbell, was buried at Paris in the abbeie of S. Victor.

Polydor.

In the meane time pope Innocent, after the returne of his legats out of England, perceiuing that king Iohn would not be ordered by him, determined with the conſent of his cardinals and other councellours, and alſo at the inſtant ſuit of the Engliſh biſhops and other prelats being there with him, to depriue king Iohn of his kinglie ſtate, and ſo firſt abſolued all his ſubiects and vaſſals of their oths of allegiance made vnto the ſame king, and after depriued him by ſolemne proteſtation of his kinglie adminiſtration and dignitie, and laſtlie ſignified that his depriuation vnto the French king and other chriſtian princes, admoniſhing them to purſue king Iohn, being thus depriued, forſaken, and condemned as a common enimie to God and his church. He ordeined furthermore, that whoſoeuer imploied goods or other aid to vanquiſh and ouercome that diſobedient prince, ſhould remaine in aſſured peace of the church, as well as thoſe which went to viſit the ſepulchre of our Lord, notonlie in their goods and perſons, but alſo in ſuffrages for ſauing of their ſoules.

But yet that it might appeare to all men, that nothing could be more ioifull vnto his holineſſe, than to haue king Iohn to repent his treſpaſſes committed, and to aſke forgiueneſſe for the ſame, he appointed Pandulph, which latelie before was returned to Rome, with a great number of Engliſh exiles, to go into France, togither with Stephan the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the other Engliſh biſhops, giuing him in commandement, that repairing vnto the French king, he ſhould communicate with him all that which he had appointed to be doone againſt king Iohn, and to exhort the French king to make warre vpon him, as a perſon for his wickedneſſe excommunicated. Moreouer this Pandulph was commanded by the pope, if he ſaw cauſe, to go ouer into England, and to deliuer vnto king Iohn ſuch letters as the pope had written for his better inſtruction, and to ſéeke by all means poſſible to draw him from his naughtie opinion.

Pādulph ſent into France to practiſe with the frēch king, for king Iohn his deſtruction.

In the meane time, when it was bruted through the realme of England, that the pope had releaſed the people & abſolued them of their oth of fidelitie to the king, and that he was depriued of his gouernement by the popes ſentence, by little and little a great number both of ſouldiers, citizens, burgeſſes, capteins and coneſtables of caſtels, leauing their charges, & biſhops with a great multitude of préeſts reuolting from him, and auoiding his companie and preſence, ſecretlie ſtale awaie, and got ouer into France.

The ſame yeare king Iohn held his Chriſtmaſſe at Windſor, and in the Lent following, on midlent ſundaie being at London, he honoured the lord Alexander ſonne and heire to the king of Scots, with the high order of knighthood. And (as I find it mentioned by ſome writers) wheras he vnderſtood how there were diuerſe in Scotland, that contemning their naturall lord and king by reaſon of his great age, king Iohn went thither with an armie to repreſſe the rebels, and being come thither, he ſent his men of war into the inner parts of the country, who ſcowring the coaſts, tooke Guthred Macwilliam capteine of them that moued ſedition, whom king Iohn cauſed to be hanged on a paire of gallowes. This Guthred was deſcended of the line of the ancient Scotiſh kings, and being aſſiſted with the Iriſhmen and Scots that fauoured not the race of the kings that preſentlie reigned, wrought them much trouble, as his father (named Donald) had doone before him, ſometime ſecretlie vnder hand, and ſometime againe by way of open rebellion.

King Iohn hangeth the welſh pledges.

Shortlie after, the Welſhmen began to ſturre alſo, who ruſhing out of their owne confines, fell vpon their next neighbours within the Engliſh marſhes, waſted the countrie, and ouerthrew diuerſe caſtels flat to the ground. Whereof the king hauing knowledge, aſſembled a mightie armie out of hand, and comming to Notingham, he hanged vp the Welſh hoſtages which the laſt yeare he had receiued, to the number of eight and twentie yoong ſtriplings. And by reaſon he was now ſet in a maruellous chafe, he roughlie procéeded againſt all thoſe whom he knew not to fauor his caſe: ſome he diſcharged of their offices, other he depriued of their capteineſhips and other roomes, & reuoked certeine priuileges & immunities granted to monks, préeſts, & men of religion.

King Iohn breaketh vp his armie.

Furthermore, hauing his armie readie to paſſe on into Wales, he receiued letters the ſame time, both from the king of Scots, and from his daughter the wife of Leoline prince of Wales, conteining in effect the aduertiſement of one matter, which was to let him know, that if he procéeded on his iournie, he ſhould either through treaſon be ſlaine of his owne lords, or elſe be deliuered to be deſtroied of his enimies. The king iudging no leſſe, but that the tenor of the letters conteined a truth, brake vp his armie and returned to London. From whence he ſent meſſengers vnto all ſuch lords as he ſuſpected, commanding them to ſend vnto him hoſtages for more aſſurance of their fidelities. The lords durſt not diſobeie his commandement, but ſent their ſons, their nephues, and other their kinſmen, accordinglie as he required, and ſo his rancour was appeaſed for a time. But Euſtace de Veſcie, Robert Fitz Walter, and Stephan Ridell, being accuſed and ſuſpected of the K. for the ſaid treaſon, were glad to flée the realme, Veſcie departing into Scotland, and the other two into France.

Saint Mar Oueries burnt.

The ſame yeare, the church of S. Marie Oueries, and all the buildings vpon London bridge on both ſides the ſame, were conſumed with fire, which was iudged to be a ſignification of ſome miſhap to follow. The king held his Chriſtmaſſe this yeare at Weſtminſter, with no great traine of knights about him. About the ſame time Geffrey archbiſhop of Yorke departed this life, after he had remained in exile about a ſeauen yeares. But now to returne againe to the practiſes of the popes legats.

The deceaſſe of Geffrey th archbiſhop o Yorke.

The Frenc king prepared to inuad England.

Ye ſhall vnderſtand, the French king being requeſted by Pandulph the popes legat, to take the warre in hand againſt king Iohn, was eaſilie perſuaded thereto of an inward hatred that he bare vnto our king, and therevpon with all diligence made his prouiſion of men, ſhips, munition and vittell, in purpoſe to paſſe ouer into England: and now was his nauie readie rigged at the mouth of Saine, and he in greateſt forwardneſſe, to take his iournie. When Pandulph vpon good conſiderations thought firſt to go eftſoones, or at the leaſt wiſe to ſend into England, before the French armie ſhould land there, and to aſſaie once againe, if he might induce the king to ſhew himſelfe reformable vnto the popes pleaſure: king Iohn hauing knowledge of the French kings purpoſe and ordinance, aſſembled his people, and lodged with them alongſt by the coaſt towards France, that he might reſiſt his enimies, and kéepe them off from landing.

Matth. Pari
The great mie which John aſſem bled togith

Here writers declare, that he had got togither ſuch an armie of men out of all the parts of his realme, both of lords, knights, gentlemen, yeomen, & other of the commons, that notwithſtanding all the prouiſion of vittels that might poſſible be recouered, there could not be found ſufficient ſtore to ſuſteine the huge multitude of them that were gathered alongſt the coaſt, namelie at Douer, Feuerſham, Gipſewich, and other places. Wherevpon the capteins diſcharged and ſent home a great number of the commons, reteining onelie the men of armes, yeomen, and fréeholders, with the croſſebowes and archers. There came likewiſe to the kings aid at the ſame time, the biſhop of Norwich out of Ireland, bringing with him fiue hundred men of armes, & a great ſort of other horſſemen.

The biſhop Norwich.

To conclude, there was eſtéemed of able men aſſembled togither in the armie on Barhamdowne, what of choſen men of armes, and valiant yeomen, and other armed men, the number of ſixtie thouſand: ſo that if they had béene all of one mind, and well bent towards the ſeruice of their king and defenſe of their countrie, there had not béene a prince in chriſtendome, but that they might haue béene able to haue defended the realme of England againſt him. He had alſo prouided a nauie of ſhips farre ſtronger than the French kings, readie to fight with them by ſea, if the caſe had ſo required.

Polydor.
Two knigh of the temp

But as he lay thus readie, néere to the coaſt, to withſtand and beat backe his enimies, there arriued at Douer two Templers, who comming before the king, declared vnto him that they were ſent from Pandulph the popes legat, who for his profit coueted to talke with him: for he had (as they affirmed) meanes to propone, whereby he might be reconciled, both to God and his church, although he were adiudged in the court of Rome, to haue forfeited all the right which he had to his kingdome.

The king vnderſtanding the meaning of the meſſengers, ſent them backe againe to bring ouer the legat, who incontinentlie came ouer to Douer, of whoſe arriuall when the king was aduertiſed, he went thither, and receiued him with all due honour and reuerence. Now after they had talked togither a little, and courteouſlie ſaluted each other (as the courſe of humanitie required) the legat (as it is reported) vttered theſe words following.

The legat Pandulph commeth ouer.

The ſawcie ſpeech of proud Pandulph the popes lewd legat, to king Iohn, in the preſumptuous popes behalfe.

I Doo not thinke that you are ignorant, how pope Innocent, to do that which to his dutie apperteineth, hath both abſolued your ſubiects of that oth which they made vnto you at the beginning, and alſo taken from you the gouernance of England, according to your deſerts, and finallie giuen commandement vnto certeine princes of Chriſtendome, to expell you out of this kingdom and to place an other in your roome; ſo worthilie to puniſh you for your diſobedience and contempt of religion: and that Philip king of France, with the firſt being readie to accompliſh the popes commandement, hath an armie in a readineſſe; and with his nauie newlie decked, rigged and furniſhed in all points, lieth at the mouth of the riuer of Saine, looking for a proſperous wind, that as ſoone as it commeth about, he may ſaile therewith hither into England, truſting (as he ſaith) with the helpe of your owne people (which neither name you, nor will take you for their king) to ſpoile you of your kingdome with ſmall adoo, and to conquer it at his pleaſure, for he hath (as he ſticketh not to proteſt openlie to the world) a charter made by all the cheefeſt lords of England touching their fealtie and obedience aſſured to him. Therfore, ſith God for your iuſt deſert is wroth with you, and that you are as euill ſpoken of by all men, as they that come againſt you be well reported, I would aduiſe you, that whileſt there is a place for grace and fauour, rather to obeie the popes iuſt demands, to whoſe word other chriſtian princes are readie to giue eare, than by ſtriuing in vaine to caſt awaie your ſelfe and all others that take your part, or are bent to defend your quarell or cauſe.

Theſe words being thus ſpoken by the legat, king Iohn as then vtterlie deſpairing in his matters, when he ſaw himſelfe conſtreined to obeie, was in a great perplexitie of mind, and as one full of thought, looked about him with a frowning countenance, waieng with himſelfe what counſell were beſt for him to follow. At length, oppreſſed with the burthen of the imminent danger and ruine, againſt his will, and verie loth ſo to haue doone, he promiſed vpon his oth to ſtand to the popes order and decree. Wherefore ſhortlie after (in like manner as pope Innocent had commanded) he tooke the crowne from his owne head, and deliuered the ſame to Pandulph the legat, neither he, nor his heires at anie time thereafter to receiue the ſame, but at the popes hands. Vpon this, he promiſed to receiue Stephan the archbiſhop of Canturburie into his fauour, with all other the biſhops and baniſhed men, making vnto them ſufficient amends for all iniuries to them doone, and ſo to pardon them, that they ſhould not run into any danger, for that they had rebelled againſt him.

K. Iohn deliuereth his crowne vnto Pandulph.

Then Pandulph kéeping the crowne with him for the ſpace of fiue daies in token of poſſeſſion thereof, at length (as the popes vicar) gaue it him againe. By meanes of this act (ſaith Polydor) the fame went abroad, that king Iohn willing to continue the memorie hereof, made himſelfe vaſſall to pope Innocent, with condition, that his ſucceſſors ſhould likewiſe from thenceforth acknowledge to haue their right to the ſame kingdome from the pope. But thoſe kings that ſucceeded king Iohn, haue not obſerued any ſuch lawes of reconciliation, neither doo the autentike chronicles of the realme make mention of any ſuch ſurrender, ſo that ſuch articles as were appointed to king Iohn to obſerue, perteined vnto him that had offended, and not to his ſucceſſors. Thus ſaith Polydor.

Pandulph reſtoreth the crowne again to the king.

Howbeit, Ranulph Higden in his booke intituled Polychronicon, ſaith indéed, that king Iohn did not onelie bind himſelfe, but his heires and ſucceſſors, being kings of England, to be feudaries vnto pope Innocent and his ſucceſſors popes of Rome, that is to ſay, that they ſhould hold their dominions of them in fee, yéelding and paieng yéerelie to the ſée of Rome the ſumme of ſeauen hundred marks for England, and thrée hundred marks for Ireland. Furthermore, by report of the moſt autentike and approoued writers, king Iohn, to auoid all dangers, which (as he doubted) might inſue, deſpairing as it were in himſelfe, or rather moſt ſpeciallie for lacke of loiall dutie in his ſubiects, conſented to all the perſuaſions of Pandulph, and ſo (not without his great hartgréefe) he was contented to take his oth, togither with ſixtéene earles and barons, who laieng their hands vpon the holie euangeliſts, ſware with him vpon perill of their ſoules, that he ſhould ſtand to the iudgement of the church of Rome, and that if he repented him, and would refuſe to ſtand to promiſe, they ſhould then compell him to make ſatiſfaction. Héervpon, they being all togither at Douer, the king and Pandulph, with the earls and barons, and a great multitude of other people, agréed and concluded vpon a finall peace in forme as here inſueth.

IOhn by the grace of God king of England, and lord of Ireland, from this houre forward, ſhall be faithfull to God and to ſaint Peter, and to the church of Rome, and to my lord pope Innocentius, and to his ſucceſſours lawfully entring. Theſe things were done on the eeue of the Aſcenſion of our Lord, in the yeare 1213.

Matth. Paris

Fortie thou ſand marks of ſiluer ſaith Matth. Weſt.

Pandulph hauing thus reconciled king Iohn, thought not good to releaſe the excommunication, till the king had performed all things which he had promiſed, and ſo with all ſpeed hauing receiued eight thouſand markes ſterling in part of reſtitution to be made to the archbiſhop, and the other baniſhed men, he ſailed backe into France, & came to Roan, where he declared to king Philip the effect of his trauell, and what he had doone in England. But king Philip hauing in this meane while conſumed a great maſſe of monie, to the ſumme of ſixtie thouſand pounds, as he himſelfe alledged, about the furniture of his iournie, which he intended to haue made into England, vpon hope to haue had no ſmall aid within the realme, by reaſon of ſuch biſhops and other baniſhed men as he had in France with him, was much offended for the reconciliation of king Iohn, and determined not ſo to breake off his enterpriſe, leaſt it might be imputed to him for a great reproch to haue beene at ſuch charges and great expenſes in vaine. Therefore calling his councell togither, he declared vnto them what he purpoſed to doo.

The Frenc K. diſpleaſ for the recon ciliation of K John with the pope.

All his Nobles in like manner held with him, and allowed his purpoſe to be verie good and requiſite, except the earle of Flanders named Ferdinando, who (in hope to recouer againe thoſe townes, which the French king held from him in Arthois, as Aire, and S. Omers) had ioined ſecretlie in league with king Iohn, and with the earle of Bullongne, and therefore miſliked the concluſion of their aduiſe. Howbeit king Philip not being yet fullie certified hereof, cauſed his nauie to draw alongeſt the coaſt towards Flanders, whither he himſelfe haſted to go alſo by land, that comming thither, he might from thence ſaile ouer into England, and take land at a place to him aſſigned.

The Frenc king meane to proceed i his iourne againſt th realme of England.

Now it came to paſſe, that at his comming to Graueling, he had perfect knowledge, that the earle of Flanders was ioined in league with his enimies, therefore he determined firſt to ſubdue the earle, leaſt whileſt he ſhould be out of his realme, ſome great trouble or ſedition might riſe within his owne dominions. Therefore, leauing the enterpriſe which he ment to haue made againſt England, he turned his power againſt the earle of Flanders, and firſt commanded his nauie to ſaile vnto the port of Dam, whileſt he himſelfe kéeping on his iournie ſtill by land, tooke the towne of Caſſile, and likewiſe Ypres. From thence he went to Bruges, and beſieged the towne, but he could not win it at the firſt, and therefore leauing a power of men to mainteine the ſiege before it, he himſelfe went to Gaunt, and thereto alſo laid his ſiege.

The French K. inuadeth Flanders.

Gaunt beſieged by the French king.

In the meane time, the earle of Flanders perceiuing that he was not able to reſiſt ſo puiſſant an enimie as the French king, ſent ouer in haſt vnto the king of England for aid. Wherevpon king Iohn vnderſtanding that his aduerſarie king Philip had turned all his force againſt the earle of Flanders, and that thereby he was deliuered out of the feare of the Frenchmens comming into England; that ſame nauie (which as before is recited) he had put in a readineſſe, conteining the number of fiue hundred ſaile, he ſent ſtreight into Flanders with a ſtrong armie, both of horſſemen and footmen, vnder the guiding of William duke of Holland, William Longſpée earle of Saliſburie baſe brother to king Iohn, and Reignold earle of Bullongne.

Match.Paris.

Theſe capteins being now paſſed foorth with their fléets into the maine ſea, eſpied anon manie ſhips lieng without the hauen of Dam (for the number of ſhips of the French fléet was ſo great, that the hauen could not receiue them all, ſo that manie of them laie at anchor without the hauen mouth, and all alongſt the coaſt.) Wherefore they ſent foorth certeine ſhallops, to eſpie whether they were fréends or enimies, and what their number and order was. It chanced, that the ſame time, the men of warre which were appointed to kéepe the French fléet, were gone foorth, togither with a great number of the mariners, to ſpoile and fetch booties abroad in the countrie.

The Engliſh eſpials therefore, making ſemblance as though they had béene ſome fiſhermen of thoſe parts, came verie néere the French ſhips lieng at anchor, and perceiuing them to be vnfurniſhed of people neceſſarie to defend them, came backe to their companie, and declared what they had ſéene, certifieng their capteins that the victorie was in their hands, if they would make ſpéed. The capteins glad of theſe newes, commanded their men to make them readie to giue battell, and cauſing their mariners to make ſaile directlie towards the French fléet, at their firſt approch they wanne thoſe tall ſhips that laie at anchor abroad before the hauen, without anie great reſiſtance, the mariners onelie making requeſt to haue their liues ſaued. The other ſmaller veſſels which (after the tide was gone) remained vpon the ſands (ſpoiling them firſt of their tackle and other things that would ſerue to vſe) they conſumed with fier, the mariners eſcaping by flight.

The Engliſh men aſſaile the French ſhips.

Thus the Engliſhmen hauing diſpatched this buſineſſe with good ſucceſſe, did ſet vpon thoſe ſhips that laie in harbrough within the hauen. But here was hard hold for a while, bicauſe the narrowneſſe of the place would not giue anie great aduantage to the greater number. And thoſe Frenchmen that were gone abroad into the countrie, perceiuing that the enimies were come, by the running awaie of the mariners, returned with all ſpéed to their ſhips to aid their fellowes, and ſo made valiant reſiſtance for a time, till the Engliſhmen getting on land, and ranging themſelues on either ſide of the hauen, beat the Frenchmen ſo on the ſides, and the ſhips grapling togither on front, that they fought as it had bin in a pitcht field, till that finallie the Frenchmen were not able to ſuſteine the force of the Engliſhmen, but were conſtreined (after long fight and great ſlaughter) to yéeld themſelues priſoners.

The Engliſh men wanne the French ſhips.

The Engliſh capteins glad of this victorie gotten, contrarie to expectation, firſt gaue thanks to God for the ſame, and then manning thrée hundred of thoſe French ſhips, which they had taken fraught with corne, wine, oile, fleſh, and other vittels, and alſo with armour, they ſent them awaie into England, and afterwards they ſet fire vpon the reſidue that laie on ground, which were aboue an hundred, bicauſe they were drawne vp ſo farre vpon the ſands, that they could not eaſilie get them out, without their further inconuenience. After this, comming on land with their power, they marched foorth into the countrie in good order of battell, to the end that if they ſhould encounter with king Philip by the way comming to the reſcue of his ſhips, they might be readie to giue them battell, which thing was not deuiſed, without good and great conſideration.

For king Philip being certified of the danger wherein his ſhips ſtood by the ſudden comming of his enimies, and therewithall being in good hope to come to their ſuccours in time, and yer the Engliſhmen had wrote their full feat, he raiſed his ſiege, and made haſt toward the coaſt: but as he was comming forward towards his nauie, he was aduertiſed that the enimies had wonne all his whole fléet, and were now marching foorth to méet him, and to giue him battell. Alſo it was told him, how Ferdinando the earle of Flanders, being certified of the victorie atchiued by his fréends, followed at his backe. Wherefore, leaſt he ſhould ſéeme ouer raſhlie to commit himſelfe into manifeſt perill, he ſtaied a little from Bruges, and there incamped for that day, as if he ment to abide the comming of his enimies.

The next morrow he raiſed and returned towards France, the verie ſame waie that he came, no man purſuing him. For the Engliſhmen contented with that victorie which they had gotten, thought it not neceſſarie to follow him with their further hazard. In the meane time, king Iohn receiuing newes of this proſperous victorie thus gotten by his people, did wonderfullie reioiſe for the ſame, conceiuing an hope, that all his buſineſſe would now come forward and growe to good ſucceſſe.

The French K. returneth into France.

¶ This is the truth of this hiſtorie, as ſome authors haue ſet it foorth. But Iames Meir in his diſcourſe of Flanders declareth the matter ſomwhat otherwiſe, as thus: Vpon the thurſdaie before the Pentecoſt (ſaith he) the Engliſh fléet ſetting vpon the French nauie, which laie at anchor in the hauen of Dam, drowned certeine of the French veſſels, and tooke to the number of foure, which they conueied awaie with them. Ferdinando the earle of Flanders hauing an armie of men readie by land, was lodged the ſame time not far off from the coaſt, and therefore hearing what had chanced, came the next day, and ioined with the Engliſhmen.

There were yet remaining alſo diuerſe other of the French ſhips (beſides thoſe which the Engliſhmen had ſunke and taken) which were drawne vp further into the land ward. The earle of Flanders therefore, and the Engliſh capteins iudged, that it ſhould much hinder the French kings attempts, if they might win thoſe ſhips alſo with the towne of Dam, wherin the king had laid vp a great part of his prouiſion for the furniture of his warres. Hérevpon the Engliſhmen were ſet on land, and ioining with the earls power, they marched ſtrait towards Dam. This was vpon Whitſun éeuen, on the which day, as they were moſt buſie in aſſaulting the towne and ſhips which laie there in the hauen, the French king being come awaie from Gaunt, ſuddenlie ſet vpon them, and though in the beginning he found ſharpe reſiſtance, yet in the end, the Engliſhmen and Flemmings ouerſet with the great multituds of the Frenchmen, were put to flight, and chaſed to their ſhips, with the loſſe of two thouſand men, beſides thoſe that were taken priſoners, amongſt the which were found to be 22 knights.

The French king burneth his ſhips.

The earle of Flanders with the earles of Bullen and Saliſburie, doubting to loſe their ſhips, and late gotten bootie, ſailed ſtrait into one of the Iles of Zeland called Walkeren. Then the French king conſtreining them of Gaunt, Bruges, and Ypres, to deliuer vnto him pledges, cauſed the towne of Dam, and his ſhips lieng there in the hauen to be burned, doubting leaſt they ſhould come into the hands of his enimies, This doone, he returned into France, leauing his ſonne Lewes and the earle of S. Paule in garriſon at Liſle and Doway, and for great ſums of monie, which by agréement he receiued of the townes of Gaunt, Bruges, and Ypres, he reſtored vnto them their pledges. Thus ſaith Meire: and Matthew Paris differeth not much from him touching the ſucceſſe which chanced to the Engliſhmen by land.

An heremit named Peter of Pontfret, or Wakefield as ſome writers haue.

Sée M. Fox, tome firſt, pag. 331.

There was in this ſeaſon an heremit, whoſe name was Peter, dwelling about Yorke, a man in great reputation with the common people, bicauſe that either inſpired with ſome ſpirit of propheſie as the people beléeued, or elſe hauing ſome notable ſkill in art magike, he was accuſtomed to tell what ſhould follow after. And for ſo much as oftentimes his ſaiengs prooued true, great credit was giuen to him as to a verie prophet: which was no good conſequence that therefore his predictions compriſed vndoubted euents. Naie rather, ſith in this pſeudoprophet or falſe foreteller of afterclaps, theſe neceſſarie concurrents (namelie,

Si ſenſus atq; affectus compreſſerit omnes,
Si ſpernens prorſus mortalia gaudia, ſeſe
Abdicet a curis terrenis, aſſiduóq;
Conetur ſtudio ad ſuperos extollere mentem,
Tunc etenim ſapiens fiet, poterítq; futura

Hoc pacto cecinère olim ventura prophetæ)

were wanting, and that he was contrarilie qualified to that which this heptaſtichon comprehendeth, neceſſarilie it foloweth, that he was not as he was taken, but rather a deluder of the people, and an inſtrument of ſatan raiſed vp for the inlargement of his kingdome; as the ſequele of this diſcourſe importeth. This Peter about the firſt of Ianuarie laſt paſt, had told the king, that at the feaſt of the Aſcenſion it ſhould come to paſſe, that he ſhould be caſt out of his kingdome. And (whether, to the intent that his words ſhould be the better beléeued, or whether vpon too much truſt of his owne cunning) he offered himſelfe to ſuffer death for it, if his propheſie prooued not true. Herevpon being committed to priſon within the caſtell of Corf, when the day by him prefixed came, without any other notable damage vnto king Iohn, he was by the kings commandement drawne from the ſaid caſtell, vnto the towne of Warham, & there hanged, togither with his ſonne.

The heremit and his ſonne hanged.

The people much blamed king Iohn, for this extreame dealing, bicauſe that the heremit was ſuppoſed to be a man of great vertue, and his ſonne nothing guiltie of the offenſe committed by his father (if any were) againſt the king. Moreouer, ſome thought, that he had much wrong to die, bicauſe the matter fell out euen as he had propheſied: for the day before the Aſcenſion day, king Iohn had reſigned the ſuperioritie of his kingdome (as they tooke the matter) vnto the pope, and had doone to him homage, ſo that he was no abſolute king indéed, as authors affirme. One cauſe, and that not the leaſt which mooued king Iohn the ſooner to agrée with the pope, roſe through the words of the ſaid heremit, that did put ſuch a feare of ſome great miſhap in his hart, which ſhould grow through the diſloialtie of his people, that it made him yéeld the ſooner. But to the matter againe.

King Iohn (after his capteins in Flanders had ſped ſo well as before yée haue heard) prepared to make a voiage into Guien, not much regarding the matter, in that the realme ſtood as yet interdicted. But when he vnderſtood by his lords, that they would not go with him except the interdicting might firſt be releaſed, and he clearlie abſolued of the popes curſſe, to the end that Gods wrath and the popes being fullie pacified towards him, he might with better ſpéed mooue and mainteine the warres, he was conſtreined to change his purpoſe, and ſo comming to Wincheſter, diſpatched forth a meſſenger with letters, ſigned with the hands of foure and twentie earles and barons, to the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the biſhops of London, Lincolne, and Hereford, as then ſoiourning in France, requiring them with all the other baniſhed men to returne into England, promiſing them by his letters patents, not onelie a ſure ſafeconduct for their comming ouer, but that he would alſo forget all paſſed diſpleaſures, and frankelie reſtore vnto euerie man all that by his means had béene wrongfullie taken from them, and as yet by him deteined.

King Iohn writeth to th archbiſhop & the other biſhops to returne.

The biſhops doo returne.

They came t Wincheſter ŷ 20 of Iulie.

The K. kneleth to the archbiſhop.

The archbiſhop and the other biſhops receiuing the kings letters, with all ſpéed made haſt to come into England, and ſo arriuing at Douer the ſixtéenth day of Iulie, with other the baniſhed men, they went to Wincheſter, where the king yet remained, who hearing that the biſhops were come, went forth to receiue them, and at his firſt méeting with the archbiſhop of Canturburie, he knéeled downe at his féet, and beſought him of forgiueneſſe, and that it would pleaſe him and the other biſhops alſo to prouide for the reléefe of the miſerable ſtate of the realme. Herewith the water ſtanding in diuerſe of their eies on both ſides, they entred into the citie, the people greatlie reioiſing to behold the head of the commonwealth agrée at length with the members. This was in the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour 1213.

The king praieth to be abſolued.

He is abſolued.

A queſt of inquirie.

King Iohn required of the archbiſhop (hauing as then the popes power in his hands, bicauſe he was his legat) to be abſolued, promiſing vpon his ſolemne receiued oth, that he would (afore all things) defend the church and the order of prieſthood from receiuing anie wrongs. Alſo, that he would reſtore the old lawes made by the ancient kings of England, and namelie thoſe of S. Edward, which were almoſt extinguiſhed and forgotten. And further, that he would make recompenſe to all men whom he had by anie meanes indamaged. This doone, he was abſolued by the archbiſhop, & ſhortly after he ſent his oratours to Rome, to intreat with the biſhop to take awaie the interdicion of the land. On the morrow after alſo, the king ſent his letters vnto all the ſhiriffes of the counties within the realme, commanding them to ſummon foure lawfull men of euerie towne belonging to the demeans of the crowne, to make their appearance at S. Albons, vpon the 4 daie of Auguſt, that they and other might make inquiſition of the loſſes which euerie biſhop had ſuſteined, what had béene taken from them, and what ought to be reſtored to them as due for the ſame.

The archbiſhop for that time taking his leaue of the king, went to Canturburie, where he reſtored the monks to their abbie, and then tooke poſſeſſion of his ſée, being the two and fortith archbiſhop that had ruled the ſame. In the meane time, the king repaired to Porteſmouth, there to take the ſea to ſaile ouer into Poictow, committing the rule of the realme vnto Geffrey Fitz Peter or Fitz Péers, lord chéefe iuſtice, and to the biſhop of Wincheſter, commanding them to vſe the counſell and aduiſe of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, in gouerning things touching the common-wealth. Herewith there came alſo to the king a great multitude of men of warre, alledging, that they had ſpent in ſtaieng for him, and his going ouer ſea all their monie, ſo that he muſt now néeds giue them wages, if he would haue them to paſſe ouer with him into France. The which when he refuſed to doo, he was conſtreined to take the water with his owne ſeruants, arriuing about a thrée daies after at the Ile of Ierſey: but perceiuing that none of his lords followed him according to his commandement, as one diſappointed of aid, he returned backe againe into England, there to take further order for this their miſdemeanour.

The lords refuſe to follow the king into France.

Whileſt theſe things were thus in dooing, Geffrey Fitz Peter, and the biſhop of Wincheſter were come to S. Albons, togither with the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and other biſhops and péeres of the realme, where the kings peace being proclaimed to all men, it was on his behalfe ſtreitlie commanded, that the lawes of K. Henrie his grandfather ſhould be obſerued vniuerſallie within his realme, and that all vniuſt lawes and ordinances ſhould be abrogated. It was alſo commanded, that no ſhiriffe, nor forreſter, nor other miniſter of the kings, ſhould vpon paine of life and limme, take violentlie anie thing of any man by waie of extortion, nor preſume to wrong anie man, or to fine anie man, as they had afore time béene accuſtomed to doo.

King Henrie the firſt his lawes.

After this, the king being come backe from his iournie, which he purpoſed to haue made into Poictow, aſſembled an armie, and ment to haue gone againſt thoſe lords which had refuſed to go with him, but the archbiſhop of Canturburie comming to him at Northampton, ſought to appeaſe his mood, and to cauſe him to ſtaie, but yet in his furious rage he went forward till he came to Notingham, and there with much adoo, the archbiſhop following him with threatning to excommunicate all thoſe that ſhould aid him, procured him to leaue off his enterpriſe.

The archbiſhop menaceth to excommunicate thoſe ỹ aſſiſt the king.

Then the archbiſhop (about the fiue and twentith day of Auguſt) came to London, there to take aduiſe for the reformation of things touching the good gouernement of the common-wealth. But here whileſt the archbiſhop, with other péeres of the realme deuiſed orders verie neceſſarie (as was thought) for the ſtate of the common-wealth, the king doubting leaſt the ſame ſhould be a bridle for him to reſtreine his authoritie roiall from dooing things to his pleaſure, he began to find fault, and ſéemed as though he had repented himſelfe of his large promiſes made for his reconciliation: but the archbiſhop of Canturburie ſo aſſwaged his mood, and perſuaded him, by opening vnto him what danger would inſue both to him and to his realme, if he went from the agréement, that he was glad to be quiet for feare of further trouble.

In this hurlie burlie alſo the lords and péeres of the realme (by the ſetting on of the archbiſhop) were earneſtlie bent to haue the king to reſtore and confirme the grant which his grandfather king Henrie the firſt had by his charter granted and confirmed to his ſubiects, which to doo, king Iohn thought greatlie preiudiciall to his roiall eſtate and dignitie. The earle of Tholouſe hauing loſt all his poſſeſſions, the citie of Tholouſe onelie excepted, came ouer into England, & rendred the ſaid citie into the hands of king Iohn, and receiued at his departure, the ſumme of ten thouſand marks as was reported, by the bountifull gift of king Iohn.

Ralfe Cog. The earle of Tholouſe.

Matth. Paris. Geffrey Fitz Péers or Fitz Peter departeth this life.

Vpon the ſecond of October, Geffrey Fitz Peter earle of Eſſex and lord chéefe iuſtice of England departed this life, a man of great power and autoritie, in whoſe politike direction and gouernement, the order of things perteining to the common-wealth chéefelie conſiſted. He was of a noble mind, expert in knowledge of the lawes of the land, rich in poſſeſſions, and ioined in blood or affinitie with the more part of all the Nobles of the realme, ſo that his death was no ſmall loſſe to the commonwealth: for through him and the archbiſhop Hubert, the king was oftentimes reuoked from ſuch wilfull purpoſes, as now and then he was determined to haue put in practiſe, in ſo much that the king, as was reported (but how trulie I cannot tell) ſéemed to reioiſe for his death, bicauſe he might now worke his will without anie to controll him.

A cardinall ſent into England.

The ſame time, to wit, about the feaſt of ſaint Michaell, came Nicholas the cardinall of Tuſculane into England, ſent from the pope, to take awaie the interdiction, if the king would ſtand to that agreement which he had made and promiſed by his oth to performe. King Iohn receiued this cardinall in moſt honorable wiſe, and gladlie heard him in all things that he had to ſaie. This legat at his comming to Weſtminſter, depoſed the abbat of that place, named William from his roome, for that he was accuſed both of waſting the reuenues of the houſe, and alſo of notable incontinencie. Moreouer the burgeſſes of the towne of Oxford came vnto him to obteine abſolution of their offenſe, in that through their preſumption, the thrée ſchollers (of whom ye haue heard before) were hanged there, to the great terror of all the reſidue. To be ſhort, they were abſolued and penance inioined them, that they ſhould ſtrip them out of their apparell at euerie church in the towne, and going barefooted with ſcourges in their hands, they ſhould require the benefit of abſolution of euerie pariſh préeſt within their towne, ſaieng the pſalme of Miſerere.

The burgeſſes of Oxford require abſolution.

After this, the ſaid cardinall called a councell or conuocation of the cleargie, to reforme ſuch things touching the ſtate of the church as ſhould be thought requiſite. And though he handled not this matter with ſuch fauour and vprightneſſe as the biſhops wiſhed on their behalfes, yet he cauſed king Iohn to reſtore the moſt part of all thoſe goods that remained vnſpent, and alſo the value of halfe of thoſe that were conſumed and made awaie, vnto thoſe perſons as well ſpirituall as temporall, from whom they had béene taken in time of the diſcord betwixt him and the pope. But before all things could be thus quieted and ſet in order betwixt the king and the biſhops, manie méetings were had, as at London, Reading, Wallingford, and in other places.

A cõuocation called by the cardinall.

Now the archbiſhop and prelates for their parts thought this recompenſe to be but ſmall, in reſpect of the great loſſes and hinderances which they had ſuſteined: and to haue the whole reſtitution delaied, they tooke it not well. Howbeit the cardinall leaned ſo to the kings ſide (hauing receiued of him to the popes vſe the charter of ſubiection of the realmes of England and Ireland, now bulled with gold, where at the firſt it was deliuered to Pandulph ſealed onelie with wax. But their ſuit came to little effect, and in the end it fell out in ſuch wiſe, that their complaint was leſſe regarded. Moreouer, the rating of the value which the king ſhould reſtore vnto the archbiſhop, and the other biſhops, was by agréement of the king and them togither, appointed vnto foure barons indifferentlie choſen betwixt them.

At length notwithſtanding that deuiſe tooke no place: for it was otherwiſe decréed by the pope, that the king ſhould reſtore to them the ſumme of fortie thouſand marks, of the which he had paid alreadie twelue thouſand, before the returne of the ſaid archbiſhop and biſhops into the realme, and fiftéene thouſand more at the late méeting had betwixt them at Reading, ſo that there remained onelie 13000 behind: for not onelie the king, but alſo the cardinall had ſent to the pope, requiring him to take direction in the matter, and to aduertiſe him, that there was a great fault in the archbiſhop and his fellowes. In ſo much that Pandulph which was ſent to him from the legat, declared in fauour of the king, that there was not a more humble and modeſt prince to be found than king Iohn, and that the archbiſhop and his fellowes were too hard, and ſhewed themſelues too couetous in requiring the reſtitution that ſhould be made to them for loſſes ſuſteined in time of the interdiction.

Reſtitution to be made to the biſhops.

King Iohn commended to the pope for an humble prince.

Now the cauſe wherefore the legat and the king did ſend vnto the pope, was this. There was ſome grudge betwixt the legat and the archbiſhop, for that where the pope had written to the legat, how he ſhould (according to the order of the ancient canons of the church) place in euerie biſhops ſée and abbeie (that was void) méet and able perſons to rule and guide the ſame, the legat preſuming on that authoritie granted him by the pope, without the aduiſe of the archbiſhop or other biſhops, tooke onelie with him certeine of the kings chapleins, and comming with them to ſuch churches as were vacant, ordeined in them ſuch perſons as were nothing méet to take ſuch charge vpon them, and that according to the old abuſe of England, as Matthew Paris ſaith. Wherevpon the archbiſhop of Canturburie repining at ſuch doings, ſent to the legat as then being at Burton vpon Trent, two of his chapleins from Dunſtable (where he and his ſuffragans held as then a ſynod, after the feaſt of the Epiphanie) commanding him by waie of appeale, in no wiſe to meddle with inſtituting any gouernours to churches, within the precinct of his iuriſdiction, where ſuch inſtitutions belonged onelie to him.

Burton vpon Trent. Dunſtable. A ſynod. Diſcord betwixt the cardinall and the archbiſhop of Canturburie.

Herevpon therefore the legat diſpatched Pandulph to Rome vnto the pope as is aforeſaid, and the king likewiſe ſent ambaſſadors thither, as the biſhop of Norwich, and the archdeacon of Northumberland, with others, the which in the end ſo behaued themſelues in their ſuit, that notwithſtanding Simon Langton the archbiſhops brother earneſtlie withſtood them, as proctor for the biſhops, yet at length, the pope tooke order in the matter, writing vnto his legat, that he ſhould ſée the ſame fulfilled, and then abſolue the realme of the former interdiction. In this meane time, king Iohn made prouiſion to go ouer into France (as after yée ſhall heare) but at his going ouer he committed the whole ordering of this matter vnto the legat, and to William Marſhall the earle of Penbroke. The legat therefore vpon the receipt of the popes bulles, called a councell at London, and there declaring what was conteined in the ſame, he tooke bands for paiment of the reſidue of the fortie thouſand marks which was behind, being 13000 onelie, as before I haue ſaid.

About the ſame time alſo, Walter Gray biſhop of Worceſter was remoued to the gouernement of the ſée of Yorke, which had béen vacant euer ſince the death of the archbiſhop Geffrey. This Walter was the thrée & thirtith archbiſhop that gouerned that ſée. But now to returne and ſpeake of the kings affaires in the parts beyond the ſea. Ye ſhall vnderſtand, that hauing ſet his buſineſſe in ſome good ſtaie at home with the legat, he applied his ſtudie to the performance of his wars abroad, and therefore he firſt ſent monie into Flanders to paie the ſouldiers wages, which he had ſent thither to aid the erle there againſt king Philip. Which earle came ouer this yeare into England, and at Canturburie the king receiued him, where he did homage to the king for the whole earledome of Flanders: and on the other part, the king as well to the ſaid earle, as to ſuch lords and biſhops which came ouer with him, declared his roiall liberalitie by princelie gifts of gold, ſiluer, iewels, and pretious ſtones. After his returne, ſuch capteins as remained in his countrie with their bands at the king of Englands paie, made a iournie into France, and waſted the lands that belonged to the earle of Guiſnes, wanne the caſtell of Bruncham, and raced it, taking within it diuerſe men of armes and demilances. They alſo wanne by ſiege the towne of Aire, and burnt it. The caſtell of Liens they tooke by aſſault, and ſlue manie ſouldiers that defended it, beſide thoſe which they tooke priſoners.

Matth. Paris. The lands of yͤ erle of Guiſnes waſted.

Moreouer, they waſted and deſtroied the lands which Lewes the French kings ſonne was poſſeſſed of in thoſe parts. In the meane time, king Iohn hauing prepared a mightie nauie, and a ſtrong armie of valiant ſoldiers, tooke ſea at Portſmouth on Candlemas day, with his wife, his ſonne Richard, & Elianor the ſiſter of Arthur duke of Britaine. He had not many of his earles or barons with him, but a great number of knights and gentlemen, with whome he landed at Rochell in ſafetie, within a few daies after his ſetting forth. He tooke ouer with him ineſtimable treaſure, as it was reported, in gold, ſiluer, and iewels. Immediatlie vpon his arriuall at Rochell, the barons of Poictow reuolted from the French king, and comming in to king Iohn, did homage vnto him, as to their king and ſoueraigne lord.

But howſoeuer it was, after the truce began to expire which he had granted vnto the earls of Marſh and Augi, on the friday before Whitſunday he came with his armie before the caſtell of Meireuent, which belonged vnto Geffrey de Lucignam, and on the day next inſuing, being Whitſun éeue, he wanne the ſame. On Whitſunday he laid ſiege vnto Nouant, an other caſtell belonging to the ſame Geffrey, who as then was lodged in the ſame, and alſo two of his ſonnes: but within thrée daies after that the ſiege was laid, the earle of Marſh came to king Iohn, and did ſo much preuaile, that through his means, both Geffrey and his two ſonnes were receiued to mercie, and king Iohn put in poſſeſſion of the caſtell. After this, bicauſe king Iohn was aduertiſed, that Lewes the French kings ſonne had now beſieged Mountcounter, a caſtell that was apperteining to the ſaid Geffrey, he haſted thitherwards, and came to Parthenay, whither came to him as well the foreſaid earle of Marſh, as alſo the earle of Augi, and both they togither with the ſaid Geffrey de Lucignam, did homage to our king, and ſo became his liege men. The ſame time alſo, the ladie Iane the kings daughter was affianced to the ſaid earle of Marſh his ſonne, whereas the French king made means to haue hir married to his ſonne: but bicauſe king Iohn doubted leaſt that ſuit was attempted but vnder ſome cloked pretenſe, he would giue no eare thereto, but rather made this match with the earle of Marſh, in hope ſo to aſſure himſelfe of the ſaid earle, that he might ſtand him in no ſmall ſtéed to defend his cauſe againſt his aduerſaries of France. But now to the doings in England.

¶ Ye haue heard before how pope Innocent (or rather Nocent, who was the root of much miſchiefe and trouble, which qualities are nothing conſonant to his name) according to that king Iohn had required of him by ſolemne meſſengers, directed his bulles vnto his legat Nicholas, declaring vpon what conditions his pleaſure was to haue the ſentence of interdiction releaſed. Wherein firſt he commanded that the king ſhould ſatiſfie and pay ſo much monie vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and to the biſhop of London and Elie, as ſhould fullie amount to the ſumme of 40 thouſand markes (with that which alreadie he had paied, which was 27 thouſand markes, at two ſeuerall paiments, as vpon his accounts appeared.) For true contentation and paiment to be made of the reſidue, he ordeined that the king ſhould be ſworne, and alſo ſeale to an obligation, and certeine ſuerties with him (as the biſhops of Norwich and Wincheſter, with the earles of Cheſter, Wincheſter, and Marſhall) all which things were performed at this preſent, ſo that after the aſſurance ſo taken for paiment of the od 13 thouſand marks behind, reſidue of the 40 thouſand marks, the interdiction was taken vtterlie awaie, and the land ſolemnelie releaſed by the legat, ſitting within the cathedrall church of S. Paule at London, vpon the 29 of Iune, in the yeare 1214, after the terme of ſix yeares, thrée moneths, and 14 daies, that the realme had béene ſtriken with that dreadfull dart of correction, as it was then eſtéemed.

The interdiction releaſed.

The emperor Otho.

King Iohn in the meane time remaining ſtill in France, and finding at the beginning fortune fauorable inough vnto him, by reaſon his power was much increaſed by the aid of the Poictouins, determined to attempt the winning of Britaine, for this cauſe ſpeciallie, that he might by ſo dooing weaken the French kings power, and partlie alſo to withdraw him from the wars of Flanders, on which ſide he had procured likewiſe the French borders to be inuaded with great force, and that not onelie by the earle and ſuch capteins as he had ſent thither, and reteined in wages, but alſo by the emperour Otho, who in proper perſon came downe into that countrie himſelfe.

K. Iohn inuadeth Britaine.

The Britaines put to flight.

Peter the erle of Dreux his ſonne taken priſoner.

Herevpon king Iohn went forth with all his power of horſſemen, and entering into Britaine, made rodes through the countrie, waſting the ſame euen to the walles of Naunts: but ſhortlie after the Britaines aſſembled togither, vnder the leading of Peter, the ſon of Robert earle of Dreux (the French kings vncle, who had maried the ladie Adela, daughter to duke Guie of Britaine) and marching forth into the field to defend their countrie from the enimies, came to ioine with them in battell. At the firſt there was a verie ſharpe incounter, but at length the Britains being vanquiſhed and put to flight, a great number of them were taken priſoners, and amongſt other their capteins, the foreſaid Peter was one, whom king Iohn ſent awaie with all the reſt vnto Angiers, to be kept in ſafegard vntill he ſhould returne.

The French kings ſonne came to fight with king Iohn.

K. Iohn remoueth to Angiers.

The Poictouins ſubdued by the Frēch.

The battell at the bridge of Bouins.

After this, he beſieged a caſtell that ſtood vpon the banke of the riuer of Loier, called La Roch au moyne, inforcing his whole indeuour to haue woone it. But yer he could atteine his purpoſe, he was aduertiſed that Lewes the ſonne of king Philip was comming towards him with a great power to raiſe his ſiege. Wherefore hauing no great confidence in the Poictouins, and vnderſtanding that Lewes brought with him a verie ſtrong armie, he tooke aduiſe of his councell, who iudged that it ſhould be beſt for him to breake vp his ſiege and to depart, which he did, and went ſtreight waies to Angiers. Lewes (after king Iohn was thus retired) brought the Poictouins againe to ſubiection, and put the chiefe authours of the rebellion to death. In the meane time alſo his father king Philip with like ſucceſſe, but in a foughten field, vanquiſhed the emperour Otho at the bridge of Bouins on the 28 day of Iulie, as in the hiſtorie of France more at large appeare. There among other priſoners, the thrée earles of Flanders Saliſburie and Bullogne were taken.

The ſaieng of king Iohn.

Now king Iohn being aduertiſed of that ouerthrow, was maruellouſlie ſad and ſorrowfull for the chance, in ſomuch that he would not receiue any meat in a whole daie after the newes thereof was brought vnto him. At length turning his ſorrow into rage, he openlie ſaid, that ſince the time that he made himſelfe & his kingdom ſubiect to the church of Rome, nothing that he did had proſpered well with him. Indéed he condeſcended to an agréement with the pope (as may be thought) more by force than of deuotion, and therefore rather diſſembled with the pope (ſith he could not otherwiſe chooſe) than agréed to the couenants with any hartie affection.

A truce taken betwixt the two kings of England & France.

But to the purpoſe. Perceiuing himſelfe now deſtitute of his beſt fréends, of whom diuerſe remained priſoners with the French king (being taken at the battell of Bouins) he thought good to agrée with king Philip for this preſent, by way of taking ſome truce, which by mediation of ambaſſadours riding to and fro betwixt them, was at length accorded to endure for fiue yeares, and to begin at Eaſter, in the yeare of our Lord, 1215. After this, about the 19 daie of October he returned into England, to appeaſe certeine tumults which began alreadie to ſhoot out buds of ſome new ciuill diſſention. And ſuerlie the ſame ſpred abroad their bloſſoms ſo freſhlie, that the fruit was knit before the growth by ante timelie prouiſion could be hindered. For the people being ſet on by diuerſe of the ſuperiours of both ſorts, finding themſelues gréeued that the king kept not promiſe in reſtoring the ancient lawes of S. Edward, determined from thenceforth to vſe force, ſince by requeſt he might not preuaile. To appeaſe this furie of the people, not onlie policie but power alſo was required, for the people vndertaking an euill enterpriſe, ſpeciallie raiſing a tumult or ioining in a conſpiracie are as hardlie ſuppreſſed and vanquiſhed as Hydra the monſter hauing manie heads: and therefore it is well ſaid, that ———comes eſt diſcordia vulgi,

A cloked pilgrimage.

The Nobles ſuppoſing that longer delaie therein was not to be ſuffered, aſſembled themſelues togither at the abbeie of Burie (vnder colour of going thither to doo their deuotions to the bodie of S. Edmund which laie there inſhrined) where they vttered their complaint of the kings tyrannicall maners, alledging how they were oftentimes called forth to ſerue in the wars & to fight in defenſe of the realme, and yet notwithſtanding were ſtill oppreſſed at home by the kings officers, who (vpon confidence of the lawes) attempted all things whatſoeuer they conceiued. And if anie man complained, or alledged that he receiued wrong at their hands, they would anſwer by and by, that they had law on their ſide to doo as they had doone, ſo that it was no wrong but right which they did, and therfore if they that were the lords and péeres of the realme were men, it ſtood them vpon to prouide that ſuch inconueniences might be auoided, and better lawes brought in vſe, by the which their anceſtours liued in a more quiet and happie ſtate.

The charter of K. Henrie the firſt.

A firebrand of diſſention.

There was brought forth and alſo read an ancient charter made ſometime by Henrie the firſt (which charter Stephan the archbiſhop of Canturburie had deliuered vnto them before in the citie of London) conteining the grant of certeine liberties according to the lawes of king Edward the confeſſor, profitable to the church and barons of the realme, which they purpoſed to haue vniuerſallie executed ouer all the land. And therfore being thus aſſembled in the quéere of the church of S. Edmund, they receiued a ſolemne oth vpon the altar there, that if the king would not grant to the ſame liberties, with others which he of his owne accord had promiſed to confirme to them, they would from thenceforth make warre vpon him, till they had obteined their purpoſe, and inforced him to grant, not onelie to all theſe their petitions, but alſo yéeld to the confirmation of them vnder his ſeale, for euer to remaine moſt ſtedfaſt and inuiolable.

Bernewell.

The cheefe cauſe that mooued the lords to this conſpiracie, roſe by reaſon the king demanded eſcuage of them that refuſed to go with him into Poictow: and they on the other part mainteined, that they were not bound to paie it, for any warres which the king made in the parts beyond the ſeas. But he to prooue that he ought to haue it, declared how in his fathers and brothers time it was paied, and therefore he ought to haue it. Much adoo there was about this matter at the firſt broching thereof, and more adoo there had béene, if the legats preſence had not ſomewhat ſtaied the parties. But after they had gotten the charter of king Henrie the firſt at the hands of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, they made ſuch a ſiniſter interpretation thereof, that ſuppoſing it to ſerue their turnes, they procéeded in their wilfull opinions (as aboue is mentioned.)

Finallie it was determined amongſt them, that ſhortlie after Chriſtmaſſe, they ſhould go to the king, and require of him that they might haue thoſe laws reſtored, which he had promiſed to them (as is aforeſaid.) But foraſmuch as they knew well that their ſute would not be thankfullie accepted, in the meane time they prouided themſelues of horſſe, armour, and other furniture for the warre, thereby to be in the better readineſſe and ſafegard, if in exhibiting their requeſt, the matter did grow to any ſuch inforcement. They appointed alſo diuerſe of the moſt ancient lords to mooue the ſaid matter to the king, in all their names, who was as then at Worceſter, and being aduertiſed of this conſpiracie, as ſoone as the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe was paſt, he went ſtreight to London: thither came the lords alſo with like ſpéed, leauing their men in the townes and villages abroad, to be readie vpon any ſudden warning to come vnto them, if néed ſhould ſo require.

The lords preſent their requeſt to the king.

Being come into his preſence, they required of him that it might pleaſe him, firſt, to appoint the exerciſe and vſe of thoſe ancient lawes vnto them, by the which the kings of England in times paſt ruled their ſubiects: ſecondlie, that according to his promiſe, he would abrogate thoſe newer lawes, which euerie man might with good cauſe name méere wrongs, rather than lawes: and thirdlie they required of him the performance of all other things, which he had moſt faithfullie of late vndertaken to obſerue. The king (though ſomewhat contrarie to his nature) hauing heard their requeſt, gaue them a verie gentle anſwer. For perceiuing them readie with force to conſtreine him, if by gentleneſſe they might not preuaile, he thought it ſhould be more ſafe and eaſie for him to turne their vnquiet minds with ſoft remedies than to go about to breake them of their willes by ſtrong hand, which is a thing verie dangerous, eſpeciallie where both parts are of like force. Therefore he promiſed them within a few daies, to haue conſideration of their requeſt.

The K. promiſeth to conſider of their requeſts.

And to the intent they might giue the more credit to his words, he cauſed the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the biſhop of Elie, with William Marſhall earle of Penbroke (vnto whome he had giuen his daughter Elianor in marriage) to vndertake for him, and as it were to become his ſuerties: which willinglie they did. Herewith the minds of the Nobilitie being ſomewhat pacified, returned home to their houſes. The king ſoone after alſo, to aſſure himſelfe the more effectuallie of the allegiance of his people in time to come, cauſed euerie man to renew his homage, and to take a new oth to be faithfull to him againſt all other perſons. And to prouide the more ſuerlie for himſelfe, on Candlemaſſe day next inſuing, he tooke vpon him the croſſe to go into the holie land, which I thinke he did rather for feare than any deuotion, as was alſo thought by other, to the end that he might (vnder the protection thereof) remaine the more out of danger of ſuch as were his foes. In which point of diſſimulation he ſhewed himſelfe prudent, obſeruing the counſell of the wiſeman,

¶ Some ſay that a great part of this variance that chanced betwéene king Iohn and his barons, was bicauſe the king would without ſkilfull aduiſe haue exiled the earle of Cheſter, and for none other occaſion than for that he had oftentimes aduiſed him to leaue his cruell dealing, and alſo his accuſtomed adulterie with his brothers wife and others. Other write, that the ſame diſſention roſe by reaſon of the great crueltie, and vnreaſonable auarice, which the king vſed towards all the ſtates and degrées of his ſubiects, as well towards them of the ſpiritualtie, as of the temporaltie. The prelats therefore of the realme ſore repining at his doings, for that they could not patientlie ſuffer ſuch exaction to be leuied of their liuings (contrarie as they toke it to the libertie of the church) found meanes through practiſe, to perſuade both the kings of Scotland and France to aid and ſupport them againſt him, by linking themſelues togither with ſundrie noblemen of England. But theſe ſéeme to be coniectures of ſuch writers as were euill affected towards the kings cauſe.

Now therefore to the ſequele of the matter. The king hauing ſent awaie the barons with a gentle anſwer, though he minded nothing leſſe than to ſatiſfie them in that they did demand, bicauſe it made much againſt his roiall prerogatiue: and therewith foreſéeing that the matter would be like to grow at length to be tried by force, he began to dout his owne eſtate, and therefore prepared an armie, and fortified diuerſe caſtels and places with men, munition, and vittels, into the which he might retire for his ſafetie in any time of néed. The barons which vnderſtood the kings diligence herein, and coniecturing thereof his whole intent, made readie alſo their power, appointing for their generall one Robert Fitz Walter, a man both excellent in counſell, and valiant in warre. Herewith they came vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie, preſenting vnto him a booke, wherein was conteined a note of all the articles of their petitions, & required him to vnderſtand the kings mind touching the ſame. The archbiſhop coueting to extinguiſh the ſedition (whereof he himſelfe had béene no ſmall kindler) which was like to grow, if the Nobilitie were not pacified the ſooner, talked with the king, and exhorted his grace verie inſtantlie to ſatiſfie the requeſts of his barons, and herewith did ſhew the booke of the articles which they had deliuered vnto him.

The king, when he ſaw what they demanded (which in effect was a new order in things touching the whole ſtate of the common wealth) ſware in a great furie, that he would neuer condeſcend vnto thoſe petitions. Whereof when the barons had knowledge, they gat them ſtrait vnto armour, making their aſſemblie at Stamford in the Eaſter wéeke, whither they had drawne vnto them almoſt the whole Nobilitie, and gathered an excéeding great armie. It was coniectured that there were in that armie the number of two thouſand knights, beſide yeomen on horſſebacke or demilances (as I may call them) and footmen apparelled in diuerſe ſorts of armour. Matth.Paris.

The king as then was at Oxford, who hearing of the aſſemblie which the barons made, and that they were come to Brakeſley, on the mondaie next after the octaues of Eaſter, he ſent vnto them the archbiſhop of Canturburie, in whom he repoſed great confidence, and William Marſhall earle of Penbroke, to vnderſtand what they meant by that their aſſembling thus togither. Wherevpon they deliuered to the ſame meſſengers a roll conteining the ancient liberties, priuiledges and cuſtoms of the realme, ſignifieng that if the king would not confirme the ſame, they would not ceaſe to make him warre, till he ſhould ſatiſfie their requeſts in that behalfe.

The king ſendeth to the lords.

The archbiſhop and the earle returning to the king, ſhewed him the whole circumſtance of that which the barons demanded, who tooke great indignation thereat, and ſcornefullie ſaid; Why doo they not aſke to haue the kingdome alſo? Finallie, he affirmed with an oth, that he would neuer grant any ſuch liberties, whereby he ſhould become a ſlaue. Herevpon the archbiſhop and the earle of Penbroke returned to the barons, and declared the kings deniall to confirme their articles. Then the barons naming their hoaſt The armie of God and the holie church, ſet forward, and firſt came vnto Northampton, and beſieging the towne, when they could not preuaile, bicauſe the ſame was well prouided for defenſe aforehand, they departed from thence, and came towards Bedford to beſiege the caſtell there, in which ſir William Beauchampe was capteine, who being ſecretlie confederate with them, deliuered the place incontinentlie into their hands.

They wan the towne but not the caſtell. Matth.Weſt.

Bedford caſtell deliuered to the barons.

Whileſt they remained here a certeine time to fortifie and furniſh the caſtell with neceſſarie prouiſion, there came letters to them from London, giuing them to vnderſtand, that if they would ſend a conuenient power of ſouldiers to defend the citie, the ſame ſhould be receiued thereinto at ſome meet and reaſonable time in the night ſeaſon by the citizens, who would ioine with them in that quarell againſt the king to the vttermoſt of their powers. The lords were glad of theſe newes, to haue the chiefe citie of the realme to take part with them, and therfore they ſent foure bands of ſouldiers ſtreightwaies thither, which were brought into the citie in the night ſeaſon (according to order aforehand taken.) But as Matt. Paris ſaith, they were receiued into the citie by Algate, the 24 of Maie being ſundaie, whileſt the citizens were at maſſe. The next day they made open rebellion, tooke ſuch as they knew fauoured the king, brake into the houſes of the Iewes, & ſpoiled them.

The barons hauing thus gotten poſſeſſion of the citie of London, wrote letters vnto all thoſe lords which as yet had not ioined with them in this confederacie, threatening that if they refuſed to aid them now in this neceſſitie, they would deſtroie their caſtels, manours, parkes, and other poſſeſſions, making open warre vpon them as the enimies of God, and rebels to the church. Theſe were the names of thoſe lords which yet had not ſworne to mainteine the foreſaid liberties, William Marſhall earle of Penbroke, Rainulfe earle of Cheſter, Nicholas earle of Saliſburie, William earle Warren, William erle of Albemarle, H. earle of Cornewall, W. de Albenie, Robert de Veipount, Peter Fitz Herbert, Brian de Liſley, G. de Lucie, G. de Furniuall, Thomas Baſſet, H. de Braibrooke, I. de Baſſingborne, W. de Cantlow, H. de Cornwall, Iohn Fitz Hugh, Hugh de Neuill, Philip de Albenie, Iohn Marſhall, and William Brewer. All theſe vpon receipt of the barons letters, or the more part of them came to London, and ioined themſelues with the barons, vtterlie renouncing to aid king Iohn.

Matth.Paris.

The barons write to other of the nobilitie to ioine with them againſt the king,

Alſo the plees in the eſchequer ceaſed, and the ſhiriffes ſtaied from executing their office. For there was none that would paie anie monie to the kings vſe, nor anie that did obeie him, in ſomuch that there remained with him but onelie ſeuen horſſemen of all his traine at one time (as ſome write) though ſoone after he had a great power, which came to him to the caſtell of Windſore, where he then laie, and meant to haue led the ſame againſt the lords with all ſpeed. But hearing now of this new rebellion of the Londoners, he changed his purpoſe and durſt not depart from Windſore, being brought in great doubt leaſt all the other cities of the realme would follow their example. Herevpon he thought good to aſſaie if he might come to ſome agreement by waie of communication, and incontinentlie ſent his ambaſſadours to the barons, promiſing them that he would ſatiſfie their requeſts, if they would come to Windſore to talke with him.

Polydor.

Howbeit, the lords hauing no confidence in his promiſe came with their armie within three miles of Windſore, and their pitcht downe their tents in a medow betwixt Stanes and Windſore, whither king Iohn alſo came the 15 daie of Iune, and ſhewed ſuch friendlie countenance towards euerie one of them, that they were put in good hope he meant no deceipt. Being thus met, they fell in conſultation about an agreement to be had. On the kings part (as it were) ſate the archbiſhops of Canturburie and Dublin, the biſhops of London, Wincheſter, Lincolne, Bath, Worceſter, Couentrie, Rocheſter, and Pandulph the popes Nuncio, with Almerike maſter of the knights templers: the earles of Penbroke, Saliſburie, Warren, Arundell, Alane de Galoway, William Fitz Gerald, Peter Fitz Herbert, Alane Baſſet, Hugh de Neuill, Hubert de Burgh seneſchall of Poictou, Robert de Ropley, Iohn Marſhall, and Philip de Albenie. On the barons part, there were innumerable, for all the nobilitie of England was in a maner aſſembled there togither.

The lords incamped betwixt Stanes and windſore.

Matth.Paris.

Finallie, when the king meaſuring his owne ſtrength with the barons, perceiued that he was not able to reſiſt them, he conſented to ſubſcribe and ſeale to ſuch articles concerning the liberties demanded, in forme for the moſt part as is conteined in the two charters Magna Charta, and Charta de Foreſta, beginning Iohannes Dei gratia, &c. And he did not onlie grant vnto them their petitions touching the forſaid liberties, but alſo to win him further credit, was contented that they ſhould chooſe out certeine graue and honourable perſonages, which ſhould haue authoritie and power to ſee thoſe things performed which he then granted vnto them.

There were twentie fiue of thoſe that were ſo elected, namelie theſe. The earles of Clare, Albemarle, Glocceſter, Wincheſter, and Hereford: alſo earle Roger, earle Robert, earle Marſhall the yoonger, Robert Fitz Walter the yoonger, Gilbert de Clare, Euſtace de Veſcie, Hugh Bigot, William de Mowbray, the maior of London, Gilbert de la Vale, Robert de Roos, John conſtable of Cheſter, Richard de Percie, John Fitz Robert, William Mallet, Geffrey de Saie, Roger de Mowbray, William de Huntingfield, Richard de Mountfichet, and William de Albenie. Theſe fiue and twentie were ſworne to ſee the liberties granted and confirmed by the king to be in euerie point obſerued, but if he went againſt the ſame, then they ſhould haue authoritie to compell him to the obſeruing of euerie of them.

Moreouer, there were other that were ſworne to be obedient, and as it were aſſiſtant vnto theſe fiue and twentie peeres in ſuch things as they ſhould appoint, which were theſe. The earle of Arundell, the earle Warren by his attornie, Henrie Doilie, Hubert de Burgh, Matthew Fitz Herbert, Robert de Pinknie, Roger Huſcarle, Robert de Newburgh, Henrie de Pont Audoin, Rafe de la Hay, Henrie de Brentfield, Warren Fitz Gerald, Thomas Baſſet, William de Buckland, William de ſaint John, Alane Baſſet, Richard de Riuers, Hugh de Boneuale, Jordain de Sackuille, Ralfe Muſgraue, Richard Siſlewaſt, Robert de Ropeley, Andrew de Beauchampe, Walter de Dunſtable, Walter Folloth, Foukes de Brent, John Marſhall, Philip Daubnie, William de Perca, Ralfe de Normandie, William de Percie, William Agoilum, Engerand de Pratellis, William de Cirenton, Roger de Zuche, Roger Fitz Barnard, and Godfrie de Grancombe. It was further ordered, that the chatelains or conſtables (as I may call them) of the foure caſtels of Northampton, Billingworth, Notingham, and Scarborow, ſhould be ſworne to the fiue and twentie peeres, to gouerne thoſe caſtels in ſuch wiſe as they ſhould haue in commandement from the ſaid fiue and twentie peeres, or from the greater part of them: and that ſuch ſhould be placed as chatelains in the ſame, as were thought to be moſt true and faithfull vnto the barons and the realme. ¶ It was alſo decreed, that certeine ſtrangers, as Flemings and other, ſhould be baniſhed out of England.

The chatelains of foure caſtels.

The king herevpon ſent his letters patents vnto the ſhiriffes of all the counties of this realme, commanding them to ſee the ordinances and liberties which he granted and confirmed, to be diligentlie obſerued. And for the more ſtrengthening of this his grant, he had gotten the pope to confirme a like charter granted the yeare before. For the pope (ſith king John was become his obedient vaſſall, and the apoſtolike king) eaſilie granted to gratifie both him and his lords herein, and ſo was the grant of the liberties corroborated & made good with a double confirmation, and ſo ſealed, that it was impoſſible for them to be ſeparated in ſunder, the kings grant being annexed to the popes bull.

Immediatlie alſo vpon the confirmation now made by the king, diuerſe lords came to him, and required reſtitution of ſuch poſſeſſions, lands, and houſes, as he had in his hands, the right whereof (as they alledged) apperteined to them: but he excuſed the matter, and ſhifted them off, till by inqueſt taken, it might appeare what right euerie man had to thoſe things which they then claimed: and furthermore aſſigned them a daie to be holden at Weſtminſter, which was the ſixteenth day of Julie. But yer he reſtored at that time the caſtell of Rocheſter vnto the archbiſhop of Canturburie, the barons hauing obteined a great peece of their purpoſe (as they thought) returned to London with their charter ſealed, the date whereof was this: Giuen by our owne hand, in the medow called Kuningſmede or Rimemede, betwixt Stanes and Windſore, the fifteenth of Iune, in the eighteenth yeare of our reigne.

Rocheſter caſtell reſtored to the archb. of Canturburie.

Great reioiſing was made for this concluſion of peace betwixt the king and his barons, the people iudging that God had touched the kings heart, and mollified it, whereby happie daies were come for the realme of England, as though it had beene deliuered out of the bondage of Aegypt: but they were much deceiued, for the king hauing condeſcended to make ſuch grant of liberties, farre contrarie to his mind, was right ſorowfull in his heart, curſſed his mother that bare him, the houre that he was borne, and the paps that gaue him ſucke, wiſhing that he had receiued death by violence of ſword or knife, in ſteed of naturall noriſhment: he whetted his teeth, he did bite now on one ſtaffe, and now on an other as he walked, and oft brake the ſame in peeces when he had doone, and with ſuch diſordered behauiour and furious geſtures he vttered his greefe, in ſuch ſort that the Noble men verie well perceiued the inclination of his inward affection concerning theſe things, before the breaking vp of the councell, and therefore ſore lamented the ſtate of the realme, geſſing what would follow of his impatiencie and diſpleſant taking of the matter.

Matt.Paris.

The kings impatiencie to ſee himſelfe bridled by his ſubiects.

Herevpon they ſaid among themſelues, Wo be to vs, yea rather to the whole realme that wanteth a ſufficient king, and is gouerned by a tyrant that ſeeketh the ſubuerſion therof. Now hath our ſouereigne lord made vs ſubiect to Rome, and to the Romiſh court, ſo that we muſt henceforth obteine our protection from thence. It is verie much to be feared, leaſt we doo feele hereafter ſome further peece of miſcheefe to light vpon vs ſuddenlie. We neuer heard of any king that would not gladlie indeuor to withdraw his necke from bondage & captiuitie, but ours of his owne accord voluntarilie ſubmitteth himſelfe to become vaſſall to euerie ſtranger. And thus the lords lamenting the caſe, left the king, and returned to London (as before yee haue heard.)

But the king diſquieted not a little, for that he was thus driuen to yeeld ſo farre vnto the barons, notwithſtanding as much as was poſſible he kept his purpoſe ſecret, deuiſed by what means he might diſappoint all that had beene doone, and promiſed on his part, at this aſſemblie betwixt him and the lords a pacification (as yee haue heard.) Wherefore the next day verie late in the euening, he ſecretlie departed to Southampton, and ſo ouer into the Ile of Wight, where he tooke aduice with his councell what remedie he might find to quiet the minds of his lords and barons, and to bring them vnto his purpoſe. At length after much debating of the matter, it was concluded by the aduiſe of the greater part, that the king ſhould require the popes aid therein. And ſo Walter the biſhop of Worceſter, & John the biſhop of Norwich, with one Richard Mariſh his chancellor, with all ſpeed were ſent as ambaſſadors from the king vnto pope Innocent, to inſtruct him of the rebellion of the Engliſh Nobilitie, and that he conſtreined by force had granted them certeine lawes and priuileges, hurtfull to his realme, and preiudiciall to his crowne.

thoritie of the pope, the king beſought him to make the ſame void, and to command the barons to obeie him being their king, as reaſon required they ſhould. There were alſo ſent by him other meſſengers, as Hugh de Boues and others, into diuerſe parts beyond the ſea, to bring from thence great numbers of men of war and ſouldiers, appointing them to meet him at Douer, at the feaſt of ſaint Michaell next inſuing. He ſent likewiſe vnto all his chateleins and conſtables of caſtels within the realme, requiring them to prouide themſelues of all things neceſſarie for defenſe of the holds committed to their charge, if they ſhould chance to be beſieged, though it were on the next morrow.

His ambaſſadours and other meſſengers being thus diſpatched, and hauing but few perſons left about him, or in maner none, except ſuch of the biſhop of Norwich his ſeruants as he had borowed of him, he fell to take priſes as anie ſhips came by ſuſpected not to be his friends, ſo ſeeking to win the fauour of the mariners that belonged to the cinke ports, and ſo lay cloſe in the Ile of Wight and there about the ſea-coaſts for the ſpace of three moneths togither. In which meane time, manie things were reported of him, ſome calling him a fiſher, ſome a merchant, and ſome a pirat and rouer. And manie (for that no certeine newes could be heard of him) iudged that he was either drowned, or dead by ſome other means. But he ſtill looking for ſome power to come ouer to his aid, kept himſelfe out of the way, till the ſame ſhould be arriued, and diſſembled the conceit of his reuenge and hart-grudge, till opportunitie ſerued him with conuenient ſecuritie to put the ſame in execution. Wherein he ſhewed himſelfe diſcreet and prouident, and did as in ſuch a caſe one wiſeman doth counſell another, ſaieng,

Polydor.

The lords all this while lay at London, and began to doubt the matter, bicauſe they could heare no certeine newes where the king was become: for doubting (as I ſaid) the ſuertie of his perſon, he conueied himſelfe ſecretlie from one place to another, lodging and taking his diet oftentimes more meanlie than was decent for his eſtate: and ſtill he longed to heare how his ambaſſadours ſped with the pope, who in the meane time comming vnto Rome, and declaring their meſſage at full, toke it vpon their ſolemne oth, that the right was on the kings ſide, and that the fault reſted onelie on the lords, touching the whole controuerſie betweene them and him, who ſought with great rigour and againſt reaſon to bridle him at their pleaſures.

The ambaſſadours cōming to the popes preſence declare their meſſage.

Math.Paris.

They ſhewed alſo a note of certeine articles conteined in the charter, which ſeemed to make moſt for the kings purpoſe, and withall declared that the king in open aſſemblie, where he and the barons met to talke of ſuch matters, had proteſted that the kingdome of England ſpeciallie aperteined (as touching the ſoueraingtie) vnto the church of Rome, wher vpon he neither could nor ought without knowledge of the pope to ordeine anie thing anew, or change ought within that kingdome in preiudice thereof. Wherefore whereas he put himſelfe and all the rights of his kingdome by way of appealing vnder the protection of the apoſtolike ſee: the barons yet without regard had to the ſame appeale, did ſeize into their poſſeſſion the citie of London, and getting them to armour, inforced the king to confirme ſuch vnreaſonable articles, as there appeared for him to conſider.

The popes anſwer vnto the kings ambaſſadours.

The pope hauing heard their tale, and conſidered of the articles, with bending browes (in witneſſe of his indignation) made forthwith this ſhort anſwer: And is it ſo, that the barons of England do go about to expell their king, which hath taken vpon him the croſſe, and is remaining vnder the protection of the apoſtolike ſee? And do they meane indeed to tranſlate the dominion that belongeth to the church of Rome vnto another? By S. Peter we cannot ſuffer this iniurie to paſſe vnpuniſhed. Herevpon (crediting the ambaſſadours words) by the aduice of his cardinals, he decreed that all thoſe priuiledges, which the king had granted vnto the lords and barons of this realme, as inforced thereto by their rebellious attempt, ſhould be accounted void and of none effect. Alſo he wrote vnto the lords, admoniſhing them by his letters that they ſhould obeie their king, vpon paine of his curſſe if they ſhould attempt anie thing that ſounded to the contrarie.

Hect. Boetius. Cardinall Gualo.

¶ At the ſame time there was in the court of Rome (as Hector Boetius ſaith) a cardinall named Gualo or Wallo, a verie couetous perſon, and ſuch a one (as in that place ſome are neuer wanting) which for monie paſſed not what he did to further anie mans ſuit, without regard either to right or wrong, by whoſe chiefe trauell and means the pope was greatlie induced to fauour king Iohns cauſe, and to iudge with him in preiudice of the lords purpoſes, as before is expreſſed.

But to proceed. The ambaſſadours being diſpatched, and hauing the popes preſcript, and ſuch other his letters with them as they had obteined of him, returned with all ſpeed into England vnto the king (who was come a litle before vnto Windſore caſtell) and there declared vnto him how they ſped. K. Iohn being ioifull in that they had brought the matter ſo well about for his purpoſe, cauſed the popes decree to be declared vnto the barons, commanding them ſtreitlie to obeie the ſame. The barons taking the matter grieuouſlie to be thus mocked, with great indignation both blamed king Iohns vniuſt dealing, and the popes wrongfull iudgement, in that he had pronounced againſt them, without hearing what they had of right to alledge for themſelues. Wherevpon out of hand (notwithſtanding the popes prohibition and preſcript to the contrarie) they determined to trie their cauſe by dint of ſword, and with all ſpeed aſſembled their powers, which for the greater part they had latelie diſmiſſed and ſent home. They furniſhed the caſtell of Rocheſter with a ſtrong garriſon of men, and placed therein as capteine one William Albeney, a verie ſkilfull warriour.

King Iohn, after he vnderſtood that the barons (contemning the popes decree and inhibition) were more offended and bent againſt him than before, ſent once againe to the pope, to aduertiſe him of their diſobedience and great contumacie ſhewed in refuſing to ſtand to his preſcript. This doone, he returned to the Ile of Wight, and ſailed from thence to Douer, where diuerſe of thoſe his commiſſaries which he had ſent to hire ſoldiers in forren parts returned to him, bringing with them out of diuerſe countries ſuch a multitude of ſouldiers and armed men, that the onelie ſight of them ſtroke the harts of all the beholders with great feare and terror. For out of the parties of Poictou and Gaſcoine, there came men of great nobilitie, and right worthie warriours, as Sauerie de Mauleon, Geffrey and Oliuer de Buteuile two brethren, hauing vnder them great numbers of good ſouldiers and tall men of warre. Alſo out of Brabant there came Walter Buc, Gerard de Sotignie, and one Godeſtall, with three legions of armed men and croſſebowes. Likewiſe there came out of Flanders other capteins, with diuerſe bands of ſouldiers, which Ferdinando earle of Flanders (latelie returned out of the French captiuitie) for old friendſhips ſake furniſhed and ſent ouer to aid him againſt his ſubiects, according as he had requeſted.

King Iohn beſiegeth the caſtell of Rocheſter.

King Iohn then hauing recouered ſtrength about him, and being aduertiſed that William de Albenie was entred into the caſtell of Rocheſter with a great number of knights, men of armes and other ſouldiers, haſted thither with his whole armie, and beſieged them within, inforcing himſelfe by all waies poſſible to win the caſtell as well by battering the walles with engines, as by giuing thereto manie aſſaults: but the gariſon within (conſiſting of nintie and foure knights beſide demilances, and other ſouldiers) defended the place verie manfullie, in hope of reſcue from the barons, which laie as then at London: but they comming forward one daies iournie vnto Dartford, when they heard that the king was comming forward in good araie of battell to meet them, vpon conſideration had of their owne forces, for that they were not able to match him with footmen, they returned backe againe to the citie, breaking that aſſured promiſe which they had made and alſo confirmed by their ſolemne oths, which was that if the caſtell ſhould chance to be beſieged, they would not faile but raiſe the ſiege.

Bernewell.

Rocheſter caſtell is yéelded to the king.

At length they within for want of vittels were conſtreined to yéeld it vp vnto the king, after it had béene beſieged the ſpace of thrée ſcore daies: during which time they had beaten backe their enimies at ſundrie aſſaults, with great ſlaughter and loſſe. But the king hauing now got the poſſeſſion of that hold, vpon gréefe conceiued for the loſſe of ſo manie men, and alſo bicauſe he had line ſo long about it yer he could winne it, to his ineſtimable coſts and charges, was determined to haue put them all to death that had kept it. But Sauerie de Mauleon aduiſed him otherwiſe, leſt by ſuch crueltie, the barons in anie like caſe ſhould be occaſioned to vſe the ſame extremitie towards ſuch of his people, as by chance might fall into their hands. Thus the king ſpared the Nobles and gentlemen, ſending William de Albenie, William de Lancaſter, William de Emcford, Thomas de Muleton, Oſbert Gifford, Oſbert de Bobie, Odinell de Albenie, and diuerſe other to the caſtell of Corfe, there to be kept as priſoners. But Robert Charnie, Richard Gifford, and Thomas de Lincolne were ſent to Notingham, and ſo other were ſent to other places. As for all the demilances or yeomen (if I ſhall ſo call them) and the arcubaliſters which had ſlaine manie of his men during the ſiege (as Matthew Paris ſaith) the king cauſed them to be hanged, to put other in feare that ſhould ſo obſtinatlie reſiſt him.

The counſell of Sauerie de Mauleon.

Arcubaliſters thoſe yͤ beare croſſebowes.

Bernewell.

Neuertheleſſe (as the booke that belonged to Bernewell abbie ſaith) there was not any of them hanged, ſauing one arcubaliſter onelie, whome the king had brought vp of a child. But howſoeuer the king dealt with them after they were yéelded, true it is (as by the ſame booke it appeareth) there had béene no ſiege in thoſe daies more earneſtlie inforced, nor more obſtinatlie defended: for after that all the limmes of the caſtell had béene reuerſed and throwne downe, they kept the maiſter tower, till halfe thereof was alſo ouerthrowne, and after kept the other halfe, till through famine they were conſtreined to yéeld, hauing nothing but horſfleſh and water to ſuſteine their liues withall.

Here is to be remembred, that whileſt the ſiege laie thus at Rocheſter, Hugh de Boues a valiant knight, but full of pride and arrogancie, a Frenchman borne, but baniſhed out of his countrie, came downe to Calice with an huge number of men of warre and ſouldiers to come to the aid of king Iohn. But as he was vpon the ſea with all his people, meaning to land at Douer, by a ſudden tempeſt which roſe at that inſtant, the ſaid Hugh with all his companie was drowned by ſhipwracke. Soone after the bodie of the ſame Hugh with the carcaſes of other innumerable, both of men, women, and children, were found not farre from Yermouth, and all along that coaſt. There were of them in all fortie thouſand, as ſaith Matthew Paris; for of all thoſe which he brought with him, there was (as it is ſaid) not one man left aliue.

Hugh de Bo ues drowned

The king (as the fame went, but how true I know not) had giuen by charter vnto the ſaid Hugh de Boues, the whole countrie of Northfolke, ſo that he ment to haue expelled the old inhabitants, and to haue peopled it with ſtrangers. But whether this was ſo or not, ſure it is that he was verie ſorowfull for the loſſe of this ſuccor and aid which thus periſhed in the ſeas, though it happened verie well for his ſubiects of England, that ſhould haue béene ſore oppreſſed by ſuch multitude of ſtrangers, which for the moſt part muſt néeds haue liued vpon the countrie, to the vtter vndoing of the inhabitants wheresoeuer they ſhould haue come.

Raſe Cog.

Héere is to be noted, that during the ſiege of Rocheſter (as ſome write) there came out of France to the number néere hand of ſeauen thouſand men ſent from the French king vnto the aid of the barons, at the ſuit of Saer de Quincie earle of Wincheſter and other ambaſſadours that were ſent from the barons, during the time of this ſiege, although it ſhould ſéeme by Matthew Paris, that the ſaid earle was not ſent till after the pope had excommunicated the barons (as after yée ſhall heare.) The Frenchmen that came ouer at this firſt time landed at Orwell, and at other hauens there néere adioining.

About this ſeaſon, the canons of Yorke (bicauſe the archbiſhops ſée there had remained void a long time) obteining licence of the king, aſſembled togither about the election of an archbiſhop. And though the king had once againe earneſtlie moued them to preferre Walter Graie biſhop of Worceſter, yet they refuſed ſo to doo, and therefore choſe Simon de Langton, brother to the archbiſhop of Canturburie, which election was afterward made void by the earneſt trauell of the king to the pope, bicauſe his brother the ſaid archbiſhop of Canturburie was knowne to fauour the part of the barons againſt him, ſo that the ſaid Walter Graie was then elected and promoted to the guiding of the ſée of Yorke, according to the kings ſpeciall deſire in that behalfe.

Walter Grai elected archb. of Yorke.

About the ſame time alſo, pope Innocent being certified, how the barons of England would not obeie his preſcript, iudged them enimies to the church and gaue commandement to Peter the biſhop of Wincheſter, to the abbat of Reading, and to the ſubdeacon Pandulph, to pronounce the ſentence of excommunication againſt them. But they could not at the firſt execute the popes commandement herein, by reaſon that the archbiſhop of Canturburie, who fauoured the barons cauſe, would not permit them. Wherefore the ſame archbiſhop was interdicted out of the church, and from ſaieng diuine ſeruice, and alſo being cited to appeare at Rome, was in danger to be depriued of his miter; had not certeine cardinals intreated for him, and obteined his pardon. The archbiſhop being gone to Rome, as well to excuſe himſelfe in this matter, as to be preſent at the generall councell there holden at that time (for he was readie to go take the ſea thitherwards when the biſhop of Wincheſter and Pandulph came to him with the popes letters) the ſaid biſhop of Wincheſter & Pandulph proceeded to the pronouncing of the excommunication againſt the barons, renewing the ſame euerie ſundaie and holiedaie: albeit the barons (bicauſe none of them were expreſſelie named in the popes letters)

Polydor. Math. Paris.

After he had woone the caſtell of Rocheſter (as before you haue heard) he haſted to S. Albons, and there diuided his armie into two parts, appointing the one to remaine about London, whileſt he himſelfe with the other might go into the north to waſte and deſtroie the poſſeſſions of certeine lords there, which (as he was informed) went about to raiſe an armie againſt him. He made capteins of that armie which he left behind him, his brother William earle of Saliſburie, Sauerie de Mauleon, Will. Brewer, Walter Buc, and others. He himſelfe departed from S. Albons about the 21 day of December, leading his ſaid armie northwards: in which were chiefe capteins theſe that follow, William erle of Albemarle, Philip de Albeney, and Iohn Marſhall. Beauer caſtle ſummoned to yeeld. William de Albeney. Stodham. Charnelles.

The caſtell of Beauoir rendered to the king.

The firſt night he laie at Dunſtable, and from thence paſſing forwards towards Northampton, he deſtroied by the waie all the manours, places and houſes, which belonged to the aduerſaries, and ſo kept on his iournie till he came to Notingham, where he laie in the caſtell on Chriſtmaſſe day, and in the morning (being S. Stephans day) he went to Langar, and lodged there that night, ſending his ſummons in the morning to the caſtell of Beauer, willing them within to yeeld. This caſtell apperteined to William Albeney, who had committed the cuſtodie thereof vnto his ſonne Nicholas de Albeney preeſt, to ſir William de Stodham, and to ſir Hugh Charnelles knights: the which came to the king with the keies of the caſtell, and ſurrendered the ſame vnto him, with condition that he ſhould be good to their maſter the ſaid William Albeney, and grant vnto them their horſſes and armour, wherwith they would remaine with him vnder his peace and protection. On the next morrow (being S. Iohns day) the king went to the caſtell, and receiuing the ſame, deliuered it to the keeping of Geffrey Buteuile, and his brother Oliuer.

After this the caſtell of Iohn Lacie at Dunnington was taken and laid flat to the ground, by commandement of the king, who hauing accompliſhed his will in thoſe parties, drew towards Yorkeſhire, and at his comming thither deſtroied the houſes, townes and manours of thoſe lords and gentlemen which were againſt him. It is horrible to heare, and lothſome to rehearſe the crueltie which was practiſed by the ſouldiers and men of warre in places where they came, who counting no honour or renowme more excellent, nor glorie (as warriours ſay)

Few there were in that countrie of great linage or wealth, whom the king for their aſſembling themſelues with the barons either ſpoiled not, or put not to execution. Thus with his armie (to the great deſolation of the countrie) he paſſed forth to the borders of Scotland, and entring that realme, tooke the caſtell of Barwike, and other places of ſtrength in thoſe parts, meaning to haue woone more from the Scots, if other vrgent buſineſſe had not called him backe againe. This being doone, he committed the countrie which lieth betwixt the riuer of Theſe, and the confines of Scotland, to the keeping of Hugh de Balioll and Philip de Hulcotes, aſſigning to them ſuch conuenient number of men of warre as was thought expedient, and the cuſtodie of the caſtels in Yorkeſhire he deliuered to Robert de Vepount, to Brian de Liſle, and to Geffrey de Lucie.

Finallie, when he had ſo ordered things in the North parts as ſtood with his pleaſure, ſo that there remained no more but two caſtels, that is to ſaie, Mountſorell, and another in Yorkeſhire that apperteined to Robert de Roos in poſſeſſion of the barons, he returned by the borders of Wales into the ſouth parts: and by all the way as he paſſed, he ſhewed great crueltie againſt his aduerſaries, beſieging and taking their caſtels and ſtrong houſes, of the which ſome he cauſed to be fortified with garriſons of ſouldiers to his owne vſe, and ſome he raced. The like feats were wrought by the other armie in the parts about London: for William earle of Saliſburie, and Foukes de Brent, with the other capteins which the king had left behind him there, perceiuing that the citie would not eaſilie be woone by anie ſiege, firſt furniſhed the caſtell of Windſore, Hertford, and Barkhamſted, with ſuch ſtrong garriſons of ſouldiers as might watch, vpon occaſion giuen to aſſaile thoſe that ſhould either go into the citie, or come from thence: they marched forth with the reſidue of the armie, and paſſing through the counties of Eſſex, and Hertford, Middleſex, Cambridge, Huntington, they waſted the countries, and made the townes become tributaries to them. As for the houſes, manour places, parkes, and other poſſeſſions of the barons, they waſted, ſpoiled and deſtroied them, running euen hard to the citie of London and ſetting fire in the ſuburbs.

Caſtels deliuered to the keeping of Foukes de Brent.

In this meane time, whileſt the king went forwards on his iournie northwards, vpon the 18 of December laſt paſt, the caſtell of Hanſlap was taken by Foukes de Brent, which apperteined vnto William Manduit. On the ſame day alſo was the caſtell of Tunbridge taken by the garriſon of Rocheſter, which caſtell of Tunbridge belonged to the earle of Clare. Moreouer, the foreſaid Foukes de Brent comming vnto Bedford, wan both the towne and caſtell: for they that had the caſtell in keeping, after 7 daies reſpit (which they obteined at the hands of the ſaid Foukes) when reſcue came not from the lord William Beauchampe their maiſter, they deliuered it vnto the ſaid Foukes. Vnto whom K. Iohn gaue not onlie that caſtell, but alſo committed to his keeping the caſtels of Northampton, Oxford and Cambridge.

Hertfort caſtell.

The king had this Foukes in great eſtimation, and amongſt other waies to aduance him, he gaue to him in marriage Margaret de Riuers, a ladie of high nobilitie, with all the lands and poſſeſſions that to hir belonged. Moreouer, to William earle of Albemarle the king deliuered the cuſtodie of the caſtels of Rockingham, Sawey and Biham. To one Ranulfe Teutonicus, the caſtell of Barkehamſted, and to Walter Godreuill ſeruant to Foukes de Brent, he betooke the keeping of the caſtell of Hertford. Thus what on the one part, and what on the other, the barons loſt in maner all their poſſeſſions from the ſouth ſea vnto the borders of Scotland, the king ſeizing the ſame into his hands, and committing them to the keeping of ſtrangers, and ſuch other as he thought more truſtie and conuenient. All this while the barons laie at London banketting and making merrie, without attempting anie exploit praiſe-worthie. But yet when they heard by certeine aduertiſement, what hauocke and deſtruction was made of their houſes & poſſeſſions abroad, they could not but lament their miſeries, and amongſt other their complaints which they vttered one to another, they ſore blamed the pope, as a cheefe cauſe of all theſe euils, for that he mainteined and defended the king againſt them.

Indeed about the ſame time pope Innocent, who before at the inſtant ſuit of king Iohn had excommunicated the barons in generall, did now excommunicate them by name, and in particular, as theſe. Firſt all the citizens of London which were authors of the miſcheefe that had happened by the rebellion of the ſaid barons. Alſo Robert Fitz Walter, Saer de Quincie earle of Wincheſter, R. his ſonne, G. de Mandeuille, and W. his brother the earle of Clare, and G. his ſonne, H. earle of Hereford, R. de Percie, G. de Veſcie, I. coneſtable of Cheſter, W. de Mowbraie, Will. de Albenie, W. his ſonne, P. de Breuſe, R. de Creſſey, I. his ſonne, Ranulfe Fitz Robert, R. earle Bigot, H. his ſonne, Robert de Vere, Foulke Fitz Warren, W. The barons accurſed by name.

The armie which king Iohn had left behind him in the ſouth parts, vnder the leading of the earle of Saliſburie and other, laie not idle, but ſcowring the countries abroad (as partlie yee haue heard) came to S. Edmundſburie, and hauing intelligence there, that diuerſe knights, ladies and gentlewomen that were there before their comming, had fled out of that towne, and for their more ſafetie were withdrawne into the Ile of Elie, they followed them, beſieged the Ile, and aſſailed it on ech ſide, ſo that although they within had fortified the paſſages, and appointed men of warre to remaine vpon the gard of the ſame in places where it was thought moſt needfull; yet at length they entred vpon them by force, Walter Bucke with his Brabanders being the firſt that ſet foot within the Ile towards Herbie. For by reaſon the waters in the fenes and ditches were hard froſen, ſo that men might paſſe by the ſame into the ſaid Ile, they found means to enter, and ſpoiled it frō ſide to ſide, togither with the cathedrall church, carieng from thence at their departure a maruellous great prey of goods and cattell.

Ralfe Cog.

The Ile of Elie ſpoiled. Polydor. Bernewell.

The barons of the realme being thus afflicted with ſo manie miſcheefes all at one time, as both by the ſharpe and cruell warres which the king made againſt them on the one ſide, and by the enmitie of the pope on the other ſide, they knew not which way to turne them, nor how to ſeeke for releefe. For by the loſſe of their complices taken in the caſtell of Rocheſter, they ſaw not how it ſhould any thing auaile them to ioine in battell with the king. Therefore conſidering that they were in ſuch extremitie of deſpaire they reſolued with themſelues to ſeeke for aid at the enimies hands, and thereupon Saer earle of Wincheſter, and Robert Fitz Walter, with letters vnder their ſeales were ſent vnto Lewes the ſonne of Philip the French king, offering him the crowne of England, and ſufficient pledges for performance of the ſame, and other couenants to be agreed betwixt them, requiring him with all ſpeed to come vnto their ſuccour. This Lewes had married (as before is ſaid) Blanch daughter to Alfonſe king of Caſtile, neece to king Iohn by his ſiſter Elianor.

The lords ſend to the French kings ſonne, offering to him the crowne.

Now king Philip the father of this Lewes, being glad to haue ſuch an occaſion to inuade the relme of England, which he neuer loued, promiſed willinglie that his ſonne ſhould come vnto the aid of the ſaid barons with all conuenient ſpeed (but firſt he receiued foure and twentie hoſtages which he placed at Campaine for further aſſurance of the couenants accorded) and herewith he prepared an armie, and diuerſe ſhips to tranſport his ſonne and his armie ouer into England. In the meane time, and to put the barons in comfort, he ſent ouer a certeine number of armed men, vnder the leading of the chatelaine of ſaint Omers and the chatelaine of Arras, Hugh Thacon, Euſtace de Neuille, Baldwin Brecell, William de Wimes, Giles de Melun, W. de Beamont, Giles de Herſie, Biſet de Ferſie, and others, the which taking the ſea, arriued with one and fortie ſhips in the Thames, and ſo came to London the ſeauen and twentith of Februarie, where they were receiued of the barons with great ioy and gladneſſe. Moreouer the ſaid Lewes wrote to the barons, that he purpoſed by Gods aſſiſtance to be at Calice by a day appointed, with an armie redie to paſſe ouer with all ſpeed vnto their ſuccours.

French men ſent ouer to the aid of the barons.

The ſaturday after the Epiphanie, ſaith Rafe Cog.

The fridaie before Candlemaſſe day, Sauarie de Mauleon, and other capteines of the kings ſide, laid ſiege to the caſtell of Colcheſter, but hauing intelligence that the barons which laie at London made forward with all ſpeed to come to ſuccour that caſtell, on the Wedneſday after Candlemaſſe day, being the third of Februarie, they raiſed their ſiege, and went backe towards S. Edmundſburie.

Rafe Cog.

In the meane while, the K. being gone (as yee haue heard) to the borders of Scotland, a brute was raiſed that he was dead, and ſecretlie buried at Reading. But this rumour had not time to worke any great alteration, for after he had diſpatched his buſineſſe in the north, as he thought expedient, he returned, and comming into the eaſt parts about the midſt of Lent himſelfe in perſon beſieged the caſtell of Colcheſter, and within a few daies after his comming thither, it was deliuered vnto him by Frenchmen that kept it, with condition that they might depart with all their goods and armour, vnto their fellowes at London, and that the Engliſhmen there in companie with them in that caſtell, might likewiſe depart vpon reaſonable ranſoms.

But although that couenant was kept with the Frenchmen, yet the Engliſhmen were ſtaied and committed to priſon. Whereupon when the Frenchmen came to London, they were apprehended and charged with treaſon for making ſuch compoſition, whereby thoſe Engliſhmen that were fellowes with them in arms were ſecluded from ſo beneficiall conditions as they had made for themſelues. They were in danger to haue beene put to death for their euill dealing herein, albeit at length it was concluded that they ſhould remaine in priſon till the comming of Lewes, vnto whoſe pleaſure their cauſe ſhould be referred.

After this the caſtell of Hidingham was wonne, which belonged vnto earle Robert de Vere. Then the king prepared to beſiege London, but the Londoners were of ſuch courage, that they ſet open their gates, and hearing of the kings approach, made readie to iſſue forth to giue him battell: whereof the king being aduertiſed, withdrew backe, but Sauerie de Mauleon was ſuddenlie ſet vpon by the Londoners, loſt manie of his men, and was ſore hurt and wounded himſelfe.

The king perceiuing that it would not preuaile him to attempt the winning of the citie at that time, drew alongſt the coaſt, fortified his caſtels, and prepared a great nauie, meaning to encounter his enimie Lewes by ſea: but through tempeſt the ſhips which he had got togither from Yarmouth, Dunwich, Lin, and other hauens, were diſperſed in ſunder, and manie of them caſt awaie by rage and violence of the outragious winds.

Somewhat before this time alſo, when he heard of the compact made betwixt the barons and his aduerſaries the Frenchmen, he diſpatched a meſſenger in all haſt to the pope, ſignifieng to him what was in hand and practiſed againſt him, requiring furthermore the ſaid pope by his authoritie to cauſe Lewes whereas by meanes of defects in the contrarie, he bare too low a ſaile, in that he would be ſo fooliſhed as being a king, to ſuffer vſurped ſupremaſie to be caruer of his kingdome. But let vs ſée the conſequence. The pope deſirous to helpe king Iohn all that he might (bicauſe he was now his vaſſall) ſent his legat Gualo into France, to diſſwade king Philip from taking anie enterpriſe in hand againſt the king of England. But king Philip though he was content to heare what the legat could ſaie, yet by no meanes would be turned from the execution of his purpoſe, alledging that king Iohn was not the lawfull king of England, hauing firſt vſurped and taken it awaie from his nephue Arthur the lawfull inheritour, and that now ſithens as an enimie to his owne roiall dignitie he had giuen the right of his kingdome awaie to the pope (which he could not doo without conſent of his nobles) and therefore through his owne fault he was worthilie depriued of all his kinglie honor. For the kingdome of England (ſaith he) neuer belonged to the patrimonie of S. Peter, nor at anie time ſhall. For admit that he were rightfull king, yet neither he nor anie other prince may giue awaie his kingdome without the aſſent of his barons, which are bound to defend the ſame, and the prerogatiue roiall, to the vttermoſt of their powers. Furthermore (ſaith he) if the pope doo meane to mainteine this errour, he ſhall giue a perilous example to all kingdomes of the world. Herewithall the Nobles of France then preſent, proteſted alſo with one voice, that in defenſe of this article they would ſtand to the death, which is, that no king or prince at his will and pleaſure might giue awaie his kingdome, or make it tributarie to anie other potentate, whereby the Nobles ſhould become thrall or ſubiect to a forren gouernour. Theſe things were doone at Lions in the quindene after Eaſter.

Matth. Paris.

Lewes the Frẽch kings ſonne mainteineth his pretended title to the crowne of England.

Lewes on the morrow following, being the 26 of Aprill, by his fathers procurement, came into the councell chamber, and with frowning looke beheld the legat, where by his procurator he defended the cauſe that moued him to take vpon him this iournie into England, diſprouing not onelie the right which king Iohn had to the crowne, but alſo alledging his owne intereſt, not onelie by his new election of the barons, but alſo in the title of his wife, whoſe mother the quéene of Caſtile remained onelie aliue of all the brethren and ſiſters of Henrie the ſecond late king of England (as before ye haue heard.) The legat made anſwer herevnto, that king Iohn had taken vpon him the croſſe, as one appointed to go to warre againſt Gods enimies in the holie land, wherefore he ought by decrée of the generall councell to haue peace for foure yeares to come, and to remaine in ſuertie vnder protection of the apoſtolike ſée. But Lewes replied thereto, that king Iohn had by warre firſt inuaded his caſtels and lands in Picardie, and waſted the ſame, as Buncham caſtell and Liens, with the countie of Guiſnes which belonged to the fée of the ſaid Lewes.

The priuilege of thoſe that take vpon them the croſſe.

Matth. Paris.

But theſe reaſons notwithſtanding, the legat warned the French king on paine of curſing, not to ſuffer his ſonne to go into England, and likewiſe his ſonne, that he ſhould not preſume to take the iournie in hand. But Lewes hearing this, declared that his father had nothing to do to forbid him to proſecute his right in the realme of England, which was not holden of him, and therefore required his father not to hinder his purpoſe in ſuch things as belonged nothing to him, but rather to licence him to ſéeke the recouerie of his wiues right, which he meant to purſue with perill of life, if néed ſhould require.

The legat perceiuing he could not preuaile in his ſute made to king Philip, thought that he would not ſpend time longer in vaine, in further treating with him, but ſped him forth into England, obteining yet a ſafeconduct of the French king to paſſe through his realme. Lewes in like maner, purpoſing by all meanes to preuent the legat, firſt diſpatched forth ambaſſadours in all haſt vnto the court of Rome to excuſe himſelfe to the pope, and to render the reaſons that moſt ſpeciallie mooued him to procéed forward in his enterpriſe againſt king Iohn, being called by the barons of England to take the crowne thereof vpon him. This doone, with all conuenient ſpéed he came downe to Calice, where he found 680 ſhips well appointed and trimmed, which Euſtace ſurnamed the monke had gathered and prepared there readie againſt his comming.

He commeth to Calice.

Lewes therefore forthwith imbarking himſelfe with his people, and all neceſſarie prouiſions for ſuch a iournie, tooke the ſea, and arriued at a place called Stanchorre in the Ile of Tenet, vpon the 21 day of Maie, and ſhortlie after came to Sandwich, & there landed with all his people, where he alſo incamped vpon the ſhore by the ſpace of thrée daies. In which meane time there came vnto him a great number of thoſe lords and gentlemen which had ſent for him, and there euerie one apart and by himſelfe ſware fealtie and homage vnto him, as if he had béene their true and naturall prince.

He landeth in Kent.

The lords doo homage vnto him.

King Iohn about the ſame time that Lewes thus arriued, came to Douer, meaning to fight with his aduerſaries by the way as they ſhould come forward towards London. But yet vpon other aduiſement taken, he changed his purpoſe, bicauſe he put ſome doubt in the Flemings and other ſtrangers, of whome the moſt part of his armie conſiſted, bicauſe he knew that they hated the Frenchmen no more than they did the Engliſh. Therefore furniſhing the caſtell of Douer, with men, munition, and vittels, he left it in the kéeping of Hubert de Burgh, a man of notable proweſſe & valiancie, and returned himſelfe vnto Canturburie, and from thence tooke the high waie towards Wincheſter. Lewes being aduertiſed that king Iohn was retired out of Kent, paſſed through the countrie without anie incounter, and wan all the caſtels and holds as he went, but Douer he could not win.

Matth. Paris.

At his comming to Rocheſter, he laid ſiege to the caſtell there, and wan it, cauſing all the ſtrangers that were found within it to be hanged. This doone, he came to London, and there receiued the homage of thoſe lords and gentlemen which had not yet doone their homage to him at Sandwich. On the other part he tooke an oth to mainteine and performe the old lawes and cuſtomes of the realme, and to reſtore to euerie man his rightfull heritage and lands, requiring the barons furthermore to continue faithfull towards him, aſſuring them to bring things ſo to paſſe, that the realme of England ſhould recouer the former dignitie, and they their ancient liberties. Moreouer he vſed them ſo courteouſlie, gaue them ſo faire words, and made ſuch large promiſes, that they beléeued him with all their harts. But alas! Cur vincit opinio verum?

Lewes commeth to London.

The rumour of this pretended outward courteſie being once ſpred through the realme, cauſed great numbers of people to come flocking to him, among whom

whome were diuerſe of thoſe which before had taken part with king Iohn, as William earle Warren, William earle of Arundell, William earle of Saliſburie, William Marſhall the yoonger, and diuerſe other, ſuppoſing verelie that the French kings ſonne ſhould now obteine the kingdome, who in the meane time ordeined Simon Langton afore mentioned, to be his chancellour, by whoſe preaching and exhortation, as well the citizens of London as the barons that were excommunicated, cauſed diuine ſeruice to be celebrated in their preſence, induced thereto, bicauſe Lewes had alreadie ſent his procurators to Rome before his comming into England, there to ſhew the goodneſſe of his cauſe and quarell.

Simon Lãgton chancellor to Lewes.

But this auailed them not, neither tooke his excuſe any ſuch effect as he did hope it ſhould: for thoſe ambaſſadors that king Iohn had ſent thither, replied againſt their aſſertions, ſo that there was hard hold about it in that court, albeit that the pope would decrée nothing till he hard further from his legat Gualo, who the ſame time (being aduertiſed of the procéedings of Lewes in his iournie) with all diligence haſted ouer into England, and paſſing through the middle of his aduerſaries, came vnto king Iohn, then ſoiourning at Gloceſter, of whome he was moſt ioifullie receiued, for in him king Iohn repoſed all his hope of victorie. This legat immediatlie after his comming did excommunicate Lewes by name, with all his fautors and complices, but ſpeciallie Simon de Langton, with bell, booke, and candle, as the maner was. Howbeit the ſame Simon, and one Geruaſe de Hobrug deane of S. Pauls in London, with other, alledged that for the right and ſtate of the cauſe of Lewes, they had alreadie appealed to the court of Rome, and therefore the ſentence publiſhed by Gualo they tooke as void.

Cardinall Gualo commeth ouer into England.

At the ſame time alſo, all the knights and men of warre of Flanders and other parts beyond the ſeas, which had ſerued the king, departed from him, the Poictouins onelie excepted: and part of them that thus went from him reſorted vnto Lewes, and entred into his wages; but the reſidue repaired home into their owne countries, ſo that Lewes being thus increaſed in power, departed from London, and marching towards Wincheſter, he wan the caſtels of Rigat, Gilford, and Farnham. From thence he went to Wincheſter, where the citie was yéelded vnto him, with all the caſtels and holds thereabout, as Wolueſey, Odiham, and Beaumere.

Caſtels woon by Lewes.

¶ Whileſt the ſaid Lewes was thus occupied in Suſſex, about the ſubduing of that countrie vnto his obeiſance, there was a yoong gentleman in thoſe parts named William de Collingham, being of a valorous mind, and loathing forren ſubiection, who would in no wiſe doo fealtie to Lewes, but aſſembling togither about the number of a thouſand archers, kept himſelfe within the woods and deſert places, whereof that countrie is full, and ſo during all the time of this warre, ſhewed himſelfe an enimie to the Frenchmen, ſlaieng no ſmall numbers of them, as he tooke them at any aduantage. O worthie gentleman of Engliſh bloud! And O

Grandia quæ aggreditur fortis diſcrimina virtus!

William de Collingham a gentleman of Suſſex.

In like manner, all the fortreſſes, townes, and caſtels in the ſouth parts of the realme were ſubdued vnto the obeiſance of Lewes (the caſtels of Douer and Windſore onelie excepted.) Within a little while after, Will. de Mandeuille, Robert Fitz Walter, and William de Huntingfield, with a great power of men of warre, did the like vnto the countries of Eſſex and Suffolke. In which ſeaſon, king Iohn fortified the caſtels of Wallingford, Corfe, Warham, Briſtow, the Vies, and diuerſe others with munition and vittels. About which time letters came alſo vnto Lewes from his procurators, whom he had ſent to the pope, by the tenor whereof he was aduertiſed, that notwithſtanding all that they could doo or ſay, the pope meant to excommunicate him, and did but onelie ſtaie till he had receiued ſome aduertiſement from his legat Gualo.

Caſtels fortified by king Iohn.

The chéefeſt points (as we find) that were laid by Lewes his procurators againſt king Iohn were theſe, that by the murther committed in the perſon of his nephue Arthur, he had béene condemned in the parlement chamber, before the French king, by the péeres of France, and that being ſummoned to appeare, he had obſtinatelie refuſed ſo to doo, and therefore had by good right forfeited not onelie his lands within the precinct of France, but alſo the realme of England, which was now due vnto the ſaid Lewes as they alledged, in right of the ladie Blanch his wife, daughter to Elianor quéene of Spaine. But the pope refelled all ſuch allegations as they produced for proofe hereof, & ſéemed to defend king Iohns cauſe verie pithilie; but namelie, in that he was vnder the protection of him as ſupreme lord of England: againe, for that he had taken vpon him the croſſe (as before yée haue heard.) But now to returne where we left.

The points wherewith king Iohn was charg

About the feaſt of ſaint Margaret, Lewes with the lords came againe to London, at whoſe comming, the tower of London was yéelded vp to him by appointment, after which the French capteins and gentlemen, thinking themſelues aſſured of the realme, began to ſhew their inward diſpoſitions and hatred toward the Engliſhmen, and forgetting all former promiſes (ſuch is the nature of ſtrangers, and men of meane eſtate, that are once become lords of their deſires, according to the poets words, Aſperius nihil eſt humili cùm ſurgit in altum)

they did manie exceſſiue outrages, in ſpoiling and robbing the people of the countrie, without pitie or mercie. Moreouer they did not onelie breake into mens houſes, but alſo into churches, and tooke out of the ſame ſuch veſſels and ornaments of gold and ſiluer, as they could laie hands vpon: for Lewes had not the power now to rule the gréedie ſouldiers, being wholie giuen to the ſpoile.

The French men begin ſhew themſelues in their kind.

Iuuen. ſat. 9.

But moſt of all their tyrannie did appeare in the eaſt parts of the realme, when they went through the countries of Eſſex, Suffolke and Northfolke, where they miſerablie ſpoiled the townes and villages, reducing thoſe quarters vnder their ſubiection, and making them tributaries vnto Lewes in moſt ſeruile and ſlauiſh manner. Furthermore, at his comming to Norwich, he found the caſtell void of defenſe, and ſo tooke it, without any reſiſtance, and put into it a gariſon of his ſouldiers. Alſo he ſent a power to the towne of Lin, which conquered the ſame, and tooke the citizens priſoners, cauſing them to paie great ſummes of monie for their ranſoms. Moreouer, Thomas de Burgh, chateleins of the caſtell of Norwich, who vpon the approch of the Frenchmen to the citie, fled out in hope to eſcape, was taken priſoner, and put vnder ſafekéeping. He was brother vnto Hubert de Burgh capteine of Douer caſtell.

Now when Lewes had thus finiſhed his enterpriſes in thoſe parts, he returned to London, and ſhortlie therevpon created Gilbert de Gaunt earle of Lincolne, appointing him to go thither with all conuenient ſpéed, that he might reſiſt the iſſues made by them which did hold the caſtels of Notingham and Newarke, waſting and ſpoiling the poſſeſſions and lands belonging to the barons néere adioining to the ſame caſtels. This Gilbert de Gaunt then, togither with Robert de Ropeley, comming into that countrie, tooke the citie of Lincolne, and brought all the countrie vnder ſubiection (the caſtell onlie excepted.)

Holland in Lincolnſhire inuaded.

Yorkeſhire ſubdued to Lewes.

After that, they inuaded Holland, and ſpoiling that countrie, made it alſo tributarie vnto the French. Likewiſe, Robert de Ros, Peter de Brus, and Richard Percie, ſubdued Yorke and all Yorkeſhire, bringing the ſame vnder the obeiſance of Lewes. The king of Scots in like ſort ſubdued vnto the ſaid Lewes all the countrie of Northumberland, except the caſtels which Hugh de Baliol, and Philip de Hulcotes valiantlie defended againſt all the force of the enimie.

And as theſe wicked rebels made a prey of their owne countrie, ſo the legat Gualo not behind for his part to get ſomething yer all ſhould be gone, vpon a falkoniſh or wooluiſh appetite ſleeced the church, conſidering that, and tooke proxies of euerie cathedrall church & houſe of religion within England, that is to ſay, for euerie proxie fiftie ſhillings. Moreouer, he ſequeſtred all the benefices of thoſe perſons and religious men, that either aided or counſelled Lewes and the barons, in their attempts and enterpriſes. All which benefices he ſpéedilie conuerted to his owne vſe, and to the vſe of his chapleins.

Η δ' ἀρη παραμείβεται μινύθει δέ τοι ἔργον,
——μελέτη δέ τοι ἔργον ὀφέλλει,

The legat Gualo gathereth proxes. Sequeſtratiõ of benefices.

In the meane time, Lewes was brought into ſome good hope thorough meanes of Thomas de Burgh, whom he tooke priſoner (as before you haue heard) to perſuade his brother Hubert to yéeld vp the caſtell of Douer, the ſiege whereof was the next enterpriſe which he attempted. For his father king Philip, hearing that the ſame was kept by a garriſon, to the behoofe of king Iohn, wrote to his ſonne, blaming him that he left behind him ſo ſtrong a fortreſſe in his enimies hands. But though Lewes inforced his whole indeuour to win that caſtell, yet all his trauell was in vaine. For the ſaid Hubert de Burgh, and Gerard de Sotigam, who were chéefe capteins within, did their beſt to defend it againſt him and all his power, ſo that deſpairing to win it by force, he aſſaied to obteine his purpoſe, by threatning to hange the capteins brother before his face, if he would not yéeld the ſooner. But when that would not ſerue, he ſought to win him by large offers of gold and ſiluer. Howbeit, ſuch was the ſingular conſtancie of Hubert, that he would not giue anie eare vnto thoſe his flatering motions. Then Lewes in a great furie menaced that he would not once depart from thence, till he had woon the caſtell, and put all them within to death, and began to aſſaile it with more force than before he had doone.

Lewes trauelleth in vaine to take Douer. Rafe Cog.

The barons alſo, which at this ſeaſon lay at London, making a rode to Cambridge, tooke the towne, and after went foorth into Northfolke and Suffolke (as it were to gather vp ſuch ſcraps as the French had left) ſpoiling thoſe countries verie pitifullie, churches and all. They conſtreined the townes of Yermouth, Dunwich & Gipſwich, to pay to them great ſummes of monie by waie of ranſoming. And at length returning by Colcheſter, they vſed like practiſes there. From thence they returned to London, and ſhortlie after, vnder the conduct of the earle of Neuers (vpon a ſudden) going to Windſore, they laid a ſtrong ſiege about that caſtell; in the which was capteine Ingelard de Athie, with ſixtie valiant knights, & other men of war of their ſuit, the which manfullie ſtood at defenſe.

Alexander K. of Scots doth homage to K. Lewes.

In the moneth of Auguſt, Alexander king of Scotland came through the countrie vnto the ſiege of Douer, and there did homage vnto Lewes, in right of his tenure holden of the kings of England, and then returned home, but in his comming vp, as he came by caſtell Bernard in the countrie of Haliwerkfolke (which aperteined vnto Hugh de Baliol) he loſt his brother in law the lord Euſtace de Veſcie, who was ſtriken in the forehead with a quarrell, as he rode in companie of the king néere vnto the ſame caſtell, to view if it were poſſible vpon anie ſide to win it by aſſault.

This Euſtace had married the ſiſter of K. Alexander.

Matth. Paris.

The vicount of Melune diſcouereth the purpoſe of Lewes.

About the ſame time, or rather in the yeare laſt paſt as ſome hold, it fortuned that the vicount of Melune a French man, fell ſicke at London, and perceiuing that death was at hand, he called vnto him certeine of the Engliſh barons, which remained in the citie, vpon ſafegard thereof, and to them made this proteſtation: I lament (ſaith he) your deſtruction and deſolation at hand, bicauſe ye are ignorant of the perils hanging ouer your heads. For this vnderſtand, that Lewes, and with him 16 earles and barons of France, haue ſecretlie ſworne (if it ſhall fortune him to conquere this realme of England, & to be crowned king) that he will kill, baniſh, and confine all thoſe of the Engliſh nobilitie (which now doo ſerue vnder him, and perſecute their owne king) as traitours and rebels, and furthermore will diſpoſſeſſe all their linage of ſuch inheritances as they now hold in England. And bicauſe (ſaith he) you ſhall not haue doubt hereof, I which lie here at the point of death, doo now affirme vnto you, and take it on the perill of my ſoule, that I am one of thoſe ſixtéen that haue ſworne to performe this thing: wherefore I aduiſe you to prouide for your owne ſafeties, and your realmes which you now deſtroie, and kéepe this thing ſecret which I haue vttered vnto you. After this ſpéech was vttered he ſtreightwaies died.

The vicount of Melune dieth.

When theſe words of the lord of Melune were opened vnto the barons, they were, and not without cauſe, in great doubt of themſelues, for they ſaw how Lewes had alredie placed and ſet Frenchmen in moſt of ſuch caſtels and townes as he had gotten, the right whereof indéed belonged to them. And againe, it gréeued them much to vnderſtand, how beſides the hatred of their prince, they were euerie ſundaie and holiedaie openlie accurſed in euerie church, ſo that manie of them inwardlie relented, and could haue bin contented to haue returned to king Iohn, if they had thought that they ſhould thankfullie haue béene receiued.

The Engliſh nobilitie beginneth to miſlike of the match which they had made with Lewes.

The death of pope Innocent.

In this yeare, about the 17 of Iulie, pope Innocent died, at whoſe death (being knowen in England) all they that were enimies to king Iohn greatlie reioiſed, for they were in great hope that his ſucceſſour would haue rather inclined to their part, than to the kings. But it fell out otherwiſe, for Honorius the third that ſucceeded the ſame foreſaid Innocent, mainteined the ſame cauſe in defenſe of king Iohn, as earneſtlie or rather more than his predeceſſour had doone, ſending with all ſpéed his buls ouer into England to confirme Gualo in his former authoritie of legat, commanding him with all indeuour to procéed in his buſineſſe, in mainteining the king againſt Lewes, and the diſloiall Engliſh nobilitie that aided the ſaid Lewes. But now to our purpoſe.

Honorius the third choſen pope.

King Iohn lieng all this while at Wincheſter, and hauing knowledge how his aduerſaries were dailie occupied in moſt hard enterpriſes, as in beſieging ſundrie ſtrong and inuincible places, ſent foorth his commiſſioners to aſſemble men of warre, and to allure vnto his ſeruice all ſuch, as in hope of prey, were minded to follow his ſtandard, of the which there reſorted to him no ſmall number. So that hauing gotten togither a competent armie for his purpoſe, he brake foorth of Wincheſter, as it had béene an hideous tempeſt of weather, beating downe all things that ſtood in his waie, ſending foorth his people on ech ſide to waſt the countries, to burne vp the townes and villages, to ſpoile the churches & churchmen. With which ſucceſſe ſtill increaſing his furie,

The hauocke which king Iohn made in the poſſeſsions of his aduerſaries.

he turned his whole violence into Cambridgeſhire, where he did exceeding great hurt. Then entring into the countries of Northfolke and Suffolke, he committed the like rage, waſt, and deſtruction, in the lands and poſſeſſions that belonged vnto the earle of Arundell, to Roger Bigot, William de Huntingfield, and Roger de Creſſey.

Northfolke and Suffolke.

The ſiege raiſed from windſor.

The barons in the meane time that lay at ſiege before the caſtle of Windſore, hearing of that hauocke which king John had made in the eaſt parts of the realme, ſecretlie in the night ſeaſon raiſed their camps, and leauing their tents behind them, with all ſpeed made towards Cambridge. But king John by faithfull eſpials, hauing aduertiſement of their intent, which was, to get betwixt him and the places of his refuge, withdrew him and got to Stamford, yer they might reach to Cambridge, ſo that miſſing their purpoſe, after they had taken ſome ſpoiles abroad in the countrie, they returned to London. King John from Stamford, marched toward Lincolne, bicauſe he heard that the caſtell there was beſieged.

Gilbert de Gaunt fleeth from the face of king John.

But thoſe that had beſieged it, as Gilbert de Gaunt, and others, hearing that king John was comming towards them, durſt not abide him, but fled, and ſo eſcaped. The king then turned his iournie towards the marſhes of Wales, and there did much hurt to thoſe places that belonged to his aduerſaries. After this alſo, and with a verie puiſſant armie he went eftſoones eaſtwards, and paſſing through the countries, came againe into the counties of Northfolke and Suffolke, waſting and afflicting all that came in his waie, and at length comming to Lin, was there ioifullie receiued. Then keeping forth northwards, he ſpoiled the townes and abbeies of Peterburgh and Crowland, where a number of the kings enimies were withdrawne into the church, but Sauerie de Mauleon, being ſent forth to ſeeke them, found them in the church the morrow after S. Michaell, and drew them out by force, ſpoiled the houſe, and getting a great bootie and prey of cattell and other riches, he with his people conueied the ſame awaie at his departing, after he had ranſacked euerie corner of the church, and other the houſes and places belonging to that abbeie.

Thus the countrie being waſted on each hand, the king haſted forward till he came to Wellestreme ſands, where paſſing the waſhes he loſt a great part of his armie, with horſſes and carriages, ſo that it was iudged to be a puniſhment appointed by God, that the ſpoile which had beene gotten and taken out of churches, abbeies, and other religious houſes, ſhould periſh, and be loſt by ſuch means togither with the ſpoilers. Yet the king himſelfe, and a few other, eſcaped the violence of the waters, by following a good guide. But as ſome haue written, he tooke ſuch greefe for the loſſe ſuſteined at this paſſage, that immediatlie therevpon he fell into an ague, the force and heat whereof, togither with his immoderate feeding on rawe peaches, and drinking of new ſider, ſo increaſed his ſickneſſe, that he was not able to ride, but was faine to be carried in a litter preſentlie made of twigs, with a couch of ſtrawe vnder him, without any bed or pillow, thinking to haue gone to Lincolne, but the diſeaſe ſtill ſo raged and grew vpon him, that he was inforced to ſtaie one night at the caſtell of Laford, and on the next day with great paine, cauſed himſelfe to be caried vnto Newarke, where in the caſtell through anguiſh of mind, rather than through force of ſickneſſe, he departed this life the night before the nineteenth day of October, in the yeare of his age fiftie and one, and after he had reigned ſeauenteene yeares, ſix moneths, and ſeauen and twentie daies.

There are that write, how one of his owne ſeruants did conſpire with a conuert of that abbeie, and that they prepared a diſh of peares, which they poiſoned, three of the whole number excepted, which diſh the ſaid conuert preſented vnto him. And when the king ſuſpected them to be poiſoned indeed, by reaſon that ſuch pretious ſtones as he had about him, caſt forth a certeine ſweat, as it were bewraieng the poiſon, he compelled the ſaid conuert to taſt and eat ſome of them, who knowing the three peares which were not poiſoned, tooke and eat thoſe three, which when the king had ſeene, he could no longer abſteine, but fell to, and eating greedilie of the reſt, died the ſame night, no hurt happening to the conuert, who thorough helpe of ſuch as bare no good will to the K. found ſhift to eſcape, and conueied himſelfe awaie from danger of receiuing due puniſhment for ſo wicked a deed.

Beſide theſe reports which yee haue heard, there are other that write, how he died of ſurfeting in the night, as Rafe Niger; ſome, of a bloudie flix, as one ſaith that writeth an addition vnto Roger Houeden. And Rafe Cogheſhall ſaith, that comming to Lin, (where he appointed Sauerie de Mauleon to be capteine, and to take order for the fortifieng of that towne) he tooke a ſurfet there of immoderat diet, and withall fell into a laſke, and after his laſke had left him, at his comming to Laford in Lindſey, he was let bloud: furthermore to increaſe his other greefes and ſorrowes for the loſſe of his carriage, iewels and men, in paſſing ouer the waſhes, which troubled him ſore; there came vnto him meſſengers from Hubert de Burgh, and Gerard de Sotegam capteins of Douer caſtell, aduertiſing him, that they were not able to reſiſt the forceable aſſalts and engins of the enimies, if ſpeedie ſuccour came not to them in due time. Whereat his greefe of mind being doubled, ſo as he might ſeeme euen oppreſſed with ſorrow, the ſame increaſed his diſeaſe ſo vehementlie, that within a ſmall time it made an end of his life (as before yee haue heard.)

The variable reports of writers, concerning the death of king John.

The men of warre that ſerued vnder his enſignes, being for the more part hired ſouldiers and ſtrangers, came togither, and marching forth with his bodie, each man with his armour on his backe, in warlike order, conueied it vnto Worceſter, where he was pompouſlie buried in the cathedrall church before the high altar, not for that he had ſo appointed (as ſome write) but bicauſe it was thought to be a place of moſt ſuertie for the lords and other of his freends there to aſſemble, and to take order in their buſineſſe now after his deceaſſe. And bicauſe he was ſomewhat fat and corpulent, his bowels were taken out of his bodie, and buried at Croxton abbeie, a houſe of monks of the order called Præmonſtratenſes, in Staffordſhire, the abbat of which houſe was his phyſician.

¶ How ſoeuer or where ſoeuer or when ſoeuer he died, it is not a matter of ſuch moment that it ſhould impeach the credit of the ſtorie: but certeine it is that he came to his end, let it be by a ſurfet, or by other meanes ordeined for the ſhortening of his life. The manner is not ſo materiall as the truth is certeine. And ſurelie, he might be thought to haue procured againſt himſelfe manie moleſtations, manie anguiſhes & vexations, which nipt his hart & gnawd his very bowels with manie a ſore ſymptome or paſſion: all which he might haue withſtood if fortune had beene ſo fauourable, that the loialtie of his ſubiects had remained towards him inuiolable, that his Nobles with multitudes of adherents had not with ſuch ſhamefull apoſtaſie withſtood him in open fight, that forren force had not weakened his dominion, or rather robbed him of a maine branch of his regiment, that he himſelfe had not ſought with the ſpoile of his owne people to pleaſe the imaginations of his ill affected mind; that courtiers & commoners had with one aſſent performed in dutie no leſſe than they pretended in veritie, to the preſeruation of the ſtate and the ſecuritie of their ſouereigne: all which preſuppoſed plagues concurring, what happineſſe could the king arrogate to himſelfe by his imperiall title, which was through his owne default ſo imbezelled, that a ſmall remanent became his in right, when by open hoſtilitie and accurſſed papaſie the greater portion was pluckt out of his hands.

Here therefore we ſee the iſſue of domeſticall or homebred broiles, the fruits of variance, the gaine that riſeth of diſſention, whereas no greater nor ſafer fortification can betide a land, than when the inhabitants are all alike minded. By concord manie an hard enterpriſe (in common ſenſe thought vnpoſſible) is atchiued, manie weake things become ſo defended, that without manifold force they cannot be diſſolued. From diuiſion and mutinies doo iſſue (as out of the Troiane horſſe) ruines of roialties, and decaies of communalties. The ſinewes of a realme is ſuppoſed of ſome to be ſubſtance and wealth; of other ſome policie and power; of other ſome conuenient defenſes both by water and land: but a moſt excellent deſcription of a well fortified countrie is that of Plautus, ſet downe in moſt pithie words and graue ſentences; no leſſe worthie to be written than read and conſidered. The deſcription is this.

Plaut. in Perſ.

Si incolæ bene ſunt morati pulchrè munitũ regnũ arbitror:
Perfidia & peculatus ex vrbe & auaritia ſi exulent,
Quarta inuidia, quinta ambitio, ſexta obtrectatio,
Septimum periurium, octaua indulgentia,
Nona iniuria, decima quod peſſimum aggreſſu ſcelus:
Hæc niſi inde aberũt cẽtuplex murus reb. ſecundis parũ eſt.

And therefore no maruell though both courtiers and commoners fell from king Iohn their naturall prince, and tooke part with the enimie; not onelie to the diſgrace of their ſouereigne, but euen to his ouerthrow, and the depopulation of the whole land; ſith theſe maine bulworks and rampiers were wanting; and the contrarie in moſt ranke ſort and deteſtable manner extended their virulent forces.

But we will ſurceaſſe to aggrauate this matter, ſith the ſame is ſufficientlie vrged in the verie courſe of the hiſtorie concerning his acts and deeds, continued to the verie day of his death, and the verie time of his buriall, whereof I ſaie thus much, that whether it was his will to be interred, as is aforeſaid, or whether his corpſe being at the diſpoſing of the ſuruiuers, to elect the place as a conuenient ſtorehouſe for a princes bones, I leaue it as doubtfull, and therfore vndetermined, eſteeming the leſſe to labour therein, bicauſe the truth can hardlie by certeintie be winnowed out, but by coniecturall ſuppoſals aimed and ſhot at. Notwithſtanding, in my poore iudgement it is verie likelie (firſt in reſpect of the time which was ſuperſtitious and popiſh; ſecondlie by reaſon of the cuſtome of funerall rites then commonlie vſed) that he was buried in the ſaid place for order ſake, & his bodie (if I may preſume ſo farre by warrant of mine author) wrapped in a moonks cowle and ſo laid in his graue or toome. For the manner was at that time, in ſuch ſort to burie their Nobles and great men, who were induced by the imaginations of moonks and fond fanſies of freers to beleeue, that the ſaid cowle was an amulet or defenſitiue to their ſoules from hell and helliſh hags, how or in what ſoeuer ſort they died; either in ſorrow and repentance for ſinne, or in blaſphemie, outrage, impatiencie, or deſperation.

This forme of funerals was frequented in Wales, hauing beene firſt brewed and broched in England, from whence (if we may giue credit to our late Chronographers) as from a poiſoned ſpring it ſpred it ſelfe into Wales. For the firſt abbeie or frierie that is read to haue beene erected there, ſince the diſſolution of the noble houſe of Bangor, which fauoured not of Romiſh dregs, was the Twy Gwyn, which was builded in the yeare 1146. Afterwards theſe vermine ſwarmed like bees, or rather crawled like lice ouer all the land, and drew in with them their lowſie religion, tempered with I wot not how manie millians of abhominations; hauing vtterlie forgotten the leſſon which Ambroſius Teleſinus had taught them [who writ in the yeare 540, when the right chriſtian faith (which Ioſeph of Arimathia taught the Ile of Aualon) reigned in this land, before the proud and bloodthirſtie moonke Auguſtine infected it with the poiſon of Romiſh errors] in a certeine ode, a part whereof are theſe few verſes inſuing,

Ac ef yn vigail,
    Ac nys areilia:
Gwae ny theidw ey dheuaid,

Thus in Engliſh almoſt word for word.

Wo be to that preeſt yborne,
That will not cleanelie weed his corne,
    And preach his charge among:
Wo be to that ſhepheard (Iſaie)
That will not watch his fold alwaie,
    As to his office dooth belong:
Wo be to him that dooth not keepe,
From rauening Romiſh wolues his ſheepe,
    With ſtaffe and weapon ſtrong.

This (as not impertinent to the purpoſe) I haue recorded, partlie to ſhew the palpable blindnes of that age wherein king Iohn liued, as alſo the religion which they repoſed in a rotten rag, eſteeming it as a Scala cœli or ladder to life; but ſpeciallie inferred to this end, that we may fetch ſome light from this cleere candle (though the ſame ſeeme to be duskiſh & dim) whereby we may be lead to conceiue in reaſon and common ſenſe, that the interrement of the king was according to the cuſtome then in vſe and requeſt, and therefore by all likelihoods he was buried as the peeres and ſtates of the land were woont to be in thoſe daies, after the maner aboue mentioned.

King Iohns children.

But to let this paſſe as a cold diſcourſe of a coffen of bones couered with clods of claie; you ſhall vnderſtand that he left behind him poſteritie of both ſexes. For he had iſſue by his wife queene Iſabell two ſonnes, Henrie who ſucceeded him in the kingdome, and Richard; three daughters, Ioane married to Alexander king of Scotland, Iſabell coupled in matrimonie with the emperour Frederike the ſecond, cond, and Elianor whome William earle of Gloceſter had to wife. He had alſo another daughter (as ſome haue left in writing) called Elianor.

He was comelie of ſtature, but of looke and countenance diſpleaſant and angrie, ſomewhat cruell of nature, as by the writers of his time he is noted, and not ſo hardie as doubtfull in time of perill and danger. But this ſeemeth to be an enuious report vttered by thoſe that were giuen to ſpeake no good of him whome they inwardlie hated. Howbeit ſome giue this witneſſe of him (as the author of the booke of Bernewell abbeie and other) that he was a great and mightie prince, but yet not verie fortunate, much like to Marius the noble Romane, taſting of fortune both waies: bountifull and liberall vnto ſtrangers, but of his owne people (for their dailie treaſons practiſed towards him) a great oppreſſour, ſo that he truſted more to forreners than to them, and therfore in the end he was of them vtterlie forſaken.

¶ Verelie, whoſoeuer ſhall conſider the courſe of the hiſtorie written of this prince, he ſhall find, that he hath beene little beholden to the writers of that time in which he liued: for ſcarſelie can they afoord him a good word, except when the trueth inforceth them to come out with it as it were againſt their willes. The occaſion whereof (as ſome thinke) was, for that he was no great freend to the clergie. And yet vndoubtedlie his deeds ſhew he had a zeale to religion, as it was then accompted: for he founded the abbeie of Beauleau in the new forreſt, as it were in recompenſe of certeine pariſhchurches, which to inlarge the ſame forreſt he cauſed to be throwne downe and ruinated.

Matth. Paris.
Polydor.
& alij.

He builded the monaſterie of Farendon, and the abbeie of Hales in Shropſhire; he repaired Godſtow where his fathers concubine Roſamund laie interred; he was no ſmall benefactor to the minſter of Lichfield in Staffordſhire; to the abbeie of Crokeſden in the ſame ſhire, and to the chappell at Knareſburgh in Yorkſhire. So that (to ſay what I thinke) he was not ſo void of deuotion towards the church, as diuers of his enimies haue reported, who of meere malice conceale all his vertues, and hide none of his vices; but are plentifull inough in ſetting foorth the ſame to the vttermoſt, and interpret all his dooings and ſaiengs to the woorſt, as may appeare to thoſe that aduiſedlie read the works of them that write the order of his life, which may ſeeme rather an inuectiue than a true hiſtorie: neuertheleſſe, ſith we cannot come by the truth of things through the malice of writers, we muſt content our ſelues with this vnfreendlie deſcription of his time. Certeinelie it ſhould ſeeme the man had a princelie heart in him, and wanted nothing but faithfull ſubiects to haue aſſiſted him in reuenging ſuch wrongs as were doone and offered by the French king and others.

Moreouer, the pride and pretended authoritie of the cleargie he could not well abide, when they went about to wreſt out of his hands the prerogatiue of his princelie rule and gouernement. True it is, that to mainteine his warres which he was forced to take in hand, as well in France as elſewhere, he was conſtreined to make all the ſhift he could deuiſe to recouer monie, and bicauſe he pinched their purſſes, they conceiued no ſmall hatred againſt him, which when he perceiued, and wanted peraduenture diſcretion to paſſe it ouer, he diſcouered now and then in his rage his immoderate diſpleaſure, as one not able to bridle his affections, a thing verie hard in a ſtout ſtomach, and thereby miſſed now and then to compaſſe that which otherwiſe he might verie well haue brought to paſſe.

Matth. Paris.

It is written, that he meant to haue become feudarie (for maintenance ſake againſt his owne diſloiall ſubiects, and other his aduerſaries) vnto Miramumeline the great king of the Saracens: but for the truth of this report I haue little to ſaie, and therefore I leaue the credit thereof to the authors. It is reported likewiſe, that in time when the realme ſtood interdicted, as he was abroad to hunt one day, it chanced that there was a great ſtag or hart killed, which when he came to be broken vp, prooued to be verie fat and thicke of fleſh; Oh (ſaith he) what a pleſant life this deere hath led, and yet in all his daies he neuer heard maſſe. To conclude, it may ſeeme, that in ſome reſpects he was not greatlie ſuperſtitious, and yet not void of a religious zeale towards the maintenance of the cleargie, as by his bountifull liberalitie beſtowed in building of abbeies and churches (as before yee haue hard) it may partlie appeare.

Henrie

Henrie the third, the eldeſt ſonne of king Iohn.

Anno Reg. 1.
1216

HEnrie, the third of that name, the eldeſt ſonne of K. John, a child of the age of nine yeres, began his reigne ouer the realme of England the nineteenth day of October, in the yeare of our Lord 1216, in the ſeuenth yeare of the emperour Frederike the ſecond, and in the 36 yeare of the reigne of Philip the ſecond king of France.

William Marſhall earle of Penbroke.

Immediatlie after the death of his father king John, William Marſhall earle of Penbroke, generall of his fathers armie, brought this yoong prince with his brother and ſiſters vnto Gloceſter, and there called a councell of all ſuch lords as had taken part with king John. Anon after it was once openlie knowne, that the ſonnes and daughters of the late deceaſſed prince were brought into a place of ſafetie, a great number of the lords and cheefe barons of the realme haſted thither (I meane not onelie ſuch as had holden with king John, but alſo diuerſe other, which vpon certeine knowledge had of his death, were newlie reuolted from Lewes) in purpoſe to aid yoong king Henrie, to whome of right the crowne did apperteine.

Math. Paris.

Thither alſo came Wallo or Guallo the popes legat (an earneſt defender of the kings cauſe) with Peter biſhop of Wincheſter, & Jocelin biſhop of Bath: alſo Ranulph earle of Cheſter, William Ferrers earle of Derbie, John Marſhall, and Philip de Albenie, with diuerſe other lords and peeres of the relme, and a great number of abbats and priors, who by and by fell to councell togither what waie ſhould be beſt to take, for the good order of things now in ſo doubtfull and perilous a time as this. The peeres of the realme being thus aſſembled, William earle of Penbroke, bringing the yoong king into their preſence, and ſetting him before them, ſpake theſe words following.

The earle of Penbroks ſhort and ſweet oration as it is borrowed out of maiſter Fox.

BEhold right honourable and welbeloued, although we haue perſecuted the father of this yoong prince for his euill demeanor, and worthilie, yet this yoong child whome heere you ſee before you, as he is in years tender, ſo is he pure and innocent from thoſe his fathers doings. Wherefore, in ſo much as euerie man is charged onelie with the burthen of his owne works and tranſgreſſions, neither ſhall the child (as the ſcripture teacheth vs) beare the iniquitie of his father: we ought therefore of dutie and conſcience to pardon this yoong and tender prince, and take compaſſion of his age as yee ſee. And now, for ſo much as he is the kings naturall and eldeſt ſonne, and muſt be our ſouereigne king, and ſucceſſour in this kingdome, come and let vs appoint him our king & gouernour, let vs remoue from vs this Lewes the French kings ſonne, and ſuppreſſe his people, which are a confuſion and ſhame to our nation: and the yoke of their ſeruitude let vs caſt from off our ſhoulders.

When the barons had heard this earles words, after ſome ſilence and conference had, they allowed of his ſaiengs, and immediatlie with one conſent, proclaimed the yoong gentleman king of England, whome the biſhops of Wincheſter and Bath did crowne and annoint with all due ſolemnities at Gloceſter, vpon the day of the feaſt of the apoſtles Simon & Jude, in preſence of the legat. Being thus crowned, he was committed to the gouernance of his brother in law, the foreſaid William Marſhall earle of Penbroke, who to win the good will of the people towards the yoong king, ſent forth meſſengers with letters into all parts of the realme, to ſignifie the newes of the kings coronation, with an offer alſo of pardon to all ſuch of the barons ſide as would turne to his part: and likewiſe of great rewards to thoſe, which hauing hitherto continued faithfull, would ſo remaine vntill this trouble ſhould be ouerpaſt. By this means it came to paſſe, that his freends greatlie reioiſed at theſe newes, and manie of thoſe which till that time had aided the Frenchmen, reuolted from them, and in hope of pardon and reward turned to king Henrie.

*See pag. 193. col. 2.

It is reported by writers, that amongſt other things, as there were diuerſe which withdrew the hearts of the Engliſhmen from Lewes, the conſideration of the confeſſion which the * vicount of Melune made at the houre of his death, was the principall. The order whereof, in the later end of the life of king John, yee haue heard. Truelie how little good will inwardlie Lewes and his Frenchmen bare towards the Engliſh nation, it appeered ſundrie waies. And firſt of all, in that they had them in a manner in no regard or eſtimation at all, but rather ſought by all means to ſpoile and keepe them vnder, not ſuffering them to beare anie rule, nor putting them in truſt with the cuſtodie of ſuch places as they had brought them in poſſeſſion of. Secondlie, they called them not to councell, ſo often as at the firſt they vſed to doo, neither did they proceed by their directions in their buſineſſe, as before they were accuſto-

The pride of the Frenchmen procureth them hatred.

med. Thirdlie, in all manner of their conuerſation, neither Lewes nor his Frenchmen vſed them ſo familiarlie, as at their firſt comming: but (as their maner is) ſhewing more loftie countenances toward them, they greatlie increaſed the indignation of the Engliſh lords againſt them, who might euill abide to be ſo ouer-ruled.

To conclude, where great promiſes were made at their entring into the land, they were ſlowe inough in performing the ſame, ſo as the expectation of the Engliſh barons was quite made void: for they perceiued dailie that they were deſpiſed & ſcoffed at for their diſloialtie ſhewed to their owne naturall prince, hearing now and then nips and tawnts openlie by the Frenchmen, that as they had ſhewed themſelues falſe and vntruſtie to their owne lawfull king, ſo they would not continue anie long time true vnto a ſtranger. Thus all theſe things laid togither, gaue occaſion to the Engliſh barons to remember themſelues, and to take iuſt occaſion to reuolt vnto king Henrie, as before wée haue mentioned. But now to the purpoſe of the hiſtorie.

Ye haue heard how Lewes had ſpent long time in vaine about the beſieging of the caſtell of Douer, for although he plagued them within verie ſore, yet Hubert de Burgh and Gerard de Sotigam bare themſelues ſo manfullie, and therwith ſo politikelie, that their aduerſaries could not come to vnderſtand their diſtreſſe & danger within the caſtell, in ſo much that deſpairing to win it in anie ſhort time, euen before the death of king Iohn was knowne (as ſome write) Lewes was contented to grant a truce to them that kept this caſtell, till the feaſt of Eaſter next inſuing: but (as it appeareth by other) this truce was not concluded till after the death of king Iohn was ſignified to Lewes, who greatlie reioiſing therat, ſuppoſed now within a ſhort time, to bring the whole realme vnder his ſubiection: and therefore raiſing his ſiege from Douer, in hope to compaſſe enterpriſes of greater conſequence, he came backe vnto the citie of London.

Matth. Paris.

Hertford caſtell deliuered to Lewes.

The caſtell of Berkehamſtéed ſurrendred.

Matth. Paris.

When they within the caſtell of Douer ſaw the ſiege remooued, they came forth, and burnt ſuch houſes and buildings as the Frenchmen had raiſed before the ſame caſtell, and comming abroad into the countrie, got togither ſuch vittels and other neceſſarie prouiſion, as might ſerue for the furniſhing of their fortreſſe for a long ſeaſon. After that Lewes was returned vnto London, he remained not long there, but with a great armie marched forth vnto Hertford, where he beſieged the caſtell, which was in the keeping of Walter de Godardule ſeruant in houſehold vnto Fouks de Brent, who defended the place from the feaſt of S. Martine, vntill the feaſt of S. Nicholas, and then deliuered it by compoſition, that he and his people might depart with all their goods, horſſe and armour. From thence Lewes went vnto Berkehamſtéed, and beſieged the caſtell, which was valiantlie defended by a Duch capteine named Waleron, who with his people behaued himſelfe ſo manfullie, that a great number of Frenchmen and other of them without, were left dead in the ditches. At an iſſue alſo made vpon the ſide, towards the north where the barons lay, they ſpoiled the carriage and truſſe of the ſaid barons, and tooke therewithall the ſtandard of William Mandeuile. Finallie about the 20 day of December, they yet yéelded the place vnto Lewes, bicauſe they were no longer able to kéepe it, their liues, goods, horſſe and armour ſaued.

Bernewell a truce.

Lewes hauing furniſhed this caſtell with a ſufficient garriſon, returned backe towards London, and comming to S. Albons, conſtreined the abbat to giue vnto him foure ſcore marks of ſiluer, for a fine, in recogniſance of dooing his homage till the feaſt of the purification of our ladie next inſuing. Which poore abbat was made to beléeue, that he ought to take this dealing to be an act of great courteſie, the earle of Wincheſter being an earneſt meane for him that he might ſo eaſilie eſcape. About the ſame time was a generall truce taken betwixt the king and Lewes, and all their partakers, till the 20 day after Chriſtmaſſe, for the obteining of which truce (as ſome write) the caſtell of Berkehamſtéed was ſurrendered vnto the ſame Lewes, as before ye haue heard.

Polydor.

After Chriſtmaſſe, and whileſt the truce yet dured, Lewes and the barons aſſembled at the councell which they held at Cambridge, & the lords that tooke part with the king met likewiſe at Oxford, and much talke there was, and great trauell imploied to haue concluded ſome agréement by compoſition betwixt the parties, but it would not be, nor yet anie longer truce (which was alſo ſought for) could be granted: whervpon Lewes beſieged the caſtell of Hidingham, the which togither with the caſtels of Norwich, Colcheſter, and Oxford, were ſurrendered vnto him, to haue a truce granted vntill a moneth after Eaſter next inſuing. And ſo by this meanes all the eaſt part of the realme came vnto the poſſeſſion of Lewes. For the Ile of Elie was woon by his people a little before the laſt truce, whileſt he himſelfe lay in ſiege at Berkehamſtéed, except one fortreſſe belonging to the ſame Ile, into the which the ſouldiers that ſerued there vnder the king were withdrawen. But yet although Lewes might ſéeme thus partlie to preuaile, in hauing theſe caſtels deliuered into his hands, yet being aduertiſed that dailie there reuolted diuerſe of the barons of England vnto king Henrie, which before had taken part with him: he ſtood in great doubt and feare of the reſt, and therefore furniſhed all thoſe caſtels which he had wonne with conuenient garriſons, and namelie the caſtell of Hertford, and after went to London, there to vnderſtand what further truſt he might put in the reſt of the Engliſh lords and barons: for as diuerſe had alreadie forſaken him, as it is ſaid, ſo the reſidue were doubtfull what they were beſt to doo.

The perplexitie in which the barons ſtood.

For firſt they conſidered, that the renouncing of their promiſed faith vnto Lewes, whome they had ſworne to mainteine as king of England, ſhould be a great reproch vnto them: and againe they well ſaw that to continue in their obedience towards him, ſhould bring the realme in great danger, ſith it would be hard for any louing agréement to continue betwéene the French & Engliſhmen, their natures being ſo contrarie. Thirdlie, they ſtood ſomewhat in feare of the popes curſſe, pronounced by his legat, both againſt Lewes and all his partakers. Albeit on the other ſide, to reuolt vnto king Henrie, though the loue which they did beare to their countrie, and the great towardneſſe which they ſaw in him greatlie mooued them; yet ſith by reaſon of his yong yeares, he was not able either to follow the wars himſelfe, or to take counſell what was to be doone in publike gouernement, they iudged it a verie dangerous caſe. For whereas in wars nothing can be more expedient than to haue one head, by whoſe appointment all things may be gouerned: ſo nothing can be more hurtfull than to haue manie rulers, by whoſe authoritie things ſhall paſſe and be ordered.

Wherefore theſe conſiderations ſtaied and kept one part of the Engliſh lords ſtill in obedience to Lewes, namelie, for that diuerſe of the confederats thought that it ſtood not with their honours ſo to forſake him, till they might haue ſome more honorable colour to reuolt from their promiſes, or that the matter ſhould be taken vp by ſome indifferent agréement to be concluded out of hand betwixt them. Hervpon vpon they reſorted in like maner vnto London, and there with Lewes tooke councell what was to be doone with their buſineſſe touching the whole ſtate of their cauſe. ¶ Here ye ſhall note, that before the concluding of this laſt truce, Fouks de Brent the capteine of the caſtell of Bedford gat togither a number of ſouldiers out of the garriſons of the caſtels of Oxford, Northampton, Bedford, and Windſor, and comming with them to S. Albons the 22 of Februarie, he ſpoiled the towne & abbie, in like maner as he had doone all the townes and villages by the way as he paſſed through the countrie, from Bedford vnto S. Albons.

S. Albons deſtroied.

The meſſengers which Lewes had remaining in the court of Rome, ſignified vnto him about the ſame time, that except he departed out of England, the ſentence of excommunication, which Gualo or Walo the legat had pronounced againſt him, ſhould be confirmed by the pope on Maundie thurſdaie next inſuing. Wherevpon Lewes was the more inclined to yeeld to the truce before mentioned, that he might in the meane time go ouer into France to his father, who had moſt earneſtlie written and ſent in commandement to him, that in any wiſe he ſhould returne home to talke with him, and ſo about midlent after the truce was concluded, he prepared himſelfe, and ſailed ouer into France, and as Polydor ſaith (but with what authoritie I know not) the king of Scots went alſo with him.

Math. Paris.
Noble men reuolting frō Lewes.

After his departure ouer, William earle of Saliſburie, William earle of Arundell, William earle Warren, and diuerſe other reuolted to king Henrie. Moreouer, William Marſhall earle of Penbroke ſo trauelled with his ſon William Marſhall the yonger, that he likewiſe came to take part with the yong king: whereby the ſide of Lewes and his Frenchmen was ſore weakened, and their harts no leſſe appalled for the ſequele of their affaires. Lewes returned yet into England before the truce was expired. The lords that held on the kings part in the abſence of Lewes, were not forgetfull to vſe opportunitie of time: for beſide that they had procured no ſmall number of thoſe that before time held with Lewes to reuolt from him to the kings ſide, they at one ſelfe time beſieged diuerſe caſtels, and recouered them out of their aduerſaries hands, as Marlebrough, Farneham, Wincheſter, Ciceſter, and certeine other, which they ouerthrew and raced, bicauſe they ſhould not be taken and kept againe by the enimie. For ye muſt vnderſtand, that the going ouer of Lewes now at that time, when it ſtood him moſt vpon to haue beene preſent here in that troubleſome ſeaſon (which he ought to haue regarded with ſingular circumſpection, and warilie to haue watched, for Virtus eſt, vbi occaſio admonet, diſpicere) brought no ſmall hinderance to the whole ſtate of all his buſineſſe, in ſo much that he was neuer ſo highlie regarded afterwards among the Engliſhmen as before.

The earle of Cheſter.

The caſtell of Mountſorell beſieged.

Henrie Braibroke.

Saer de Quincie erle of Wincheſter.

About the ſame time Ranulfe earle of Cheſter, William earle of Albermarle, William earle Ferrers, Robert de Veipount, Brian de Liſle, William de Cantlow, Philip de Marc, Robert de Gaugi, Fouks de Brent, & others aſſembled their powers, and comming to Mountſorell beſide Loughborough in Leiceſterſhire, beſieged the caſtell there, the capteine whereof was one Henrie de Braibroke. This Henrie defended the place right manfully, and doubting to be in diſtres by long ſiege, ſent with all ſpeed to the earle of Wincheſter, Saer de Quincie as then being at London with the Frenchmen, requiring him to ſend ſome ſuccour to remoue the ſiege. Herevpon the earle of Wincheſter, to whom that caſtell belonged, required Lewes that ſome conuenient power might be ſent, whereby the ſiege might be remooued. Wherefore vpon councell taken with deliberate aduiſe, it was ordeined that an armie ſhould be ſent thither with all ſpeed, not onlie to raiſe the ſiege, but alſo to ſubdue that countrie vnto the obedience of Lewes. Herwith there went out of London 600 knights, and with them aboue twentie thouſand men in armour, greedie (as it ſeemed) to haue the ſpoile of other mens goods.

Their chiefe capteins were theſe: Saer de Quincie earle of Wincheſter, Robert Fitzwater, and others, and they did ſet forward vpon the laſt of Aprill, which was the mondaie before the Aſcenſion daie, paſſing through S. Albons, where they lodged the firſt night, and ſo to Dunſtable, and by the waie ſuch ſouldiers as were vſed to ſpoile and pillage, plaied their parts, not ſparing to rob and ranſacke as well religious houſes as other. From Dunſtable keeping on their iournie northwards, at length they came to Mountſorell, but the earle of Cheſter and the other lords, aduertiſed of their approch, were retired before to Notingham, determining there to abide, till they might vnderſtand what waie the enimies would take.

The earle of Cheſter raiſeth his ſiege.

In the meane time the earle of Wincheſter and the other barons, finding their enimies departed and the ſiege raiſed, determined foorthwith to go vnto Lincolne, where Gilbert de Gaunt and other had kept ſiege a long time before the caſtell, but yet in vaine. For there was a noble ladie within that caſtell named Nichola, who demeaned hir ſelfe ſo valiantlie in reſiſting all aſſaults and enterpriſes, which the enimies that beſieged hir could attempt by anie meanes againſt hir, that they rather loſt than wan honour and eſtimation at hir hands dailie. Therefore Robert Fitzwater and the other leaders of this armie, to the end they might get that caſtell out of hir and other their enimies hands, tooke their iournie forward, and paſſing through the vale of Beauuere, all things there that came to ſight fell into the hands of the greedie ſouldiers. For the French footmen, which were as it had beene the ſcum & reffuſe of their countrie, leaſt nothing vntouched that they might lay hands vpon, not ſparing church or churchyard, nor hallowed place more than common or prophane. For they were ſo poore and ragged, that they had ſcarſe anie tatters to couer their priuie parts withall. Finallie comming vnto Lincolne, they aſſaulted the caſtell with all maner of engins, and aſſaied by all waies poſſible whereby they hoped to aduance their purpoſe.

Bernewell.

The poore eſtate of the French ſoldiers.

Thus whiles the barons with the Frenchmen were much buſied about the ſiege of Lincolne caſtell, W. Marſhall earle of Penbroke, by the aduiſe of the legat Gualo or Walo, and of Peter biſhop of Wincheſter, and other of the councell with king Henrie, cauſed ſummons to be giuen to all capteins and chateleins on the kings part, to be at Newarke vpon mondaie in Whitſunweeke, with ſuch power as they might make, from thence to march to Lincolne, there to raiſe the ſiege, and deliuer the countrie from imminent oppreſſion. Wherevpon there aſſembled at the daie and place prefixed, a great puiſſance of people deſirous to fight for the defenſe of their countrie againſt the Frenchmen and other aduerſaries, rebels to the pope, and excommunicated perſons, ſo that when the muſter was taken, there was numbered 400 knights, 250 croſſebowes, beſides demilances and horſſemen in great numbers, which for need might haue ſupplied and ſerued in ſteed of men of armes, being verie well furniſhed for the purpoſe, and armed at all points.

Summons to raiſe an armie for the king.

The chiefe capteins of this companie were theſe: William Marſhall earle of Penbroke, and his ſon

The capteins of the kings armie.

William Marſhall the yonger, Peter biſh. of Wincheſter, a man right ſkilfull in feats of warre, Ranulph earle of Cheſter, William earle of Saliſburie, William earle Ferrers, William earle of Albemarle, beſides barons, as William de Albenie latelie releaſed out of captiuitie, John Marſhall, William de Cantlow, and William his ſonne, Fouks de Brent, Thomas Baſſet, Robert de Veipount, Brian de Liſle, Geffrey de Lucie, Philip de Albenie, with manie other chateleins and conſtables of ſundrie caſtels.

The legat accurſeth Lewes & his complices.

The legat being there preſent alſo on the fridaie in the Whitſunwéeke aforeſaid, reueſted in a white albe, accompanied with the cleargie, accurſed in ſolemne wiſe Lewes the French kings ſonne, with all his fautours and complices, & eſpeciallie thoſe which held ſiege before the caſtell of Lincolne, with all the citie: and the more to incourage all thoſe that ſhould paſſe foorth in this armie, to raiſe the ſiege, he granted to them frée remiſſion of all their ſins, whereof they were trulie confeſſed, and by authoritie which he had from almightie GOD, and the apoſtolike ſée, he promiſed to them the guerdon of euerlaſting ſaluation. Herewith when the armie had receiued abſolution, and the legats bleſſing, euerie man marched foorth in his order and place appointed, and comming to Stow, an eight miles from Lincolne, they lodged there all night.

In the morning they paſſed foorth towards Lincolne, vnder the conduct of the ſaid earle of Penbroke as generall of the whole armie, who being come thither, compaſſed about the citie with his armie. And to cauſe the enimie the ſoner to leaue the ſiege of the caſtell, he aſſaulted the gates of the citie, inforcing his power to beare downe and breake them open. The Frenchmen perceiuing all the danger to be about the gates, withdrew a little from the aſſailing of the caſtell, and reſorting to the walles of the citie, did their beſt with ſhooting and caſting of ſtones and other things, to driue their aduerſaries from the gates.

Fouks de Brent.

Thus whiles they were occupied on both parts, Fouks de Brent entered into the caſtell by a poſterne gate on the backeſide, and a great number of ſouldiers with him, and ruſhing into the citie out of the caſtell, he began a fierce battell with the citizens within the citie: which when the Frenchmen perceiued, by the noiſe and crie raiſed at their backs, they ran to the place where the ſkirmiſh was, dooing their beſt to beat backe the aforeſaid Foukes de Brent with his companie. But in the meane time the Engliſhmen, vnder the leading of Sauerie de Mauleon, a Poictouin (of whom you haue heard in the life of king John) brake open the gates and entred the citie. Then the fight was ſore increaſed and mainteined for a time with great furie: ſo that it was hard to iudge who ſhould haue the better. But at length the Frenchmen and thoſe Engliſh lords that were with them, being ſore laid at on ech ſide, began to retire towards the gates, and finallie to turne their backs and ſo fled awaie: but being beſet round about with the kings horſſemen, they were ſtreightwaies either ſlaine or taken for the moſt part of them.

The Frenchmen put to flight at Lincolne.

The earle of Perch ſlaine.

Amongſt other that were there ſlaine, the earle of Perch a Frenchman was one, who being gotten into a churchyard manfullie defended himſelfe till his horſſe was killed vnder him, and laſtlie himſelfe was alſo beaten downe and ſlaine. There were taken of Engliſhmen, Saer de Quincie erle of Wincheſter, and Humfrey de Bohun earle of Hereford, Gilbert de Gaunt earle of Lincolne by the gift of Lewes, Richard de Montfichet, William de Mowbraie, William de Beauchampe, William de Manduit, Oliuer de Harecourt, Roger de Creſſie, William de Coleuill, William de Roos, William de Ropeley, Ralfe Chanduit, and diuerſe other: ſo that of knights there were taken to the number of foure hundred, beſide ſuch multitude of demilances, and other horſſemen and footmen, as could not well be numbered. Moreouer, all the prouiſion, truſſe, and baggage loden in carts, clothſackes, and males belonging to the barons and Frenchmen was taken, and the citie was ſpoiled, rifled and ſacked.

Lewes his faire.

This enterpriſe and diſcomfiture at Lincolne, which was in deriſion called Lewes his faire, chanced the 14 kalends of June, being ſaturdaie in the Whitſunwéeke. Manie honeſt matrons of the towne were drowned, as they were got into boates to auoid the danger of their perſons, wanting ſkill how to guide the ſame boates. The earle of Penbroke the ſame daie before he receiued any repaſt, rode backe in poſt to the king, whom he had left at Stow, and there declared the ioifull newes of his good ſpeed, in vanquiſhing of the enimies. On the next morrow, newes came to the king, that they which had kept the caſtell of Mountſorell were fled out of the ſame, and had left it void. Whervpon immediatlie he ſent in commandement vnto the ſhiriffe of Notinghamſhire, that going thither in his owne perſon, he ſhould ruinat the ſaid caſtell, & make it plaine with the ground.

The k. commandeth ỹ caſtell of Mountſorell to be raced.

The Frenchmen which eſcaped with life from the ſlaughter of Lincolne, as the Marſhall of France, the chateleine of Arras, with others, made towards London with all poſſible ſpeed, in hope to eſcape ſo well as they might: but manie of them, and namelie the footmen were ſlaine by the countrie people where they paſſed, and that in great numbers: for the huſbandmen fell vpon them with clubs and ſwords, not ſparing thoſe whom they got at aduantage. Two hundred knights or men of armes (as we may call them) getting to London, preſented vnto Lewes the ſorowfull report of their miſaduenture, and were of him not moaned, but blamed and ſore rebuked, for that they had fled, and ſhamefullie left the reſidue of their companies to be diſtreſſed, taken, and ſlaine by the aduerſaries, where if they had manfullie ſtood to it, they might happilie haue ſaued their fellowes, and obteined victorie.

Chr. Dunſt.

¶ The chronicle of Dunſtable ſheweth in déed that Simon de Peſchie and Henrie Braibroc, perceiuing that Fouks de Brent was entered into the citie, and that they were now aſſailed both afront, and on the backes, they withdrew, and getting togither 80 French knights or men of armes (if we ſhall ſo call them) departed out of the citie, and fléeing through the countrie by Lin and ſaint Edmundſburie, at length got through to London. How ſoeuer they were welcomed of Lewes, certeine it is, that the lords that tooke part with king Henrie, were put in no ſmall hope by the atchiuing of this ſo great a victorie, to bring within a ſhort time all the realme to the obedience of king Henrie: and herevpon marching foorth into the countrie, put the people in ſuch feare, that they ſubmitted themſelues vnto the gouernment of king Henrie in all places where ſoeuer they came.

On the other part, Lewes who all this ſeaſon remained at London, being ſore diſmaied for the loſſe of his people, began to feare euerie daie more and more, leaſt by ſome practiſe he ſhould be betraied and deliuered into his enimies hands. Therefore he went about to make himſelfe as ſtrong as was poſſible, & fortifieng the citie, ſent meſſengers into France, to require his father to ſend him more aid. His father ſorie to heare of his ſons diſtreſſe, and loth that he ſhould take the foile, cauſed his daughter the wife of Lewes, to prepare a power of men, that the ſame might paſſe with all ſpeed ouer into England to the aid of hir husband. For the French king himſelfe would not ſeeme to aid his ſonne, bicauſe he was excommunicated: but his daughter in law, hauing licence and commiſſion thereto, gat togither three hundred knights, or men of armes, whome with a great number of other ſouldiers and armed men, ſhe ſent downe to Caleis, where Euſtace the monke had prouided a nauie of ſhips to conueie them ouer into England. But how they ſped you ſhall heare anon.

An armie prepared in Fráce to come to the ſuccour of Lewes.

Polydor.

In the meane time the earle of Penbroke approched towards London, purpoſing to aſſaile the citie now in this opportunitie of time, letting paſſe no occaſion that might further his proceedings, night and day ſtudieng how to recouer the realme wholie out of the Frenchmens hands, and to ſet the ſame at libertie: ſo that what was to be deuiſed, he did deuiſe, and what was to be doone, that he did, not forſlowing anie occaſion or opportunitie that might be offered. The Engliſh barons alſo calling to mind the benefit which they had receiued at the Frenchmens hands in time of their moſt need, ſought now by all means poſſible, ſome waie how to procure a peace betwixt king Henrie and the ſaid Lewes, thinking by that means to benefit themſelues, and to gratifie him in lieu of his former courteſie bountifullie ſhewed in a caſe of extremitie, which bicauſe it was obteined in a wiſhed time was the more acceptable, whereas being lingered it had beene the leſſe welcome, as one ſaith,

Herevpon they cauſed dailie new articles of agreement to be preſented in writing vnto the ſaid Lewes, as from king Henrie. But while theſe things were a dooing, the earle of Penbroke and other the lords that tooke part with king Henrie, hauing aduertiſement, that a new ſupplie of men was readie to come and aid Lewes, they appointed Philip de Albenie and Iohn Marſhall to aſſociat with them the power of the cinque ports, and to watch for the comming of the aduerſaries, that they might keepe them from landing, who on ſaint Bartholomews day ſet forth frõ Caleis, in purpoſe to arriue in the Thames, and ſo to come vp the riuer to London. Howbeit Hubert de Burgh capteine of the caſtell of Douer, togither with the ſaid Philip de Albenie and Iohn Marſhall, with other ſuch power as they could get togither of the cinque ports, hauing not yet aboue the number of 40 ſhips great & ſmall, vpon the diſcouering of the French fleet, which conſiſted of 80 great ſhips, beſides other leſſer veſſels well appointed and trimmed, made forth to the ſea. And firſt coaſting aloofe from them, till they had got the wind on their backs, came finallie with their maine force to aſſaile the Frenchmen, and with helpe of their croſſebowes and archers at the firſt ioining, made great ſlaughter of their enimies, and ſo grapling togither, in the end the Engliſhmen bare themſelues ſo manfullie, that they vanquiſhed the whole French fleet, and obteined a famous victorie.

Euſtace the monke was found amongſt the capteins, who although he offered great ſummes of gold for his ranſome, ſo that he might haue had his life ſaued, and alſo to ſerue king Henrie, yet the Engliſh capteins would none of that: but Richard the baſtard ſonne of king Iohn, tooke him, and cut off his head, and ſent it vnto king Henrie his brother, as a witneſſe of this their atchieued victorie. This Euſtace was a Fleming borne, and ſomtime a monke, but renouncing his cowle to receiue ſuch heritage as fell to him by the death of his brethren, deceaſſing without iſſue, he became a notable pirat, and had doone in his daies much miſcheefe to the Engliſhmen, and therefore was now rewarded according to his demerits. The ſpoile and prey of the French ſhips was verie rich, ſo that the Engliſhmen being loden with riches and honour, vpon their ſafe returne home were receiued with great ioy and gladneſſe. But Lewes, after he vnderſtood of this miſchance happening to his people that came to his aid, began not a litle to deſpaire of all other ſuccour to come vnto him at any time heereafter: wherfore he inclined the ſooner vnto peace, ſo that at length he tooke ſuch offers of agreement as were put vnto him, and receiued furthermore a ſum of monie for the releaſe of ſuch hoſtages as he had in his hands, togither with the title of the kingdome of England, and the poſſeſſion of all ſuch caſtels and holds as he held within the realme. ¶ The French chronicle (to the which the chronicle of Dunſtable and Matthew Paris doo alſo agree) affirmeth that he receiued fifteene thouſand marks. Moreouer, the popes legat abſolued Lewes and all thoſe that had taken his part in the offenſe of diſobedience ſhewed in attempting the warre againſt the popes commandement.

Math. Paris.

Then Lewes with all his complices that had bin excommunicated ſware vpon the holie euangeliſt, that they ſhould ſtand to the iudgement of holie church, and from thenceforth be faithfull vnto the pope and to the church of Rome. Moreouer, that he with his people ſhould incontinentlie depart out of the realme, and neuer vpon euill intent returne againe. And that ſo farre as in him laie, he ſhould procure his father king Philip, to make reſtitution vnto king Henrie of all the right which he had in the parts beyond the ſea: and that when he ſhould be king of France, he ſhould reſigne the ſame in moſt quiet manner.

On the other part, king Henrie tooke his oth togither with the legat, and the earle of Penbroke gouernour of the realme, that he ſhould reſtore vnto the barons of his realme, and to other his ſubiects, all their rights and heritages, with all the liberties before demanded, for the which the diſcord was moued betwixt the late king Iohn and his barons. Moreouer, all priſoners on both parts were releaſed and ſet at libertie, without paieng anie ranſome: yea and thoſe which had couenanted to paie, and vpon the ſame were ſet at libertie before the concluſion of this peace, were now diſcharged of all ſummes of monie which then remained vnpaid.

This peace was concluded on the eleuenth day of September, not farre from Stanes, hard by the riuer of Thames, where Lewes himſelfe, the legat Guallo, and diuerſe of the ſpiritualtie with the earle of Penbroke lord gouernor of the realme, and others, did meet and talke about this accord. Now when all things were ordered and finiſhed agreeable to the articles and couenants of the peace, ſo farre as the time preſent required, the lords of the realme (when Lewes ſhould depart homeward) attended him to Douer in honorable wiſe, as aperteined, and there tooke leaue of him, and ſo he departed out of the realme about the feaſt of ſaint Michaell.

King Henrie by this meanes being put in full poſſeſſion of the relme, according to the preſcript of that article conteined in thoſe conditions of the peace latelie ſpecified, pardoned all thoſe that had aided his aduerſarie Lewes during the wars, except certeine of the ſpiritualtie, which were put to ſuch fines, that they were compelled to laie all that they had to pledge, to leuie ſuch ſummes of monie, as they might with the ſame obteine the kings fauour againe: and beſide that, to ſue to Rome for their entier abſolution at at the popes owne hands. Amongſt other, Hugh biſhop of Lincolne returning into England, was compelled to paie a thouſand marks to the popes vſe for recouerie of his biſhoprike, & an hundred marks alſo to the legat of good and lawfull monie. Such cheuance made the legat amongſt them of the church, as well perſons ſecular as regular, that he got togither twelue thouſand marks towards his charges, whereby it appeared, that he loſt no time in England. But to proceed.

The realme now being quiet and in all outward felicitie, a number of vnrulie perſons, ſuch as delighting in idleneſſe, knew not how to liue in time of peace, aſſembled themſelues togither and (appointing Fouks de Breut, who was a man of great ſtomach and more raſhneſſe, to be their capteine and ringleder) began to make warre againſt the king, and to ſpoile the townes and countries about them, ſo that their euill dooings might haue cauſed no ſmall perill to haue inſued by ſome great ciuill ſedition, if the earle of Penbroke had not in time preuented their attempts. For he aſſembling the kings power, haſted towards the rebels, and what by his owne authoritie, and by the reuerend regard of ſome biſhops in his companie; more than by vſing any force of armes, he ſtaid the matter for that time, ſo that no further miſcheefe followed of this mutinie.

Beſides the foreſaid Fouks de Breut, there were other of the Nobilitie alſo which practiſed the like diſorder, as William earle of Albemarle, Robert de Veipount, Brian de Liſle, Hugh de Balioll, Philip de Marc, and Robert de Gaugi, the which Robert withheld the caſtell of Newarke that belonged to the biſhop of Lincolne, and would not deliuer it, till the king with William Marſhall erle of Penbroke had laine at ſiege before it an eight daies, in the end of which terme by mediation of freends the matter was taken vp, and the biſhop recouered his caſtell, paieng to the ſaid Robert de Gaugi an hundred pounds ſterling for the victuals which he left within the ſame caſtell.

Soone after this, Ranulph earle of Cheſter was ſent into the holie land by king Henrie, with a goodlie companie of ſouldiers and men of warre, to aid the chriſtians there againſt the infidels, which at the ſame time had beſieged the citie of Damieta in Aegypt, in which enterpriſe the valiancie of the ſame earle after his comming thither, was to his great praiſe moſt apparant. There went with him in that iournie Saer de Quincie earle of Wincheſter, William de Albenie earle of Arundell, beſides diuerſe barons, as the lord Robert Fitz Walter, Iohn conſtable of Cheſter, William de Harecourt, and Oliuer Fitzroie ſonne to the king of England, and diuerſe other.

The next yeare, which was after the birth of our lord 1219, William Marſhall the foreſaid earle of Penbroke died, gouernour both of the realme and alſo of the kings perſon, a man of ſuch worthineſſe both in ſtoutneſſe of ſtomach and martiall knowledge, as England had few then liuing that might be compared with him. He was buried in the new temple church at London vpon the Aſcenſion day. The ſame yeare alſo Wallo or Gualo the legat returned to Rome, and Pandulph, who (as before is expreſſed) did the meſſage ſo ſtoutlie from pope Innocent to king Iohn, was alſo made biſhop of Norwich.

Moreouer, the gouernement of king Henrie after the death of William Marſhall the elder, earle of Penbroke, was committed vnto Peter biſhop of Wincheſter: for the yong king was almoſt deſtitute of any of his kindred that were worthie to haue the rule of him: foraſmuch as his mother queene Iſabell was latelie maried to Hugh Brune the earle of Marſh in France, vnto whome ſhe was promiſed before king Iohn tooke hir to wife, as in the life of the ſame king Iohn is mentioned.

The biſhop of Wincheſter being now in the poſſeſſion of the kings perſon, doubting leaſt he had taken a greater charge vpon him than he might well anſwer, cauſed diuerſe ſage and honourable perſonages to be admitted of the kings councell, to aſſiſt him in the adminiſtration of the common-wealth and good gouernance of the realme. Which being doone, a parlement was holden at London, wherein a ſubſidie was granted to the king of two ſhillings to be gathered and leuied of euerie ploughland within his dominions, towards the relieuing of the great charges which he had ſuſteined by the warres againſt the foreſaid Lewes.

About the ſame time alſo he began the building of the new worke of the church at Weſtminſter. In which meane time the citie of Damieta afore mentioned, was woone by the chriſtian princes, and Ranulph earle of Cheſter returned home, leauing the earle of Arundell with a great number of ſouldiors behind him there in aid of the chriſtians againſt the Saracens, which dailie attempted the recouerie of the ſame. Moreouer, in the yeare inſuing, which was of our lord 1220, and vpon the ſeauenteenth day of Maie being Whitſunday, the king was eftſoones ſolemnelie crowned at Weſtminſter, to the end it might be ſaid, that now after the extinguiſhment of all ſeditious factions, he was crowned by the generall conſent of all the eſtates and ſubiects of his realme.

The ſame yeare alſo was the bodie of Thomas archbiſhop of Canturburie tranſlated, and Hugh biſhop of Lincolne canonized for a ſaint. In like manner in the vigile of Peter and Paule, the king finding the caſtels of Rokingham and Sauueie at that preſent vnpurueied of victuals, tooke the ſame into his hands againſt the will of William of Albemarle which before held the ſame. ¶ This yeare alſo was a proclamation made in London, and throughout all the realme, that all ſtrangers ſhould auoid the land before the feaſt of ſaint Michaell then next following except thoſe that came with merchandize. Furthermore Ranulph earle of Cheſter, after he was come from the holie land, began to build the caſtels of Chartleie and Beeſton, and afterward he alſo builded the abbeie of Dieu Lencreſſe, commonlie called Delacreſſe of the white order. Toward his charges ſuſteined about the building of which caſtels and abbeie, he tooke toll throughout all his lordſhips of all ſuch perſons as paſſed by the ſame with any cattell, chaffre or merchandize.

This yeare deceaſſed Henrie de Boun earle of Hereford, and Saer de Quincie earle of Wincheſter in their iournie which they made into the holie land. Alſo the ſame yeare the preeſts or canons that inhabited within the kings caſtell of old Saliſburie, remoued with the biſhops ſee vnto new Saliſburie, which by the king was made a citie. The biſhop Richard procured this remouing, through the kings helpe, who was verie willing thervnto, as it ſeemed by his charters largelie granted in that behalfe. After this, king Henrie held his Chriſtmaſſe at Oxenford, at what time William de Fortz earle of Albemarle meaning to trouble the kings peace, and to ſet things in a new broile, departed from the court in the night ſeaſon, without leaue or licence, and haſted with all ſpeed vnto the caſtell of Biham, where he aſſembled a ſort of youthfull perſons, giuen to lewd demeanor, and wearie of quietneſſe (as to whome theft and robberies were verie pleſant) by whoſe helpe he ſpoiled diuers townes and villages about him, as Tenham and Deping, with others.

In the meane time the countrie people withdrew to the churches, and gat their goods into the churchyards. Moreouer, the peeres of the realme aſſembled themſelues in councell at Weſtminſter where the king was preſent, whither the earle of Albermarle was ſummoned to come, who faining as though he had meant to haue gone thitherward directlie, turned ſuddenlie his waie to the caſtell of Fodringhey, and tooke it vpon the ſudden, furniſhing it alſo with a garriſon of ſouldiers, to be kept hereafter to his owne vſe. That caſtell was in the keeping of the earle of Cheſter, who at that inſtant had but few ſouldiers there in garriſon, wherby it was the ſooner ſurpriſed. When theſe newes were brought to the king, he raiſed a power and came with all ſpeed to the caſtell of Biham, vpon the wedneſdaie next after the feaſt of Candelmaſſe, and then compaſſing the ſame about with a ſtrong ſiege, he conſtreined them within by force of ſuch engins as they vſed in thoſe daies, that finallie on the eight daie of Februarie they came forth, and ſubmitted themſelues and all that they had vnto the kings pleaſure. In the meane while alſo came the earle of Albemarle, who by the helpe ⁊ means of the archbiſhop of Yorke, and the legat Pandulph, purchaſed peace at the kings hands, the rather indeed bicauſe he had faithfullie ſerued both the king and his father king Iohn in their wars, before that time. All thoſe men of armes ⁊ ſouldiers alſo, which had ſubmitted themſelues and remained as priſoners, were pardoned. Which ouer-great clemencie cauſed other vnrulie perſons to attempt the like offenſe of rebellion ſhortlie after. At the very ſelfe ſame time the Welſhmen began to ſturre, and vnder their prince and leader Leolin they entered vpon the Engliſh marches, and with great crueltie ſpoiled and robbed the ſame, wherevpon it was determined by the councell, that the king (as he was comming toward the caſtell of Biham) ſhould diuide his armie, and ſo he did, ſending one part thereof againſt the Welſhmen: wherevpon Leolin, after he vnderſtood that the kings power came toward him, as one not able to reſiſt the ſame, caſt off his armour, and ſubmitted himſelfe to his mercie.

The king contented with his requeſt, came with a puiſſant armie into thoſe parts, and therewith the ſiege was raiſed, for the Welſhmen (according to their accuſtomed maner) fled. The king then entring further into the countrie, came to the place where Mountgomerie now ſtandeth, and perceiuing the ſite of the ſame to ſerue well for fortification, he cauſed a caſtell to be builded there, to reſtreine the Welſhmen from their accuſtomed trade of harrieng the countrie. A general thunder,

As this broile vexed the citie of London, ſo in this yeare there chanced great tempeſt of thunder, lightning and raine, whereby much hurt was doone in diuerſe parts of the realme, and at ſundrie times, as by throwing downe of ſteeples, churches, and other buildings, with the rootwalting of trees, as well in woods as orchards, verie ſtrange to conſider, cheefelie on the eight day of Februarie at Grantham in Lincolneſhire, where there chanced (beſide the thunder) ſuch a ſtinke and filthie ſauour to follow in the church, that the people fled out, for that they were not able to abide it. Likewiſe in the day of the exaltation of the croſſe, a generall thunder happened throughout the realme, and therupon followed a continuall ſeaſon of foule weather and wet, till Candelmas next after, which cauſed a dearth of corne, ſo as wheat was ſold at twelue ſhillings the quarter. Likewiſe on the day of ſaint Andrew an other terrible tempeſt of thunder happened through the realme, throwing downe and ſhaking buildings in manie places, in ſo much that at Pillerdeſton in Warwikeſhire, in a knights houſe, the ladie thereof and ſix other perſons were deſtroied by the ſame. And a turbarie thereby compaſſed about with water and marreſſe was ſo dried vp, that neither graſſe nor mire remained, after which inſued an earthquake. Moreouer on the euen of ſaint Lucie, a mightie wind raged, which did much hurt in ſundrie places of the realme. Furthermore, about this time there appeared in England a woonderfull comet or blaſing ſtarre. The ſea alſo roſe with higher tides and ſprings than it had beene accuſtomed to doo. All which woonders were afterward iudged to betoken and ſignifie the loſſe which the chriſtians ſuſteined the ſame yeare in Aegypt, when they were conſtreined to ſurrender the citie of Damieta into the Saracens hands, which latelie before (as yee haue heard) they had woone with long and chargeable ſiege. After the yeelding vp of Damieta, William de Albenie earle of Arundell (whome Ranulfe earle of Cheſter left behind him in the holie land) with manie ſouldiers and men of warre (when he returned from thence) came now homewards towards England, and died by the waie.

The earle of Penbroke recouereth his caſtels taken by the prince of wales.

The ſame yeare, whiles William Marſhall earle of Penbroke was buſie in Ireland in war againſt Hugh Lacie, Leolin prince (or king) of Wales, as ſome haue intitled him, tooke by force two caſtels that belonged to the ſame earle: whereof when he was aduertiſed, with all ſpéed he returned out of Ireland, raiſed an armie, and recouered the ſaid caſtels, putting to death all ſuch as he found in the ſame, to requite Leolin with the like damage as he had ſhewed him before in his abſence. This doone he entered into the land of Leolin, waſting and ſpoiling the ſame, whereof when the ſaid Leolin was informed, he aſſembled an hoſt of Welſhmen, and comming into the field gaue battell, but the victorie reſted on the earle of Penbroks ſide: ſo that there were taken and ſlaine in this bickering to the number of 9000 Welſhmen. There was in this yeare a conſpiracie alſo begun by the earle of Cheſter, and other Noble men, againſt Hubert de Burgh lord chiefe iuſtice of England, by whoſe counſell (as it was thought) the king was more ſtreict towards the nobilitie and other his ſubiects, in ſtaieng his grant to confirme the charter of liberties, than otherwiſe he would haue béene, if the ſame Hubert and other had not aduiſed him to the contrarie.

Matt. Paris. The king of Ieruſalem commeth into England.

In this ſeaſon alſo Iohn de Bren king of Ieruſalem, and the lord great maiſter of the knights hoſpitallers came into England, where they were honorablie receiued of king Henrie, and liberally rewarded. The cauſe of their comming was to require aid of the king for the recouerie of the holie land out of the poſſeſſion of the Saracens. In like maner about the ſame time Leolin prince of Northwals, with certeine Engliſh lords, as Hugh Lacie and others, vpon an hatred which they bare towards king Henrie for his fathers ſake, ſuppoſing that ſo euill a ſtocke as they tooke him to be, could not bring foorth anie good branch, ſought by open warres to bring William Marſhall earle of Penbroke and other barons that were faithfull friends to the king vnto their purpoſe: but the whole countrie riſing againſt them, they were diſappointed to their owne confuſion, and ſo they could neuer bring that to paſſe which they ſo earneſtlie intended.

The death of the French king. Ambaſſadors ſent into France.

In this yeare Philip the French king departed this life, and after him ſucceeded Lewes his ſonne, vnto whom king Henrie ſent in ambaſſage the archbiſhop of Canturburie with thrée other biſhops, to require, that (according to his oth made and receiued at his returne out of England) he would reſtore and deliuer vp to him the dukedome of Normandie, with other ſuch lands and poſſeſſions as his father in times paſt had taken from king Iohn, and ſtill did wrongfullie withhold. K. Lewes anſwered hereunto, that he held Normandie & the other lands by good right and iuſt title, as he could well proue and iuſtifie, if king Henrie would come to the parlement in France to heare it. And as touching the oth which he had ſworne in England, he affirmed that the ſame was firſt broken by king Henrie, both in that his men which had béene taken at Lincolne were put to gréeuous ranſoms, and alſo for that their liberties for which the warre firſt began, were not obſerued, but denied to the Engliſh ſubiects, contrarie to that which was concluded at the agréement betwixt them at the ſame time made.

Moreouer, king Henrie ſent other ambaſſadours to Rome, who purchaſed a bull of the pope, wherby he was adiudged to be of age ſufficient to receiue the gouernement of the kingdome of England into his owne hands, thereby to order and diſpoſe all things at his pleaſure, & by the aduiſe of ſuch councellours as he ſhould elect and chooſe to be about him. Wherevpon after the ſaid ambaſſadours were returned, all thoſe earles, barons and nobles, which held anie caſtels, honors, manors or places apperteining to the king, were commanded to deliuer and reſigne the ſame to his vſe, which cauſed much trouble, as after ſhall appeare. For diuerſe Noble men, whoſe harts were filled with couetouſneſſe, would not obeie the popes order herein, but ſore repined; yet not ſo much againſt the king as againſt the lord Hubert de Burgh, by whoſe councell the king was moſt led and ruled. And therefore they did put him in all the blame, as one that ſhould ſet the king againſt them, and ſtaie him from ſuffering them to inioy thoſe liberties, which they from time to time ſo much laboured to haue had to them granted and confirmed.

Anno Reg. 8.

Polydor. The king giueth a gentle anſwer to his lords.

Vpon this occaſion therfore, they ſued to the king for the reſtitution of the ancient lawes according to his promiſe, who to pacifie them for the time, gaue them a gentle anſwer, aſſuring them, that he would performe all that he had promiſed, ſo ſoone as opportunitie would permit and ſuffer him ſo to doo. Howbeit, afterwards by the aduiſe of certeine old councellours, which had béene of the priuie councell with king Iohn his father, he found a ſhift to diſappoint them of their demands, by requiring them on the other ſide, to reſtore vnto him thoſe things which they had in times paſt receiued of his anceſtors. Furthermore, bicauſe he would the more eaſilie obteine his purpoſe, and make the reſidue afraid to follow a ſuit ſo diſpleaſant and irkeſome, he thought beſt to begin with the chiefe authors and firſt procurers of the ſaid petitions, and to take from them whatſoeuer they held belonging to his crowne.

The king demanded reſtitution of parcels of inheritance belonging to the crowne.

Herevpon therefore aſſembling a great power about him, he demanded of Ranulph earle of Cheſter the reſtitution of certeine lordſhips which ancientlie apperteined to the crowne of the realme, which earle not being as then able to reſiſt, readilie obeied the kings pleaſure, and reſigned them all. By this entrance of the king into the execution of his purpoſe, diuerſe of the reſt of the barons were brought into ſuch feare, that they were contented alſo to doo the like, ſo that by this meanes the lords being cut ſhort and weakened in power, ſurceaſed as then from moleſting the king anie further with the demand of other lands or liberties.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie alſo threatened them with the dart of excommunication, if they went about to diſquiet the realme with anie ciuill commotions, though no man was more deſirous to haue that matter go forward than he, as appéered by his diligent trauell therein (hoping as now in ſhort proceſſe of time, and that by courteous meanes, to perſuade the king to his purpoſe) but the king droue him off with faire words, and minded nothing leſſe than to alter anie one of the lawes which he knew to be profitable to himſelfe and his ſucceſſours after him. Wherevpon diuerſe miſliking his dealing herein, withdrew themſelues ſecretlie, ſome into one place, and ſome into an other, to the intent they might auoid the dailie ſight of ſuch abuſes, as they for the moſt part could not well abide to beare.

Diſcord betwixt Sauerie de Mauleon and the earle of Saliſburie.

Whileſt king Henrie thus politikelie prouided for his affaires at home, Sauerie de Mauleon made prouiſion in Guien to withſtand ſuch perils and dangers as he ſaw moſt likelie to inſue by the practiſes of the Frenchmen. But as he was moſt buſilie occupied about the purueiance of ſuch things as ſhould be verie neceſſarie for his doings, there ſprang a great diſſention betwixt him and William the earle of Saliſburie, who was ſent ouer into that countrie with commiſſion to ſuruei the ſtate thereof, and by colour of the ſame commiſſion, tooke vpon him to order all things at his owne pleaſure. Whereas the foreſaid Sauerie de Mauleon (being a man of high parentage in thoſe parts where he was borne) iudged it to be a matter nothing ſtanding with his honour, that another man ſhould order things at his will and commandement within the countrie, whereof he himſelfe had the chiefe charge, as the kings lieutenant; and therefore determined not to ſuffer it anie longer.

Herevpon verelie aroſe the contention betwixt them, which the Engliſh ſouldiers that were there, did greatlie increaſe, fauouring the earle as the kings vncle, and contemning the lieutenant as a ſtranger borne, by meanes whereof the foreſaid Sauerie doubting leaſt if he ſhould fight with his enimies, and through ſuch diſcord as was now amongſt them, be put to the worſe, the fault ſhould be laid wholie on his necke: he ſecretlie departed and fled to Lewes the French king, who was latelie come to the crowne of France by the death of his father king Philip, as you before haue heard: wherein he dealt wiſelie in reſpect of ſafetie. Matth. Paris. Matt. Weſtm. Fouks de Brent an enimie to reſt and quietneſſe.

About the ſame time Fouks de Brent, being a man of an vnquiet mind, readie to miſchiefe and loth to liue in peace (as ſome ſaie) conſpired againſt the king of England, and aduertiſed the king of France that if he would boldlie begin the warres againſt king Henrie in France, he would not faile but raiſe warre againſt him here in the middeſt of his realme of England, hauing diuerſe noble men in a readineſſe, that would willinglie take his part. But how ſoeuer it fell out, certeine it is that this Fouks hauing fortified his caſtell of Bedford, attempted manie enterpriſes greatlie to the preiudice of the kings peace, aſwell in robbing and ſpoiling the countrie about him, as otherwiſe.

And now fearing to be puniſhed therefore by order of law, he ſhewed his malice againſt ſuch as had the execution of the ſame lawes chieflie in their hands. Herevpon he tooke priſoner Henrie Braibroke, one of the kings iuſtices of his bench, and led him to his caſtell of Bedford, and there ſhut him vp cloſe as his lawfull priſoner. Indeed the ſaid Henrie de Braibroke, with Martine de Pateſhull, Thomas de Multon, and other of the kings iuſtices were come to keepe their circuit at Dunſtable. Where, vpon information giuen and preſented before them, Fouks de Brent was condemned to the king in great ſummes of monie. Therewithall this Fouks tooke ſuch indignation and diſpleaſure, that he commanded his men of warre which laie in the caſtell of Bedford, to ride vnto Dunſtable, and there to apprehend the ſaid iuſtices, and to bring them vnto Bedford, where (as he ſaid) he meant to commen further with them. But they hauing knowledge of his purpoſe, fled quicklie out of the towne, ſeeking to eſcape euerie man which waie he might beſt deuiſe. Howbeit, the ſouldiers vſed ſuch diligence, that Henrie de Braibroke fell into their hands, & ſo was brought captiue to Bedford as their maiſter had commanded them.

The king aduertiſed hereof by the greeuous complaints of his ſubiects, was as then at Northampton (where he had aſſembled his parlement) and therevpon hauing gathered ſpeedilie a power, with all expedition he haſted towards Bedford. At his comming thither, he beſieged the caſtell on ech ſide, and at length after two moneths, though not without much adoo, he wan it, and hanged them all which were taken within, being in number 80 or aboue: and amongſt other William de Brent, the brother of the ſaid Fouks was one. There were but three that eſcaped with life, who were pardoned, vpon condition they ſhould paſſe into the holie land, there to ſerue among the Templers. But now to leaue theſe things, and returne to the doings in France where we left. Ye ſhall vnderſtand, that after Sauerie de Mauleon was reuolted to the French king, the ſaid king with all ſpeed determined to make warre vpon king Henrie, and to win from him certeine townes and fortreſſes within the countrie of Poictou.

Dunſtable.

The French writers affirme, that king Lewes recouered out of the Engliſhmens hands the townes of Niort, S. Iohns d'Angeli, & Rochell, before Sauerie de Mauleon reuolted from the French part. Indeed, the chronicle of Dunſtable ſaith, that after the truce tooke end, this yeare the French king raiſed an armie, and tooke Niort, and after they of S. Iohn d'Angeli ſubmitted themſelues vnto him. From thence he went to Rochell, within the which at that preſent was the ſaid Sauerie de Mauleon with ſeuentie knights, and Richard Graie, with Geffrey Neuill, who had in their retinue ſixtie knights. Theſe with the forces of the towne ſallied forth, & encountring with the French armie, ſlue manie of their aduerſaries, uerſaries, and loſt ſome of their owne people. Yet after this, the French K. beſieged the towne, and in the end wan it, whileſt the king of England being occupied about the beſieging of Bedford caſtell, neglected to ſend them within Rochell neceſſarie ſuccours.

Poicto- ſend to Henrie.

But Polydor Virgil writeth, that now after that Sauerie de Mauleon was become the French kings man, the Poictouins ſent vnto king Henrie, ſignifieng, that they were readie to reuolt from the French kings ſubiection, and yeeld themſelues vnto him, if he would ſend vnto them a power of men to defend their countrie from the French men. Now king Henrie hauing receiued theſe letters, interteined them that brought this meſſage verie courteouſlie, and promiſing them to ſend ouer aid with all expedition, he cauſed his nauie to be made readie for that voiage. In the meane time, the French king ſent forth an armie vnder the leading of Sauerie de Mauleon, who then tooke Niort and Rochell, placing in the ſame ſundrie garriſons of ſouldiers, but cheefelie he fortified Rochell, which had beene long in the Engliſhmens hands, and alwaies ſerued them to verie good purpoſe, for the handſome landing of their people, when anie occaſion required. The French king therefore hauing got it, fortified it, and meant to keepe it, to the intent the Engliſhmen ſhould not haue hereafter in time of warre, ſo neceſſarie a place for their arriuall in thoſe coaſts.

Math.Paris. Anno Reg.9. A parlement. 1225

King Henrie holding his Chriſtmaſſe at Weſtminſter, called his high court of parlement there the ſame time, and demanded a releefe of monie, toward the maintenance of his warres in France, and had granted to him the fifteenth penie in value of all the mooueable goods to be found within the realme, as well belonging to the ſpiritualtie as temporaltie, but vnder condition that he ſhould confirme vnto his ſubiects their often demanded liberties. The king vpon deſire to haue the monie, was contented to condeſcend vnto their requeſts, and ſo the two charters were made, and by the king confirmed, the one intituled Magna Charta, & the other Charta de Foreſta. Thus at this parlement were made and confirmed theſe good lawes and laudable ordinances, which haue beene from time to time by the kings and princes of this realme confirmed, ſo that a great part of the law now in vſe dependeth of the ſame. The ſame charters alſo were directed and ſent forth into euerie countie within the realme to be proclamed.

A fifteenth granted to the king.

Magna Charta and Charta de Forreſta confirmed.

It was moreouer decreed, that at a certeine daie after Eaſter, there ſhould be an inquiſition taken by the inqueſt of a ſubſtantiall iurie, for the ſeuering of foreſts, the new from the old, ſo as all thoſe grounds which had beene made foreſts, ſince the daies of king Henrie the grandfather of this Henrie the third, ſhould be diſforeſted. And thervpon after Eaſter, Hugh de Neuill, and Brian de Liſle, were ſent forth as commiſſioners, to take that inquiſition. By force thereof, manie woods were aſſerted and improued to arable land by the owners, and ſo not onelie men, but alſo dogs, which for ſafegard of the game were accuſtomed to loſe their clawes, had good cauſe to reioiſe for theſe confirmed liberties.

Foreſts.

In the meane time, and about the feaſt of the purification, king Henrie (hauing iuſt occaſion to purſue the warre, for recouerie of thoſe townes taken, as before you haue heard by the Frenchmen) ſent ouer his brother Richard, whom he had made earle of Cornewall and Poictow, with a mightie nauie of ſhips vnto Gaſcoigne. This earle, hauing in his companie the earle of Saliſburie, Philip de Albenie, and others, with proſperous wind and weather arriued at Burdeaux with foure hundred ſailes, and there landing his men, went ſtreight vnto the towne of ſaint Machaire, ſituated vpon the banke of Garon, where, vpon his firſt comming, he gat the caſtell, and ſacked the towne, and then paſſing further, wan diuerſe other townes, as Longuile, Bergerat, and other, and after went with great diligence to beſiege and recouer Rochell, or rather Rioll. The French king aduertiſed of the earls arriuall, and of theſe his atchiued enterpriſes, ſent forth by and by the earle of Champaigne with a mightie armie into Guien to aid his people there.

After this, the earle of Champaigne keeping his men within their trenches and campe, without attempting anie other exploit, the earle of Cornewall thought it ſufficient, if he might keepe the Gaſcoignes in obedience, which had alreadie practiſed a rebellion, by ſending letters and meſſengers for the ſame intent vnto the French king, and therefore breaking vp his ſiege before the Rioll, he ſtaied a while from exploiting any further enterpriſe. About the ſame time, the earle of Saliſburie returning homwards out of Gaſcoigne, was ſo toſſed and turmoiled on the ſeas by tempeſts of weather, that he fell ſicke therof, and within a few daies after his arriuall died.

¶ This yeare alſo, there came forth a decree from the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and his ſuffragans, that the concubines of preeſts and clearkes within orders (for ſo were their wiues then called in contempt of their wedlocke) ſhould be denied of chriſtian buriall, except they repented whileſt they were aliue in perfect health, or elſe ſhewed manifeſt tokens of repentance at the time of their deaths. The ſame decree alſo prohibited them from the receiuing of the pax at maſſe time, & alſo of holie bread after maſſe, ſo long as the preeſts kept them in their houſes, or vſed their companie publikelie out of their houſes. Moreouer, that they ſhould not be purified when they ſhould be deliuered of child, as other good women were, vnleſſe they found ſufficient ſuertie to the archdeacon, or his officiall, to make ſatiſfaction at the next chapter or court to be holden, after they ſhould be purified. And the preeſts ſhould be ſuſpended, which did not preſent all ſuch their concubines as were reſiant within their pariſhes. Alſo, all ſuch women as were conuict to haue dealt carnallie with a preeſt, were appointed by the ſame decree to doo open penance. Where the queſtion may be aſked, whether this decree was extended to preeſts wiues or no? Whereunto anſwer may be made, that as a quadrangle in geometrie compriſeth in it a triangle, and a quaternion in arithmetike conteineth a ternion; ſo in logike a vniuerſall propoſition comprehendeth a particular. But it is ſaid here, that all ſuch women as had carnall knowledge with a preeſt, were to be puniſhed, therefore ſome, and conſequentlie all preeſts wiues. But yet this ſeemeth not to be the meaning of that decree, for preeſts were allowed no wiues, naie Sericius the pope iudged that all ſuch of the cleargie as had wiues could not pleaſe God, bicauſe they were In carne, which words he and the reſidue of that litter reſtreined to marriage, admitting in no caſe that churchmen ſhould inioy the rights of matrimonie. Wherin they offer God great iniurie, in ſeeking to limit that large inſtitution of wedlocke, wherein all eſtates are intereſſed; and they ſeeme likewiſe to bridle nature, and to compell hir within certeine precincts, wherein they offer intollerable iniurie to all mankind, conſidering that

This yeare, or (as ſome ſaie) in the next, the king granted to the citizens of London frée warren, that is to ſaie, libertie to hunt within a certeine circuit about London, & that all weires in the Thames ſhould be plucked vp and deſtroied. Alſo in this tenth yeare of his reigne, king Henrie granted to the citizens of London, that they might haue and vſe a common ſeale. About the time of the making of which ordinances, Otho the cardinall of S. Nicholas in Carcere Tulliano came as legat from pope Honorius into England to king Henrie, preſenting him with letters from the pope. The tenour whereof when the king had well conſidered, he declared to the legat, that without the whole aſſent of the eſtates of his realme, he could doo little in that which the pope as then required.

Shortlie after by waie of proxie, the ſaid legat gathered a dutie which he claimed of the ſpiritualtie, that was of euerie conuentuall church within the realme two markes of ſiluer.

The king is ſicke.

In this yeare the king held his Chriſtmaſſe at Wincheſter, and after comming to Marlebridge, chanced there to fall ſicke, ſo that he laie in deſpaire of life for certeine daies togither. In the meane time alſo came the daie appointed for the parlement to begin at Weſtminſter, where the legat and other of the ſpiritualtie and temporaltie being aſſembled, the ſaid Otho ſhewed the popes letters, and according to the tenour and purport of the ſame, was earneſtlie in hand to haue the prieſts to grant the yearelie paiment of a certeine penſion or tribute to the pope, towards the maintenance of his eſtate, which they generallie denied. When he ſaw that this bait would not take, he onelie demanded a tenth part of all their ſpirituall liuings for maintenance of the wars againſt the Saracens, which was eaſilie granted, as more reaſonable than the firſt.

Matt. Weſtm. Matth. Paris. The cardinals requeſt.

¶ Here by diuerſe credible writers of good credit, it ſhould appeare, that the pope demanded to haue aſſigned vnto him out of euerie cathedrall church two prebends, one out of the portion belonging to the biſhop, & an other out of the portion belonging to the deane and chapiter: and likewiſe of the abbeies, where there were ſeuerall portions, that is to ſaie, ſo much of the conuent as belonged to the finding of one monke, and as much alſo of euerie abbats liuing as ſhould counteruaile the ſame. The cardinall vſed iollie perſuaſions to induce the prelats to aſſent to this grant, alledging that the church of Rome was run in great ſlander for taking of monie in diſpatch of ſuiters cauſes, which aroſe by meanes there was no maintenance of liuing ſufficient for the churchmen there: and therefore he added, how it was the parts of naturall children to releeue the neceſſitie of their louing mother, and that except the charitable deuotion of them and other good and well diſpoſed perſons were ſhortlie extended, they ſhould want neceſſarie maintenance for the ſuſtentation of their liues, which ſhuld be altogither an vnſéemelie thing for the dignitie of the Romane church.

The anſ of John archdeacon of Bedfor

The clergie reſorting togither to take aduiſe what anſwer they ſhould make, at length vpon their reſolute determination, John the archdeacon of Bedford was appointed to tell the tale for them all: who comming before the cardinall, declared boldlie vnto him, that the demand which he had proponed, touched the king eſpeciallie, and generallie all the nobilitie of the realme, which were patrons of anie churches. He added furthermore, how the archbiſhops and biſhops, and manie other of the prelats of England (ſithens the king by reaſon of his ſickeneſſe could not be there) were alſo abſent, ſo that they which were there preſent, being but as it were the inferiour part of the houſe, neither might nor ought to make anie reſolute anſwer as then in this matter. Immediatlie herewith alſo came the lord John Marſhall, and other meſſengers from the king vnto all the prelats that held anie baronies of the king, ſtreightlie commanding them, that they ſhould in no wiſe bind and indanger his laie fée vnto the church of Rome, whereby he might be depriued of his due and accuſtomed ſeruices, and ſo euerie man herevpon departed and went home.

A grant to the citizens of London.

This yeare, the plées of the crowne were pleaded in the tower of London. And on the ſixtéenth daie of March in this tenth yeare of his reigne, the king granted by his charter inſealed, that the citizens of London ſhould paſſe toll frée through all England, and if anie of them were conſtreined in anie citie, borough or towne within the realme, to paie toll, that then the ſhiriffes of London might attach anie man of the ſaid citie, borough or towne, where ſuch toll was exacted, being found within the liberties of London, and him reteine with his goods and cattels, till the citizens that paid ſuch toll were ſatiſfied, by reſtitution of the ſame, with all coſts and charges ſuſteined in the ſuit. Howbeit, about the ſame time, the king conſtreined the Londoners to giue vnto him the ſumme of fiue thouſand marks as a fine, for that they had aided and ſuccoured his aduerſarie Lewes againſt him, and lent to the ſaid Lewes at his departure out of the realme a like ſumme. But it may rather be thought they gaue vnto the king the ſaid fiue thouſand marks for his fauour ſhewed in granting vnto them the aboue mentioned fréedome and liberties. At the ſame time, he had alſo twelue hundred pounds of the burgeſſes of Northampton, beſides the fiftéenth, which not onelie they, but alſo the Londoners, and all other generallie through the realme, paid accordinglie as it was granted.

In Februarie, the king called a parlement at Oxford, in the which he made open declaration vnto all the aſſemblie, that he was now of lawfull age to gouerne of himſelfe, without anie to haue rule ouer him, and ſo whereas before he was gouerned firſt by the earle of Penbroke lord protectour, whileſt he liued, & after by the biſhop of Wincheſter and others, he now remooued them from him by the counſell of the lord chiefe iuſtice, taking the regiment wholie to himſelfe, & to ſuch as ſhould pleaſe him from thenceforth to appoint. Alſo in the ſame parlement, he did cancell and diſanull the two charters before mentioned, after that the ſame had béene vſed through the realme for the ſpace of two yeares, pretending them to be of no value, ſith they were ſealed and ſigned whileſt he was vnder age. This déed of the king was gréeuouſlie taken, and all the blame put in the lord chiefe iuſtice. Herewith all ſuch alſo as claimed anie manner charters of liberties, were appointed to remooue the ſame (a practiſe onelie to get monie) and to get them confirmed with the kings new ſeale, the old being made void and pronounced of none effect.

The king with an arm commeth to the ſuccour o them within the caſtell.

They within aduertiſed Hugh de Burgh, the lord chéefe iuſtice (to whome the caſtell belonged by the kings late gift) of the exploit and enterpriſe attempted by their enimies, with all poſſible haſt: wherevpon the king at requeſt of the ſaid Hubert leuied a power, and came to raiſe the ſiege. But the Welſhmen hearing of the kings approch, fled awaie like ſhéepe, ſo that comming to the caſtell, he found no reſiſtance: howbeit, for ſo much as he ſaw the foreſaid wood to be troubleſome and an annoiance to the ſaid caſtell, he willed it to be deſtroied. True it is, that the ſame wood was verie thicke and rough, and further it conteined alſo fiue leagues or fiftéene miles in length: yet by ſuch diligence as was vſed, the ſame was waſted, ſtocked vp, and quickelie rid out of the waie by fire and other means, ſo that the countrie was made plaine a great waie about.

The king beginneth to build a caſtel.

After this, the king departed forth into the Welſh confines, and comming to an abbeie of the white monks called Cride, cauſed it to be burnt, bicauſe it ſerued as a refuge for his enimies. Then by the aduiſe of the lord chiefe iuſtice Hubert de Burgh, he ſet in hand to build a caſtell there, bicauſe the place ſéemed verie fit for fortification. But after the king with his armie had laine there thrée months, through lacke of vittels (the Welſhmen ſtill cutting the Engliſhmen off as they went abroad to fetch in forrage and other prouiſion) he was conſtreined to fall to agréement with Leolin their prince, and receiuing of the ſaid prince the ſumme of thrée thouſand marks, he was contented that ſo much of the caſtell as was alreadie builded, ſhould be raced and made flat againe with the ground, before his departure from thence. Herevpon, manie men tooke occaſion to ieſt at the lord chiefe iuſtice and his doings about this caſtell, who at the beginning named it Huberts follie.

He is cōſtreined to agre with the Welſhmen.

Amongſt other alſo that were taken priſoners by the Welſhmen, whileſt the king thus vainelie ſpent his time about the building of that fort, William de Breuſe a right valiant man of warre was one, who being taken by Leolin prince of Wales, was by him cruellie put to death (as after ſhall appeare) for the which act, and other ſuch iniuries receiued at the ſame Leolins hands, king Henrie at length gréeuouſlie puniſhed him. ¶ For the moſt part of this ſummer ſeaſon, great thunders happened in England: the element alſo ſéemed as though it had burned with continuall flames: ſtéeples, churches, and other hie buildings were ſtriken with lightning, and the harueſt was ſore hindered by continuall raine. Alſo in the middeſt of the day there came a woonderfull darkeneſſe vpon the earth, that the brightneſſe of the aire ſéemed to be couered and taken awaie.

In the thirtéenth yeare of this king, Stephan the popes chapleine and his Nuncio came ouer vnto king Henrie, requiring to haue towards the maintenance of the popes warres againſt the emperour Frederike, a tenth part of all the moueable goods within the realmes & countries of England, Wales, and Ireland, as well of ſpirituall perſons as temporall. Wherevpon, a parlement or aſſemblie of the lords was called at Weſtminſter, on the ſecond ſundaie after Eaſter, which was the 29 of Aprill. At which parlement, when the popes buls were read, and the matter therein conteined plainelie opened and examined, to the end it might appeare vpon what neceſſarie cauſes the pope was conſtreined to purſue the ſaid wars, and to aſke reléefe of faithfull chriſtian people, being members of the holie church: the king, bicauſe he had by his procurators at Rome aforehand promiſed & bound himſelfe to ſuch paiment of tenths, ſate ſtill, and anſwered not to the contrarie

A parlement or a councell holden.

(whereas the hope of a great number was repoſed in him, that by his deniall the popes requeſt ſhuld haue béene fruſtrat) ſo that when by his ſilence he was adiudged to conſent, yet the temporall lords & laic men vtterlie denied to agrée vnto ſuch paiment, not willing in any wiſe to bind their baronies and temporall poſſeſſions vnto the church of Rome.

The temporall lords refuſe to aid the pope with monie.

Howbeit, the biſhops, abbats, priors, and other eccleſiaſticall perſons, after they had ſhewed themſelues to reſt doubtfull (not without great grudging and murmuring in the meane time, for the ſpace of thrée or foure daies togither) at length, for feare of excommunication, conſented to be contributorie, but in ſuch ſort, as they had eſcaped for a farre more reaſonable ſumme, if Stephan Segraue one of the kings councell had not by compact (as was thought) made with the Nuncio, wrought ſo in the matter, that the tenths were finallie granted, to the great impoueriſhment and ineſtimable damage of the church and realme of England. After this, the Nuncio ſhewed the procuratorie letters, whereby he was authoriſed to gather thoſe tenths, and that not after a common manner, but by a verie ſtraight and hard valuation.

Stephan de Segraue.

The tenths of the ſpiritualtie granted to the pope.

And for the more ſure waie of procéeding herein, he had letters of authoritie from the pope, to excommunicate all ſuch as ſhould withſtand him or his deputies in procéeding with thoſe affaires. He ſhewed himſelfe moreouer verie extreame in collecting of this monie, and namelie towards the prelats of the church, inſomuch that appointing him a certeine day in the which vnder paine of excommunication they ſhould make paiment, diuers for want of readie monie, were compelled to make ſhift with the chalices, and other veſſels and ornaments belonging to their churches, and other were glad to take vp monie vpon intereſt, and for that ſhift there were come ouer with the Nuncio diuerſe wicked vſurers vnder the name of merchants, which when they ſaw thoſe that ſtood in néed like to be excommunicate for want of readie monie, they would offer themſelues to lend vnto any that would borow, after the rate of one noble for the loane of twentie by the moneth, ſo bringing the néedie into their ſnares, to their irrecouerable loſſes and vndooing. Hereby the land was filled with bitter curſings (though in ſecret) by thoſe that wiſhed ſuch vnreaſonable exactors neuer to ſée good end of the vſe of that monie.

Vſurers.

Math. Paris.

From that day forward there wanted not in England certeine vſurers called Caurſini, which ſought nothing elſe but the wealth of ſuch perſons as they might get into their ſnares, namelie thoſe whome the church of Rome dooth vex and put to trouble with hir exactions and paiments. The earle of Cheſter onlie ſtood manfullie againſt the paiment of thoſe tenths, inſomuch that he would not ſuffer his lands to be brought vnder bondage, neither wold he permit the religious men and préeſts that held of his fée to pay the ſame, although the reſt of England, Wales, Ireland, and Scotland were compelled to be contributorie thereto, hauing onelie this comfort, that not they alone, but alſo other forren regions were driuen to doo the like. Thus did the locuſts of Rome from time to time ſucke the ſwéetneſſe of the land, and all to mainteine the pompe and pride of the ſame, wherein what other practiſes did they vſe, than as one truelie teſtifieth:

The earle of Cheſter wold not permit the tenths to be gathered within his land.

King Henrie prepareth to paſſe ouer into France.

But to let this paſſe: king Henrie purpoſing to ſaile ouer into Britaine and inuade France, came to Portſmouth about Michaelmaſſe, with ſuch an armie aſſembled out of England, Wales, Ireland, and Scotland, as the like for number of people had not béene knowne to haue paſſed ouer with any of his anceſters: howbeit when he ſhould come to the verie point of imbarking his people, with vittels, armor, and other prouiſion, there were not ſhips ſufficient to paſſe ouer the one halfe of the armie: wherefore when the king ſaw this default, he was ſore offended, but chéefelie with Hubert the earle of Kent, lord chéefe iuſtice, inſomuch that he openlie called him old traitor, and laid to his charge how he had thus vſed the matter of purpoſe, onelie to pleaſure the quéene of France, of whome (as he ſaid) he had receiued fiue thouſand marks to hinder his procéedings. In this heat if the earle of Cheſter and other had not béene at hand, he had ſuerlie ſlaine the chéefe iuſtice euen there with his drawne ſword, who was glad to auoid his preſence, till his angrie mood was ſomwhat ouerpaſſed.

In the meane time there arriued Henrie earle of Britaine on the ninth of October, which ſhould haue conducted the king into his countrie. But ſith winter was come vpon them, he aduiſed him to ſtay till the next ſpring, and ſo he did. Then euerie man was licenced to depart home, and the earle of Kent reconciled againe into fauour. The erle of Britaine in like maner did homage to the king for Britaine, and the king reſtored him to all his rights in England, and further giuing him fiue thouſand marks to defend his countrie againſt the enimies, ſent him home againe in moſt courteous and louing maner. In this yéere of our Lord 1230 king Henrie held his Chriſtmaſſe at Yorke, togither with the king of Scots, whome he had deſired to come thither at that time, that they might make merrie: and ſo for the ſpace of thrée daies togither, there was great banketting and ſport betwéene them. There came moreouer ſuch a filthie ſauour and ſtinke withall, that partlie for feare, and partlie for that they might not abide the ſauour, they voided the church, falling on heapes one vpon another, as they ſought to get out of the ſame. The vicars and canons forſooke their deſkes, ſo that the biſhop remained there onelie with one deacon that ſerued him at maſſe. In the moneth of Aprill, Leolin prince of Wales cauſed William de Breuſe, whom he had taken priſoner long before (as aboue is mentioned) to be hanged on a paire of gallowes, for that he was taken (as was reported) in adulterie with the wife of the ſaid prince. Amongſt other, there were two brethren that were Normans, Fouke and William, of the familie and ſurname of the Paganelles or Painelles, being men of great birth and eſtimation in their countrie, which brought with them thréeſcore knights or men of armes, right worthie and valiant in feats of war. Theſe Noble men would faine haue perſuaded the king to haue entred into Normandie, for that (as they affirmed) it ſhould be an eaſie matter for him to ſubdue the whole countrie: whereto the king would gladlie haue conſented, if the earle of Kent had not aduiſed him otherwiſe. After this, they beſought him at the leaſtwiſe to grant them two hundred knights or men of armes of his armie, with whoſe aid they doubted not to be able (as they ſaid) to expell all the Frenchmen out of Normandie, but neither would this be obteined, ſo that thoſe Norman lords remained without comfort, whileſt the French king cauſed their caſtels and manours to be ſeized vnto his vſe.

But the king of England aduertiſed of his approch, paſſed that riuer ſooner than anie man would haue iudged, and incamped firſt in the countrie of Poictou, and after drew into the confines of Xantonge, the French king ſtill following, and by the waie deſtroieng the townes of Fountney, and Uillars, perteining to one Guie de Rochfort, a capteine belonging to the earle of March. Where (if we may beléeue ſome writers) the two kings ioined battell, which continued a long time right fierce & cruell: but at length the Engliſhmen giuing backe, the victorie remained on the French ſide, a great number of their aduerſaries being ſlaine and taken.

After this battell, they ſaie alſo that a peace was concluded betwixt them. But other writers haue recorded, that the matter was firſt taken vp by a truce without anie battell, bicauſe both the kings being yong men, and as yet not verie ſkilfull in martiall affaires, were content to giue eare vnto quéene Blanch, to Philip erle of Bollongne, and to Ranulfe earle of Cheſter, which thrée tooke vpon them to intreat a peace, and preſcribe the couenants of agréement, by which meanes they were at the laſt accorded. Engliſhmen ſent to Spain againſt the Saracens.

In the meane time king Henrie hauing ſpent a great deale of treaſure in his iournie made into France, there was granted vnto him a fifteenth of the temporaltie, with a diſme and a halfe of the ſpiritualtie, towards the furniſhing out of a new power of men to be ſent into Spaine againſt the Saracens, which made ſore warres vpon the chriſtians in that countrie, wherevpon king Henrie being required of the K. of Aragon to aid him with ſome number of ſouldiers, he ſent a great power thither with all ſpeed, and ſo likewiſe did the French king. By means whereof the Spaniards, being ioined with Engliſhmen and Frenchmen, obteined a noble victorie, in vanquiſhing thoſe their enimies. Thus ſaith Polydor. But other write that the king on the ſeauen and twentith of Ianuarie, holding a parlement at Weſtminſter (where the Nobles both ſpirituall and temporall were aſſembled) demanded eſcuage of all thoſe that held any baronies of him, that is to ſaie, forren knights fée, fortie ſhillings, or thrée marks.

The archb. of Canturburie ſtandeth against the K. in defenſe of his cleargie.

Moreouer, the archbiſhop of Canturburie (as they ſay) ſtood againſt the king in this demand, mainteining that the cleargie ought not to be ſubiect vnto the iudgement of laie men, ſith this eſcuage was granted in the parts beyond the ſeas without their conſent. Wherevpon the matter as touching the biſhops was deferred till the quindene of Eaſter, albeit that all the laitie, and other of the ſpiritualtie conſented to the kings will. ¶ About this time alſo there chanced to riſe a great ſtrife and contention betwixt Richard the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and Hubert the earle of Kent, who as gardian to the yoong erle of Gloceſter had got into his hands the caſtell of Tunbridge, with the towne, and certeine other poſſeſſions which belonged to the archbiſhops ſée, and therefore did the archbiſhop complaine to the king of the iniurie which he ſuſteined.

Contention betwixt the archb. and the earle of Kent.

Math. Paris.

Now when he perceiued no hope likelie to come for any redreſſe at the kings hands, he tooke an other way: and firſt by his pontificall authoritie accurſed all thoſe that withheld the ſame poſſeſſions, and all their mainteiners (the king excepted) and therewith appealing to the pope, he went to proſecute his appeale at Rome, whither the king and the earle ſent alſo their procurators, and made the pope their arbitratour to iudge of the matter. In the end pope Gregorie hauing heard the whole proceſſe of the controuerſie, iudged the right to remaine with the archbiſhop, who hauing then obteined his deſire, haſted toward England: but as he was returning homewards, he died by the way, not farre from Rome, whereby the popes iudgement tooke no place: for whileſt the ſée was void, there was none that would follow the ſuit: and ſuch was the end of this controuerſie for this time.

Ralfe Neuill elected arch. of Canturburie.

After the deceaſſe of this archbiſhop Richard, the monks elected Ralfe Neuill biſhop of Chicheſter the kings chancellor, an vpright man, and of iuſt dealing in all his doings. In whome alſo it is to be noted, he would not giue one halfepenie to the monks towards the bearing of their charges in their iournie to Rome, which they ſhould take vpon them from thence to fetch his confirmation, according to the manner, leaſt he ſhould burthen his conſcience with the crime of ſimonie which he greatlie abhorred, although ſome imputed this to proceed rather of a cloked ſpice of couetouſneſſe. Which practiſe of his maketh greatlie to the confounding of the indirect means now vſed to aſpire vnto promotions, for the obteinment whereof no remedie is forborne; no, though the ſame be repugnant to reaſon, and vtterlie againſt conſcience and honeſtie. But this is the temptation of auarice and ambition, which poiſon the minds of men in ſuch ſort, that rather than they will want their wiſhed aduancement, they will vſe theſe meanes that may further them moſt, namelie, fréendſhip, monie, and mightie mens countenance; which one noteth verie well in a diſtichon of neat deuiſe, ſaieng,

Artis, honeſtatis, recti, præcepta, decus, vim,
Conculcat, ſuperant, ſpernunt, fauor, æra, potentes,

But to the purpoſe from whence we are digreſſed. When the monks came to the popes preſence, vpon inquirie made, and chéefelie by report of Simon Langton, who (as ſome thinke) gaped for the dignitie, he vnderſtood that the ſaid Ralfe Neuill ſhould be a man vnlearned, a courtier, haſtie and ſhort of word, and that which moſt diſpleaſed the pope, it was to be feared, that if he ſhould be preferred to that roome, he would go about to deliuer the realme of England from the thraldome of the pope, and the court of Rome (into the which being made tributorie by king Iohn it had latelie béene brought) that (as he ſhould alledge) it might ſerue God and holie church in the old accuſtomed libertie.

Simō Langtons report of the conditions of Ralfe Neuill.

To bring this to paſſe (hauing the king thereto greatlie inclined, and all the realme readie to aſſiſt him in the ſame) he would not ſticke to put his life in ieopardie, namelie vpon confidence of the right and appeales of Stephan the late archbiſhop of Canturburie, made in ſolemne wiſe before the altar of S. Paule in the cathedrall church of London, when king Iohn reſigning his crowne into the hands of the legat, made that writing obligatorie moſt execrable to the whole world.

Sée before in pag 177, & 178.

The pope maketh void the election.

When the pope had heard this tale told, he ſtreit diſanulled the election and requeſt of the confirmation of the ſaid Ralfe Neuill, granting libertie to the monks to choſe ſome other which might proue a wholſome ſhéepheard for the ſoule of man, profitable to the church of England, and a faithfull ſonne to the ſée of Rome, and ſo the monks returning home, made relation to the couent how they had ſped. After this, the monks elected the prior of their houſe named Iohn to be their archbiſhop, who going to Rome for his confirmation, was perſuaded in the end to renounce his election: ſo that at length one Edmund that was treaſurer of the colledge of Saliſburie, was elected, confirmed, and conſecrated, a man of great zeale, being the foure & fortith archbiſhop that had gouerned that ſée.

Leolin prince of Wales inuadeth the Engliſh borders.

This yeare the kings brother the earle of Cornewall married the counteſſe of Gloceſter, widow to the late earle Gilbert, and ſiſter to William Marſhall earle of Penbroke, the which erle of Penbroke ſhortlie after the ſame marriage departed this life, and was buried on the fiftéenth day of Aprill, in the new temple at London, néere vnto his father. Moreouer, Leolin prince of Wales about this ſeaſon enterpriſing to inuade the Engliſh confines, burned and waſted the countrie in moſt cruell wiſe. Whereof the king being aduertiſed, haſted forth by great iournies, with purpoſe to reuenge ſuch iniuries. But the enimies hearing of his comming (according to the cuſtome of their countrie) withdrew into the mounteins, bogs, and mariſhes. Wherefore the king (ſéeing that he could not haue them at his pleaſure, and leaſt he ſhould be thought to ſpend time in vaine) came backe, and left behind him a ſmall troope of ſouldiers to reſiſt their attempts, if they ſhould happen to riſe vp any more.

The Welſhmen hauing intelligence that the king was returned home, brake forth againe as before into the Engliſh marſhes, and not onelie tooke preies and booties, but went about to deſtroie with fire and ſword all that ſtood in their way. Howbeit in their returne, and as they ranged abroad ſomewhat vnaduiſedlie, they were intrapped by the ſouldiers which the king had left there for the defenſe of the countrie, and put to flight neere the caſtell of Mountgomerie, with great ſlaughter & loſſe of their people. But Leolin nothing diſmaied therwith, aſſembled a greater power than he had before, and began forthwith to rob and ſpoile within the Engliſh marſhes with paganiſh extremitie. Which thing when it came to the vnderſtanding of the king, he was verie ſore diſpleaſed, that ſo meane a man as Leolin was, ſhould put him to ſo much trouble, therefore he raiſed a farre greater armie than he had doone at anie time before, and with the ſame came to the citie of Hereford.

In the meane time Leolin comming neere vnto the ſaid caſtell of Mountgomerie, by the practiſe of a traitorous monke, trained forth the Engliſh ſouldiers which laie in garriſon there, and counterfeiting to flee, till he had laid them vp in bogs and mires with their horſſes, ſo as they could not helpe themſelues, he fell vpon them, and ſo ſlue and tooke a great number of them euen as he could haue wiſhed. The king aduertiſed hereof, haſted the faſter forward, and comming into thoſe parts, as he paſſed by an abbeie of the Ciſteaux order (of which houſe the monke was that had betraied the Engliſhmen of Mountgomerie) he burned a grange that belonged to the ſame abbeie, and further ſpoiling the ſame abbeie it ſelfe, he had ſet it on a light fire alſo, if the abbat therof had not redeemed it with the ſumme of three hundred marks of ſiluer. After this, he cauſed Mawds caſtell to be repaired and fortified, which the Welſhmen in times paſt had ouerthrowne, and when the worke was finiſhed, he left there a ſtrong garriſon of ſouldiers to keepe backe the Welſhmen from making their accuſtomed incurſions.

Whileſt the king was thus occupied in Wales, there was ſome buſines in France: for in the moneth of Iune, the French king with an armie came to inuade the countrie of Britaine, but earle Henrie with the earle of Cheſter and the other Engliſh capteins found meanes to take and deſtroie all the cariages and wagons which came with vittels and other prouiſion to ſerue the French armie. When the Frenchmen perceiued they could not haue their purpoſe, by mediation of the archbiſhop of Reimes, and the earle of Bollongne on the French part, and by conſent of the earles of Britaine and Cheſter on the Engliſh part, a peace was concluded, or rather a truce to indure for three yeares betwixt the two kings of England and France. This agreement was made the fift daie of Iulie, and then the earles of Britaine and Cheſter, with Richard Marſhall, came ouer into England, and rode to the king, whom they found at Mawds caſtell, where he remained till the worke was finiſhed, and then in the moneth of October returned into England.

In this meane time no ſmall grudge aroſe among the people, by reaſon that their churches were occupied by incumbents that were ſtrangers, promoted by the popes and their legats, who neither inſtructed the people, nor could well ſpeake anie more Engliſh than that which ſerued for the collection of their tithes, in ſomuch that for the inſolencie of ſuch imcumbents as well the Noble men and thoſe of good reputation, as other of the meaner ſort, by an vndiſcreet preſumption attempted a diſorderlie redreſſe, confederating themſelues togither, and taking vpon them to write and direct their letters vnto biſhops and chapters, commanding them by waie of inhibition, not to ſeeme to interrupt thoſe that ſhould ſeize vpon the beneficed ſtrangers, or vpon their reuenues.

They alſo tooke vpon them to write vnto ſuch religious men and others, which were farmers vnto anie of thoſe ſtrangers, forbidding them to ſtand accountable vnto the ſaid ſtrangers, but to reteine the rents and profits in their hands to anſwer the ſame vnto ſuch as they ſhould appoint for the receipt therof. The ſuperſcription of their letters was this. ¶ Tali epiſcopo, & tali capitulo, vniuerſitas eorum, qui magis volunt mori quàm à Romanis confundi, ſalutem. That is to ſay, To ſuch a biſhop and chapter, all thoſe which had rather die than be confounded by the Romans, ſend greeting. In the ſeale wherewith the ſaid letters were ſealed, were two ſwords ingrauen.

The ſuperſcription of their letters.

This matter went ſo farre forth, that there were ſundrie perſons armed and diſguiſed like mummers, which enterpriſed not onelie to take diuerſe of thoſe ſtrangers that were beneficed men, but alſo came to their barnes, threſhed vp their graine, and either made ſale therof, or gaue it awaie for God his ſake, ſhewing counterfeited letters vnder the kings ſeale, which they had procured for their warrant, as they did pretend. At length the pope vpon complaint made vnto him of ſuch violent doings, wrote to king Henrie, blaming him not a little for ſuffering ſuch diſorders to be committed within his realme, commanding him vpon paine of excommunication to cauſe a diligent inquirie to be had of the offendors, and to ſee them ſharpelie puniſhed, to the example of others.

Maſking threſhers.

The pope cõplaineth to the K. in blaming him.

The pope cõmandeth the offendors to be accurſe

Moreouer he ſent letters to the biſhop of Wincheſter, and to the abbat of ſaint Edmundſburie, to make the like inquiſition, and to accurſe all thoſe that ſhould be found culpable within the ſouth parts of England, as he did to the archbiſhop of Yorke, to the biſhop of Durham, and to an Italian named Iohn a canon of Yorke, to doo the like in the north parts, ſo that the offendors ſhould remaine accurſed, till they came to Rome, there to fetch their abſolution. Hereupon therefore a generall inquiſition was taken, as well by the king as by the biſhops, and manie found guiltie, ſome in fact, and ſome in conſent: amongſt which number there were both biſhops and chapleins to the king, with archdeacons and deanes, knights, and manie of the laitie.

Inquiſition taken.

There were ſome ſhiriffes and bailiffes alſo, which by the kings commandement were arreſted and put in priſon, and diuerſe of all ſorts did keepe themſelues out of the waie, and would not as yet be found. In like maner, Hubert earle of Kent, lord cheefe iuſtice, was accuſed to be chiefe tranſgreſſour in this matter, as he that had giuen forth the kings letters patents to thoſe diſguiſed and maſking threſhers, who had taken vpon them ſo to ſequeſter other mens goods, whereto they had no right. There came alſo to the king one ſir Robert de Twing, a knight of the north parts (which named himſelfe William Wetherſe, and had led about a companie of the foreſaid maſkers) proteſting that he had doone it vpon iuſt cauſe to be reuenged vpon the Romans, which went about by ſentence of the pope, and manifeſt fraud to ſpoile him of the parſonage of a certeine church which he held, and therfore he ſaid he had rather ſtand accurſed without iuſt cauſe for a time, than to loſe his benefice without due iudgement. Howbeit the king and the other commiſſioners counſeled him in the end to go to Rome to purchaſe his abſolution, ſith he was fallen in danger of excommunication, and there to ſue for his pardon in the popes conſiſtorie. And to incourage him the better ſo to doo, the king wrote alſo in his fauour to the pope, teſtifieng the right which he claimed to the church, whereby at length he obteined his ſuit (as after ye ſhall heare.)

Herevpon the biſhop of Wincheſter being a verie eloquent and faire-ſpoken man, openlie counſelled the king to fauour his people, whom he had alreadie made poore and bare with continuall tributes and exactions. And if it were ſo that he ſtood in ſuch need as was alledged, that then he ſhould take into his hands againe ſuch poſſeſſions and things, which during the time of his yoong yeeres he had beſtowed vpon his ſeruants, without any good aduiſed conſideration, for lacke of ripe iudgement and diſcretion, and againe to take from certeine couetous perſons, who now were become horſeleches and caterpillers in the commonwealth, all ſuch offices as they held, and had verie much abuſed, cauſing them to yeeld vp their accounts, and to vſe them after the manner of ſponges, ſo that where he had in times paſt made them full of moiſture, he might now wring them drie, following herein the example of Veſpaſian. And vnderſtanding by the auditors appointed to take their accounts, that the moſt part of them had receiued much more and by other means than they had entered into their reckoning, he compelled them to reſtore it out of hand with intereſt. Alſo he cauſed the magiſtrats to be called to a reckoning, and manie of them being conuicted of fraud, were condemned to make reſtitution. And among other Ranulfe Briton treaſurer of his chamber was put beſide his office, and fined at a thouſand marks, in whoſe place was ſet Peter de Riuales, or after ſome copies de Oriuales, a Poictouin, nephue or rather ſonne to the biſhop of Wincheſter, by whoſe aduice the king tooke a more ſtrait account of his officers, and often remoued ſuch as he iudged guiltie.

The earle of Kent diſcharged of his office of cheefe iuſtice. Matth. Paris.

The earle of Kent taketh ſanctuarie.

The citizens of London their good denotion towards the earle of Kent.

At the ſame time alſo, Hubert earle of Kent was depoſed from the office of high iuſtice, and Stephan Segraue appointed in his roome. The ſaid Hubert (bicauſe he refuſed to anſwer a certeine dutie which was demanded of him to the kings vſe) ran ſo farre into his diſpleaſure, that he durſt not abide his ſight, but for ſafegard of himſelfe got him to the abbeie of Merton, and there tooke ſanctuarie. The king hearing of this his demeanor, was ſo highlie offended withall, that he ſent to the Londoners, willing them to go thither and fetch him to his preſence. The Londoners, which in no wiſe loued him, bicauſe of the death of their citizen Conſtantine, were verie readie to accompliſh this commandement, inſomuch that where the maior ouernight late declared to them the effect of the kings commiſſion, there were twentie thouſand of them in armor gotten forward earlie in the morning towards Merton, in full hope now to be reuenged of him, for the ſmall good-will that he had borne vnto their citie heretofore.

Ouid.lib.2.de triſt.5.

But the king being informed by the earle of Cheſter and others, that if the Londoners being thus in armor, and in ſo great a number, ſhould commit any other outrage by the way, the matter might grow to ſome ſuch inconuenience as would not eaſilie be ſtaied, he ſent to them a countermand to returne backe to the citie againe, which they did, though ſorie in their hearts that they might not go through with their deſired enterpriſe. Furthermore (ſee heere the mutabilitie of fortune and hir inconſtancie, whereof complaint hath beene made by our forefathers time out of mind, ſaieng, now that the erle of Kent was thus out of the kings fauour, there were few or none of thoſe whome he had before beene beneficiall vnto, that ſhewed themſelues as freends and louers vnto him, but all forſooke & were readie to ſaie the worſt of him, the archbiſhop of Dubline excepted, who yet obteined of the king reſpit for him to make anſwere vnto ſuch things as ſhould lawfullie be obiected againſt him, both for the debt which ſhould be due to the king, and alſo vpon points of treaſon, which were now laid to his charge. ¶ Wherin we may ſee what hath beene the courſe of the world in former ages touching freends, who in the ſpring of a mans felicitie like ſwallowes will flie about him; but when the winter of aduerſitie nippeth, like ſnailes they keepe within their ſhels: wherevnto the poet verie well alluding, ſaith,

After this, as the ſaid Hubert would haue gone to S. Edmundſburie in Suffolke, where his wife as then remained, he was apprehended at Burntwood in Eſſex, within a chappell there (as ſaith Fabian.) But (as Matthew Paris ſaith) ſir Robert de Cranecombe, with three hundred armed men was ſent to apprehend him by the kings commandement, and ſo he was taken in a village belonging to the biſhop of Norwich in Eſſex, and by the kings commandement caſt into priſon, but yet afterwards he was reconciled to the kings fauor, when he had lien foure moneths in priſon, and thirteene moneths baniſhed the court.

A ſubſidie granted in a parlement holden at Lambeth.

Anno Reg. 17.

Matth. Paris. Ranulfe earle of Cheſter departeth this life.

Erle Ranulfs thrice maried.

This Clemence was daughter to erle Ferrers.

In this yeare, on the exaltation of the croſſe, at Lambeth, in the aſſemblie of the ſtates there, a ſubſidie was granted to the K. of the fortith part of euerie mans goods towards the diſcharge of his debts which he owght to the earle of Britaine. Alſo in the beginning of the ſeauenteenth yeere of his reigne, Ranulfe earle of Cheſter and Lincolne departed this life the ſix and twentith day of October, whoſe bodie was buried at Cheſter, and his bowels at Wallingford where he died. This earle Ranulfe was thrice married, firſt to Conſtance daughter and heire to Conan earle of Britaine and Richmund, and ſo in right of hir was intituled earle of thoſe two places: which Conſtance had beene firſt married vnto Geffrey the third ſonne of king Henrie the ſecond, by whom ſhe had iſſue Arthur (as before yee haue heard.) But by earle Ranulfe ſhe had no iſſue at all, but was from him diuorced, and afterwards married vnto Guy vicount de Towars. Then after earle Ranulfe was ſo diuorſed from the ſaid Conſtance, he married a ladie named Clemence, and after hir deceaſſe, he married the third time the ladie Margaret, daughter to Humfrey de Bohun earle of Hereford and Eſſex, conſtable of England.

The partition of his lands.

Howbeit he neuer had iſſue by any of thoſe his wiues, ſo that Iohn Scot his nephue by his ſiſter Mawd ſucceeded him in the earldome of Cheſter, and William Dalbenie earle of Arundell, nephue to him by his ſiſter Mabell, had the manour of Barrow, and other lands that belonged to the ſaid Ranulfe, of the yeerelie value of fiue hundred pounds. Robert Quincie, he that married his ſiſter Hauiſe, had the earledome of Lincolne, and ſo of a baron became an earle who had iſſue by his wife, Margerie counteſſe of Lincolne, that was maried to Edmund Lacie earle of Lincolne. William earle Ferrers and of Darbie, that had married Agnes, ſiſter to the ſaid Ranulfe, had the caſtell and manour of Chartley, togither with other lands for his pourpart.

Here is alſo to be remembred, that the afore mentioned earle Ranulfe (or Randulfe whether ye liſt to call him) atchiued manie high enterpriſes in his time, as partlie in this booke ye haue alreadie heard: he held ſore warres againſt the Welſhmen, till at length an agreement was concluded betwixt him and Leolin prince of Wales. I remember I haue read in an old record, that vpon a time as this earle paſſed into Wales with an armie, his chance was to be ouerſet by the Welſhmen, ſo that he was driuen to retire into a caſtell, wherein the Welſhmen did beſiege him. And as it fortuned at that time, Roger Lacie the conſtable of Cheſter was not then with him, but left behind at Cheſter to ſee the citie kept in order (for as it ſhould ſeeme, their ſolemne plaies which commonlie are vſed at Whitſuntide were then in hand, or elſe their faire which is kept at Midſummer.)

This Roger Lacie is ſurnamed Helle.

Wherefore the earle ſent a meſſenger in all poſſible haſt vnto his conſtable, praieng him with ſpeed to come to his ſuccour in that extreame point of neceſſitie. Lacie made no delaie, but aſſembling all the forreners, plaiers, muſicians, and others which he could find within that citie fit to weare armor, went forth with them, and in moſt ſpeedie maner marched toward the caſtell, where the Welſhmen kept the earle beſieged, who now perceiuing ſuch a multitude of men comming towards them, incontinentlie left the ſiege and fled awaie. The earle then being thus deliuered out of that preſent danger, came forth of the caſtell, returned with his conſtable vnto Cheſter, and in recompenſe of that ſeruice, gaue vnto his ſaid conſtable Roger Lacie, the rule, order, and authoritie ouer all the forreners, plaiers, muſicians, and other ſtrangers reſorting to Cheſter at the time, when ſuch publike plaies (or elſe faire) ſhould be kept & holden.

John Lacie the ſonne of the ſaid Roger married Alice the daughter of Gilbert de Aquila, and after hir deceaſſe, he married the ladie Margaret, the daughter of Robert Quincie earle of Lincolne, of whom he begat Edmund Lacie conſtable of Cheſter, which Edmund after the deceaſſe of his father, married Alice the daughter of the marqueſſe of Saluces in Italie, which ladie was ſurnamed the queene, of whom he begat Henrie Lacie earle of Lincolne, which Henrie married the ladie Margaret, daughter to William Long eſpee earle of Saliſburie, by whom he had two ſons, Edmund and John, and two daughters, Alice and Joan, which Alice Thomas earle of Lancaſter married, who claimed and had the ſame rights and priuiledges which ancientlie belonged to the ſaid Roger Lacie, and other the conſtables of Cheſter, concerning the fines of forreners and others. ¶This haue I the more willingly declared, that it may appeare in what eſtimation and credit the Lacies conſtables Cheſter by inheritance liued in their time, of whoſe high valiancie, and likewiſe of other of that familie, highlie commended for their noble chiualrie in martiall enterpriſes ye may read in ſundrie hiſtories at large.

But now to returne and ſpeake of other doings, which chanced about the time in which the ſaid Ranulfe earle of Cheſter departed this life. The king in the meane while ſeized into his hands a great portion of the treaſure which Hubert de Burgh earle of Kent had committed to the keeping of the templers. But whereas there were that trauelled to haue had him put to death, the king in reſpect of the ſeruice which he had doone to him and to his predeceſſors king Richard and king John, granted him life, with thoſe lands which he had either by purchaſe, or by gift of king John, but neuertheles he cauſed him to be kept in free priſon at the caſtell of the Vees, vnder the cuſtodie of foure knights belonging to the earles of Cornewall, Warren, Penbroke, and Ferrers, which foure earles were become ſuerties for him.

The earle of Kent kept in priſon within the caſtell of Vees.

This yeare alſo about the ſame time, to wit, the morow after S. Martins daie, chanced great thunder and lightning, which continued for the ſpace of 15 daies togither, to the great terrour and feare of the people, and namelie of the Londoners, which haue that kind of weather ſo familiar to them, that if there be anie abroad in the land, they haue their part thereof. Moreouer on the 23 of March, was heard an other great and terrible tempeſt of thunder, and after followed a maruellous wet ſummer with manie floods. Alſo on the 8 daie of Aprill, in the parts about Hereford and Worceſter, there appeared foure ſunnes in the element, beſide the naturall ſunne, of red colour, and a great circle of chriſtaline colour, the which compaſſed with his largeneſſe as it had beene the whole circuit almoſt of the whole realme of England, from the ſides whereof went forth certeine halfe circles, in whoſe ſections appeared the ſaid foure ſunnes. The naturall ſunne was at the ſame time in the eaſt part of the firmament, for it was about the firſt houre of the daie, or betwixt ſix and ſeuen in the morning, the aire being the ſame time verie bright and cleare. The biſhop of Hereford, and ſir John Monmouth knight, and manie others beheld this wonderfull ſight, and teſtified the ſame to be moſt true. And after this there followed the ſame yeare in thoſe parts cruell warre, ſlaughter, terrible bloudſhed, & a generall trouble through England, Wales, and Ireland. About the ſame time, to wit, in June, in the ſouth parts of England neere to the ſea coaſt, two huge dragons appeared fighting in the aire, and after a long fight the one ouercame the other, and followed him, fleeing into the depth of the ſea, & ſo they were ſeene no more.

A ſtrange wonder.

Moreouer in this yeare great variance and ſtrife roſe betwixt the king and his barons, for the king tooke great diſpleaſure againſt all other his officers, & ſo much the more miſtruſted them, for that he found himſelfe deceiued in the earle of Kent, to whom he had committed a further credit than to anie other, and had made him high iuſtice of England, onelie for the good will that he alwaies bare to him. Therefore perceiuing this, he was doubtfull whom he ſhould truſt, diſcharging the moſt part of thoſe Engliſhmen that bare any office about him, and in their roomes placed ſtrangers, as Poictouins and Britains, of the which there came ouer vnto him manie knights and other, to the number of 2000, which he placed in garriſons within caſtels of diuerſe places of the land, and committed the order of all things for the moſt part to the biſhop of Wincheſter, and to his nephue or ſonne Peter de Riuales.

Polydor.

The king b ginneth to uour ſtrangers.

The biſhop of Wincheſter.

Herwith he offended ſo much the minds of his Nobles, that Richard Marſhall erle of Penbroke (chiefe of that familie, & boldeſt to ſpeake, now that Ranulfe of Cheſter was gone) as well in his owne name, as in the names of other, tooke vpon him openlie to reproue the kings doings herein, as pernicious and dangerous to the ſtate of the realme. Herevnto the biſhop of Wincheſter (whoſe counſell as it ſeemed he followed) made anſwer, that the king had doone nothing in that behalfe vnaduiſedlie, but vpon good and deepe conſideration: for ſith he might perceiue how the Engliſh nobilitie had firſt purſued his father with malicious hatred & open war, and now that he found diuerſe of them whom he had brought vp and aduanced to high honours, vnfaithfull in the adminiſtration of their offices, he did not without iuſt cauſe receiue into his fauour ſtrangers, and preferre them before thoſe of his owne nation, which were not ſo faithfull in his ſeruice and obedience as they.

This anſwer of the biſhop ſo pricked and wounded the minds of the Engliſh Nobilitie, that manie of them (amongſt whome the ſaid earle of Penbroke was the chéefe) began an open rebellion, ſome of them reſorting to one place, and ſome to an other, to gather people for their purpoſe. The names of ſuch barons as ſtirred vpon this occaſion were theſe; Richard Marſhall earle of Penbroke afore named, Gilbert Baſſet and his brethren, men of great honor and right hardie capteins: alſo Richard Sward a warlike perſonage, trained vp in feats of armes from his youth, with Walter Clifford a worthie knight, and manie others. The king hauing knowledge of their doings proclaimed them all traitors, confiſcated their goods, and ſent for a great power of men out of Flanders to ſerue him in his warres.

Matth. Paris.
Polydor.

The king proclaimed them traitors.

Strangers ſent for.

Whileſt king Henrie thus prouided himſelfe of an armie, the lords with their capteine Richard Marſhall ioined themſelues to Leolin prince of Wales, & doubting the comming of the king, ſpoiled all the marſhes next adioining to England, leauing no vittels nor cattell any where about in thoſe parts wherby the kings armie might haue reléefe, and further made all things readie for their owne defenſe ſo well as they could deuiſe. The earle of Kent about the ſame time, by helpe of two yeomen that attended vpon him, eſcaped out of the caſtell of Vées, and tooke ſanctuarie in the next church: but when thoſe that had the charge of him and the caſtell in kéeping, miſſed him, and heard where he was, they fetcht both him, and the two yeomen that holpe him to make the eſcape out of the church, and bringing them backe to the caſtell, impriſoned the earle.

Matth. Paris.
The earle of Kent eſcapeth and taketh ſanctuarie.

And though the biſhop of Saliſburie came thither and threatened to accurſſe them, if they would not deliuer the earle, and reſtore him to ſanctuarie againe: they made anſwer, that they had rather the earle ſhould hang for himſelfe, than they for him. And ſo bicauſe they would not deliuer him, the biſhop did excommunicate them, and after riding to the court, and taking with him the biſhop of London, and other biſhops, preuailed ſo much by complaint exhibited to the K. that the earle was reſtored to the church againe the eightéenth day of October: but ſo, as the ſhiriffe of the ſhire had commandement to compaſſe the church about with men, to watch that no reléeſe came vnto him, whereby he might be conſtreined through famiſhing to ſubmit himſelfe. Notwithſtanding, ſhortlie after there came a power of armed men, and fetcht the ſaid earle from thence (ſetting him on horſſebacke in faire complet armour) and ſo conueied him into Wales, where he ioined with other of the kings enimies, the thirtith day of October.

Anno Reg. 18.
The earle of Kent reſcued and conueied into wales.

Within a few daies after came the king with his armie, and entring into Wales, for want of vittels was conſtreined to retire backe to the marſhes, betwixt Worceſterſhire & Salopſhire, where ſtaieng certeine daies togither in thoſe parts, his ſouldiers ſtraied abroad in the countrie vnaduiſedlie, and kéeping no watch nor ward about their campe, were ſurpriſed in the night by their enimies, and ſlaine on euerie ſide. The ſlaughter had béene greater, but that the reſidue which laie in campe, brake forth about midnight, and in a plumpe togither fled into a caſtell which was néere at hand, called Groſſemound, in the which the king himſelfe was lodged. There were ſlaine aboue fiue hundred men, and all the truſſe and baggage of the campe loſt. Yet Matthew Paris ſaith there were but two knights ſlaine, which caſt awaie themſelues by their owne wilfulneſſe, that would needs ſtand to it and make reſiſtance, where the reſidue being ſpoiled of all that they had with them, got awaie by flight, as the biſhops of Wincheſter and Chicheſter, the lord chéefe iuſtice Stephan Segraue, Peter de Riuales treaſurer, Hugh Bigot earle of Norfolke, William earle of Saliſburie, William lord Beauchampe, and William Dalbenie the yoonger, who were witneſſes of this loſſe amongſt the reſidue.

The king entreth into wales with an armie.

Hereof it came to paſſe, that manie of the kings armie (ſpeciallie thoſe which had loſt their horſſes, armour, monie, and other furniture, with their vittels) returned into their countrie, to their great confuſion. For the Welſhmen and other outlawes, hauing ſpoiled the campe, returned with the cariages and ſumpters which they had taken, into places of ſafe refuge. The king hauing receiued this loſſe, and oftentimes tried fortune nothing fauourable vnto him in thoſe parts, by reaſon of the ſtreits and diſaduantage of the places, thought good to reſerue the reuenge of his receiued iniuries vntill a more conuenient time, and thervpon returned to Gloceſter, and furniſhed diuers caſtels and fortreſſes in the borders of Wales, with garriſons of ſouldiers, namelie Poictouins and other ſtrangers to defend the ſame againſt William Marſhall, and the other his complices, who vpon occaſions dailie ſought to ſuppreſſe and diſtreſſe the ſaid ſtrangers.

And beſide other encounters, in the which manie of thoſe Poictouins and other ſtrangers were ſlaine and oppreſſed by the ſaid William Marſhall and his adherents, it chanced that vpon ſaint Katherins day, the ſaid William Marſhall comming néere to the caſtell of Monmouth to view the ſame, was in danger to haue remained priſoner in the enimies hands, through an iſſue made by ſir Baldwine de Guines, capiteine of that caſtell, with his Poictouins and Flemings. But by ſuch reſcue as came to his aid, he was deliuered out of their hands, and the Poictouins and other of the garriſon diſcomfited. At this ſkirmiſh ſir Baldwine himſelfe being ſore wounded, was borne out of the field into the caſtell, loſing fiftéene knights of his part, and a great ſort of other which were taken priſoners, beſides no ſmall number that were ſlaine in the place.

The ſame yeare chanced a great dearth, by reaſon that the growth of all things was much hindered with the extreame cold weather. Alſo there happened about the beginning of Nouember great thunder and lightning, and therewith folowed an earthquake to the great feare of the inhabitants of the towne of Huntington and other places thereabouts. After this, came a great dearth amongſt the people, being commonlie a néere companion to great famine and dearth.

A death.

Richard Marſhall erle of Penbroke in this meane time ceaſſed not to waſte the marſhes of England next adioining to Wales, and dailie diuerſe of the Engliſh Nobilitie repaired to him, ſo that the king was ſore troubled in his mind. It chanced at the ſame time, that one Iohn of Monmouth a right valiant capteine, who led the kings armie, receiued a great ouerthrow at the hands of Richard Marſhall. For whereas the foreſaid Iohn, hauing aſſembled a mightie hoſt, made great haſt towards his enimies, in hope to haue come vpon them at vnwares, and therefore marching by night, that he might be readie to aſſaile them ſomewhat afore the breake of the day, which in the ſummer ſeaſon is the moſt ſilent time of all the night, it chanced farre otherwiſe than he looked it ſhould haue doone. For the earle of Penbroke, hauing knowledge by his ſpies of his aduerſaries intent, laie himſelfe with his people within a wood in ambuſh by the way, where the ſaid Iohn ſhould paſſe, and ſetting vpon him as he approched, put his people in ſuch feare by the ſudden incounter, that they knew not what capteine or enſigne they might follow, and ſo immediatlie fell to running awaie. The ſlaughter was great on euerie ſide, both of Poictouins and others. Diuerſe of them fléeing alſo into the next woods, were receiued by ſuch as were laid there to cut them off, and ſo ſlaine or taken out of hand. Howbeit their chiefe capteine the forenamed John of Monmouth eſcaped, with a few other in his companie. This ouerthrow chanced the morrow after Chriſtmaſſe daie.

The next daie Richard Marſhall hauing thus got the victorie, deſtroied certeine houſes and lordſhips there in the marſhes which belonged to the ſaid John of Monmouth. About the ſame time alſo, Richard Sward with other outlawes deſtroied the poſſeſſions belonging to the earle of Cornewall beſide Brehull, and burned a place there called Segraue, where Stephan de Segraue the lord chiefe iuſtice was borne, and likewiſe a village belonging to the biſhop of Wincheſter, not farre from Segraue aforeſaid. This was the maner of thoſe outlawes, that they hurt no perſon, but onelie thoſe councellers about the king by whom they were exiled, and therefore bearing ſtomach againſt them, they did not onlie excogitate but alſo execute this reuenge; which till they had obteined, they were no leſſe ill appaid, than well pleaſed when the ſame was paſt, for Immediatlie within the octaues of the Epiphanie, the earle Marſhall and Leolin prince of Wales waſted and robbed all the marſhes betwixt Wales and Shrewſburie, a part of which towne they alſo burnt. King Henrie being hereof certified as yet ſoiourning at Glouceſter, was ſore troubled in his mind, and calling togither his councell, aſked aduiſe what waie he might beſt take to redreſſe ſuch iniuries. After ſundrie opinions amongſt them declared, they agréed all in one ſentence, that it ſhould be moſt expedient to appeaſe the minds of the rebels with gentle offers, to grant them pardon of their offenſes, wiſelie to winne them to tractableneſſe, and not roughlie afflicting them to exaſperat their fierſeneſſe, ſith,

The king allowing this aduiſe to be good, followed it accordinglie, and firſt of all diſcharging the biſhop of Wincheſter of all publike adminiſtration of things, he commanded him to repaire home to his dioceſſe, and to ſée to the gouernement thereof, as to his dutie apperteined. He alſo baniſhed from his preſence Peter de Riuales, Stephan Segraue, Robert Paſſelew, and diuerſe others of his chiefe councellers, by whoſe means he had procured the euill will of his Nobilitie. Then receiued he againe his old ſeruants & officers, & finallie ſent the archb. of Canturburie, the biſhops of Cheſter & Rocheſter vnto the barons in Wales, to offer them peace & pardon of all iniuries paſt, if they wold returne to his obedience.

The earle of Penbroke paſſeth ouer into Ireland.

Thus in the end there was a truce taken betwixt the king and the rebels, to begin at Candlemaſſe, and to indure vntill Eaſter next inſuing, in which meane time, Richard the earle of Penbroke, hearing that Mauriſh Fitz Gerald, with Walter Lacie, Richard Burgh and others waſted his lands and poſſeſſions in Ireland (according to ſuch commiſſion as they had receiued of late from king Henrie and his councell) paſſed ouer thither, and there incountering with his enimies, was ſore wounded and taken priſoner, hauing entered the battell verie raſhlie, and with a ſmall companie of his people about him, onlie by the traitorous perſuaſion of Geffrey Mauriſh, who with other fled at the firſt brunt, and left him in maner alone, to ſtand to all the danger. Thoſe that thus tooke him, brought him into his owne caſtell, the which the lord chiefe iuſtice Maurice Fitz Gerald had latelie wonne. This incounter, in which Richard Marſhall was thus taken, chanced on a ſaturdaie, being the firſt of Aprill; and on the 16 of the ſame moneth, by reaſon of the wound which he had receiued, he departed this life.

He is taken priſoner.

The death the earle of Penbroke.

We find alſo that the biſhop of Wincheſter, and his ſonne (or kinſman as ſome haue called him) Peter de Riuales had procured the king to ſend commiſſion vnder his ſeale vnto the foreſaid noble men in Ireland, that if the ſaid Richard Marſhall earle of Penbroke chanced to come thither, they ſhould doo their beſt to take him, and in reward of their paines, they ſhould inioy all his lands and poſſeſſions which he held in that countrie. But after his death, and when the king had remooued thoſe his councellers from him, he confeſſed he had put his ſeale to a writing, but that he vnderſtood what were the contents thereof he vtterlie denied. Finallie, this was the end of the worthie earle of Penbroke Richard Marſhall, a man worthie to be highlie renowmed for his approued valiancie. His death ſuerlie was greatlie bewailed of king Henrie, openlie proteſting that he had loſt the worthieſt capteine that then liued.

After this, the lords that had remained in Wales, by ſafe conduct came to the king, and through the diligent trauell of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, he receiued them into fauour. Amongſt them were theſe men of name, Gilbert Marſhall the brother of the foreſaid Richard Marſhall, Hubert earle of Kent, Gilbert Baſſet, and Richard Sward, beſide diuerſe other. Vnto Gilbert Marſhall he deliuered his brothers inheritance, and vpon Whitſundaie made him knight, giuing vnto him the rod of the office of Marſhall of his court, according to the maner, to vſe and exerciſe as his anceſters had doone before him. And herewith the earle of Kent Gilbert Baſſet and Richard Sward were receiued againe into the court, and admitted to be of the kings priuie councell.

Soone after this, Peter de Riuales, Stephan Segraue, & Robert Paſſelew were called to accounts, that it might appeare how the kings treaſure was ſpent, and how they had vſed themſelues with the kings ſeale. The two laſt remembred kept themſelues out of the waie, and could not be found. Peter de Riuales alſo, with his father the biſhop of Wincheſter, tooke ſanctuarie at Wincheſter, for they were afraid leaſt their bodies ſhould not be in ſafetie if they came abroad, bicauſe they vnderſtood that their manours and grange places were ſpoiled and burnt by thoſe that bare them diſpleaſure. Howbeit at length, vnder the protection of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, they came to their anſwer, & were ſore charged for their vniuſt dealing, traitorous practiſe, and great falſhood vſed in time of their bearing office, and (as it appeareth by writers) they could but ſorilie cleare themſelues in thoſe matters wherewith they were charged: but yet by reaſon of their protection they were reſtored to the places from whence they came, or elſe otherwiſe ſhifted off the matter for the time, so that we read not of anie great bodilie puniſhment which they ſhould receiue as then. Notwithſtanding this, the French king inforcing againe his power, waxed too ſtrong for the earle of Britaine, ſo that he was conſtreined to take a truce to indure till the feaſt of all ſaints, that he might in the meane time vnderſtand if the king of England would come ouer with ſome puiſſant armie to his aid or no: but bicauſe it was perceiued in the end that the ſaid earle of Britaine ſought nothing elſe but how to get monie out of king Henries coffers, and to doo him no pleaſure for it, bicauſe he was in manner at an other agréement alreadie with the king of France, king Henrie refuſed to ſatiſfie his requeſts at ſuch time as he came ouer vnto him (after the taking of that truce) for more monie. Herewith alſo the ſaid erle being offended, got him backe into his owne countrie, and ſhortlie after apparantlie ſubmitted himſelfe to the French king, which (as the report went) he had doone before in ſecret.

Theſe things being thus brought to paſſe, and all troubles quieted, the king as then being at London, there was brought before him by one Tolie, a complaint exhibited againſt the * Iewes of Norwich, which had ſtolen a yoong child, being not paſt a twelue moneths old, and ſecretlie kept him an whole yeare togither, to the end that he might (when Eſter came) crucifie him in deſpite of our ſauiour Ieſus Chriſt, and the chriſtian religion. The matter as it happened fell out well for the lad: for within a few daies before that thoſe curſſed murtherers purpoſed to haue ſhed this innocents bloud, they were accuſed, conuicted and puniſhed, whereby he eſcaped their cruell hands. About the ſame time, to wit the ſeauenth of Februarie died Hugh de Wels biſhop of Lincolne, a great enimie to moonks and religious men. Robert Groſted was then preferred to his roome, a man of great learning, and trained vp in ſchooles euen from his infancie.

The ſame yeare, the emperour Frederike the ſecond, maried the ladie Iſabell the kings ſiſter. This Iſabell was a moſt beautifull ladie, of comelie perſonage, and of age about one and twentie years. She was affianced by procuracie, about the ſeauen and twentith of Februarie. And after Eaſter, the archbiſhop of Cullen, and the duke of Louane came ouer from the emperour, to haue the conueiance of hir vnto the emperors preſence. There was ſuch a feaſt holden, ſo ſumptuous ſeruice, ſo rich furniture, and roiall banketting kept the day before hir departure from London towards the ſea ſide, that more could not be imagined. The ſame feaſt was kept at Weſtminſter on the fift day of May, and the day following ſhe did ſet forward, and by eaſie iournies came to Sandwich, the king bringing hir thither with thrée thouſand horſſes. Finallie, ſhe tooke the ſea the eleuenth of May, the king taking leaue of hir not without teares, when they thus departed the one from the other. And ſo with proſperous wind and weather ſhée arriued at Antwerpe, and from thence paſſed forward, till ſhée came to hir huſband the emperour, by whom ſhée was receiued with great ioy and comfort at Worms, where the marriage was conſummate vpon a ſundaie, being the two and twentith day of Iulie, or (as Matthew Weſtminſter ſaith) the ſeauen and twentith of May, being Whitſunday.

A great and ſumptuous feaſt.

This yeare the biſhop of London pronounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt certeine vſurers called Caorſini. But bicauſe the ſame vſurers ſhadowed themſelues vnder the pretext of the popes merchants (as they named themſelues) they preuailed ſo much by the fauour of the court of Rome, that the ſaid biſhop being ſicke and feeble, was cited peremptorilie in the parts beyond the ſeas, before iudges choſen forth by the ſame vſurers, to make anſwer for ſuch high iniurie as he had here doone to the popes factors. The biſhop willing by the example of Sem, rather to couer his fathers ſhame, than to reueale it to the whole world, did quietlie put vp the matter: and with commendable patience receiued the proffered wrong, hauing learned this leſſon, that

In the twentith yeare of king Henries reigne, in the Aduent time, the noble baron the lord Robert Fitz Water departed this life, and ſo likewiſe did a noble yong man deſcended of moſt noble parentage, one Roger de Somerie. On the fouretéenth day of Ianuarie inſuing, the king married the ladie Elianor, daughter to the earle of Prouance named Raimond. This marriage was ſolemnized at Canturburie, and in the octaues of S. In the northparts of England, not farre from the abbie of Roch or Rupie, there appeared comming forth of the earth companies of armed men on horſſebacke, with ſpeare, ſhield, ſword, and baners diſplaied, in ſundrie formes and ſhapes, riding in order of battell, and incountering togither: and this ſight was ſeene ſundrie daies ech after other. Sometime they ſeemed to ioine as it had beene in battell, and fought ſore; and ſometime they appeared to iuſt and breake ſtaues, as it had beene at ſome triumphant iuſts of tornie. The people of the countrie beheld them a farre off, with great wonder: for the thing ſhewed ſo liuelie, that now and then they might ſee them come with their emptie horſſes ſore wounded and hurt: and then men likewiſe mangled and bleeding, that pitie it was to ſee them. And that which ſeemed more ſtrange and to be moſt maruelled at, the prints of their feet appeared in the ground, and the graſſe troden downe in places where they had beene ſeene. In a parlement holden at Weſtminſter about the octaues of the Epiphanie, the king required a ſubſidie of his ſubiects, which requeſt was not verie well taken, but yet at length, vpon promiſe that he would be good lord vnto them, and not ſeeke to infringe and diſanull the grants which he had made by pretenſe of want of the popes confirmation (as it was thought he meant to doo) they agreed to giue him the thirtith part of all moueable goods, as well of the ſpiritualtie as the temporaltie, reſeruing yet to euerie man his readie coine, with horſſe and armour, to be imploied for the profit of the common-wealth. In conſideration of which grant, the king being of perfect age, and in his owne rule and full gouernance, of his free and meere good will, at the requeſt, and by counſell of the lords of his realme, eftſoones granted and confirmed the liberties and cuſtomes conteined in the two charters, the one called Magna charta, and the other Charta de foreſta, with this addition following added in the end.

gatiues belonging thereto, the king ſeized them into his owne hands, and in recompenſe aſſigned other lands to the forſaid ſiſters, as it had beene by way of exchange.

Now ſith the earles of Cheſter (I meane thoſe of the line of Hugh Lupus) tooke end in this John Scot; I haue thought it not impertinent for the honor of ſo noble a linage, to ſet downe the deſcent of the ſame earles, beginning at the foreſaid Hugh the firſt that gouerned after the conqueſt, as I haue ſeen the ſame collected out of ancient records, according to their true ſucceſſion in ſeauen deſcents one after another, as here followeth.

The true genealogie of the famous and moſt honourable earles of Cheſter.

Hugh Lou or Lupus, firſt earle of Cheſter after the conqueſt, nephue to William Conquerour by his ſiſter Margaret, wife to Richard Vicount of Auranches, married a noble ladie named Armetruda, by whom he had iſſue Richard that ſucceeded him in the earledome, Robert abbat of ſaint Edmundſburie, and Otuell. He departed this life about the yeere of our Lord 1102, when he had beene earle about 40 yeeres.

2 Richard Lupus eldeſt ſon to Hugh Lupus, and ſecond earle of Cheſter, married Maud the daughter of Stephan erle of Blois, Charters and Champaigne, and ſiſter to K. Stephan. This Richard with his brother Otuell was drowned in the ſeas, in the yeere of our Lord 1120, as before hath beene ſhewed, after he had beene earle about ninteene yeares.

3 Ranulfe or Randulfe the firſt of that name called Bohun, and otherwiſe Meſtheins, the ſonne of John de Bohun, and of Margaret, ſiſter to Hugh Lupus, ſucceeded Richard, as couſin and heire to him in the earldome of Cheſter, and was the third earle in number after the conqueſt. He married Maud the daughter of Auberie de Vere earle of Giſney and Oxenford, by whome he had iſſue Ranulfe ſurnamed Geruous the fourth earle of Cheſter. He died about the yere of our Lord 1130, after he had continued earle eight yeares.

4 Ranulfe or Randulfe Bohun, the ſecond of that name, and fourth erle in number after the conqueſt, ſurnamed Geruous, ſucceeded his father, and married Alice, daughter to Robert erle of Glouceſter, baſe ſonne to king Henrie the firſt by whome he had iſſue Hugh Keuelocke, the fift earle of Cheſter. He deceaſſed about the yeare of our Lord 1153, when he had beene earle 29 yeares.

5 Hugh Bohun otherwiſe Keuelocke, the ſonne of the ſaid Ranulfe, was the firſt earle of Cheſter after the conqueſt, and ſecond of that name. He married Beatrice, daughter to Richard Lucie lord cheefe iuſtice of England, by whom he had iſſue Ranulfe the third of that name, and foure daughters, Mawd married to Dauid that was earle of Angus and Huntington and lord of Galloway, Mabell maried to William Dalbegnie earle of Arundell, Agnes maried to William Ferrers earle of Derbie, and Hauiſa ioined in marriage with Robert Quincie, a baron of great honour. This Hugh died about the yeare 1181, when he had beene earle eight and twentie yeares.

6 Ranulfe Bohun the third of that name, otherwiſe called Blundeuille, the ſonne of Hugh Keuelocke, was the ſixt earle of Cheſter after the conqueſt. He was alſo earle of Lincolne, as next couſine and heire to William Romare earle of Lincolne. He had three wiues (as before yee haue heard) but yet died without iſſue, about the yeare of our Lord 1232, after he had beene earle 51 yeares.

7 John Scot, the ſonne of Dauid earle of Angus & Huntington, was in the right of his mother the ſeuenth earle of Cheſter after the conqueſt. He died without iſſue (as before yee haue heard) by reaſon whereof, the erldome came into the kings hands in the yeare 1237. Thus much may ſuffice (with that which is ſaid before) touching the deſcent of the earles of Cheſter. And now to proceed.

Cardinall Otho or Othobon.

The ſame yeare that John Scot died, cardinall Otho (by ſome writers named Othobon) about the feaſt of S. Peter and Paule came into England from pope Gregorie. He was receiued with all honour and ſolemne reuerence as was decent, yea and more than was decent, the king meeting him at the ſea ſide. His comming was not ſignified afore to the nobles of the realme, which cauſed them to miſlike the matter, and to grudge againſt the king, ſeeing that he did all things contrarie to order, breaking law, faith, and promiſe in all things. He hath coupled himſelfe (ſaid they) in mariage with a ſtranger, without conſent of his freends and naturall ſubiects, and now he bringeth in a legat ſecretlie, who will take vpon him to make an alteration in the whole ſtate of the realme.

The lords grudge at the king for receiuing the cardinall without their knowledge.

The legat praiſed for his ſober behauiour.

But this legat ſhewed himſelfe a verie ſober and diſcreet perſon, not ſo couetous as his predeceſſors, in ſo much that he refuſed diuerſe gifts which were offered vnto him, though ſome he receiued, and indeed commanded the other to be reſerued for him. He alſo diſtributed liberallie the vacant rents vnto ſuch as he brought with him, as well perſons worthie as vnworthie, and pacified ſuch controuerſies as were ſprong betwixt the nobles and peeres of the realme, ſo that he made them freends. ¶ An act memorable & to be kept in record, that the inſtrument and ſeruant of ſo bad a maiſter as he ſerued, namelie the pope, ſhould be the procurer of ſo good a worke: conſidering that from the ſee of Rome full tides and violent ſtreames of ſeditions haue flowed, and verie ſildome any occaſion or means made to plant peace among men, which is the daughter of loue, and the worthieſt thing that is, as one ſaith verie well in theſe words:

Gignit amor pacem, pax eſt dignißima rerum,

A tournie at Blie.

The biſhop of Wincheſter, the earle of Kent, Gilbert Baſſet, Stephen Siward & others were by him accorded, who had borne ſecret grudge ech to other a long time, which hatred was at point to haue broken forth, and ſhewed it ſelfe in perilous wiſe at a tornie holden at Blie in the beginning of Lent, where the Southernmen ſtroue againſt the Northerne men, and in the end the Southerne men preuailed, and tooke diuerſe of their aduerſaries, ſo that it ſéemed not to be a triumphant iuſtes, but rather a ſharpe challenge and incounter betwixt enimies. But amongſt all others, earle Bigot bare himſelfe verie ſtoutlie.

Anno Reg. 22.

The legat holdeth a ſynod at London.

After that the legat had thus agréed the noblemen, he aſſembled a ſynod at London, the morrow after the octaues of S. Martin, wherein manie ordinances were newlie conſtituted for the ſtate of the cleargie, but not altogither verie acceptable to diuerſe yoong préeſts and ſcholers (as ſome write) inſomuch that the legat afterwards comming to Oxford, and lodging in the abbie of Oſnie, it chanced as certeine ſcholers preſſed to the gates thinking to come in and doo their dutie (as they tooke the matter) vnto the legat, the porter kept them backe, and gaue them ouerthwart words, wherevpon they ruſhed in vpon him, & ſo began a fraie betwixt them and the legats men, who would haue beaten them backe.

1238.

The legat commeth to Oxford.

A fraie betwixt the legats men, and the ſcholers of Oxford.

It fortuned in this hurlie burlie, that a poore Iriſh ſcholer being got in néere to the kitchin dreſſer, beſought the cooke for Gods ſake to giue him ſome reliefe: but the cooke (as manie of that calling are cholerike fellowes) in a great furie tooke vp a ladle full of hot broath out of a kettell wherein fleſh had béene ſodden, and threw it right vpon the Iriſhmans face, which thing when another Welſh ſcholer that ſtood by beheld, he cried out; What meane we to ſuffer this villanie, and therewithall tooke an arrow, and ſet it in his bow, which he had caught vp in his hand at the beginning of the fraie, and drawing it vp to the head let flie at the cooke, and ſo ſlue him there outright.

A cookes almes.

The legats cooke ſlaine.

Herevpon againe noiſe and tumult roſe round about the houſe, the legat for feare got him into the belfraie of the abbeie, where he kept himſelfe cloſe till the darke of the night had ſtaied the vprore, and then ſtale forth, and taking his horſſe eſcaped as ſecretlie as he could ouer the Thames, and rode with all ſpéed to the court, which laie not far off at Abington, and there made his complaint to the king, in ſuch lamentable wiſe, that he forthwith ſent the earle Waren with a power of armed men, to fetch awaie the reſidue of the legats ſeruants which remained behind in the abbeie, and to apprehend the chiefe offendors.

The legat complaineth to the king.

The earle Waren ſent to apprehend the offendors.

The earle comming thither, tooke thirtie ſcholers, with one maſter Odo a lawier, and brought them to Wallingford caſtell, and there committed them to priſon. The legat alſo in reuenge of the iniurie in this wiſe to him doone, pronounced the curſſe againſt the miſdooers, and handled the matter in ſuch wiſe, that the regents and maſters of the Vniuerſitie were at length conſtreined to come vnto London, & there to go bare-footed through Cheapeſide, vnto the church of S. Paule, in ſuch wiſe to aſke him forgiueneſſe, and ſo with much adoo they obteined abſolution. This legat among other things demanded ſoone after the tenth part of all ſpirituall mens yearelie reuenues, towards the maintenance of the wars againſt the Saracens in Aſia.

The legat curſſeth.

The emperor of Conſtantinople cōmeth into England.

Moreouer, the emperour of Conſtantinople, namelie, Baldwine ſonne to Peter earle of Auſſerre, being expelled out of his empire, came this yeare into England, to ſue for aid: but at his firſt arriuall at Douer, he was told, that he had not doone well to come ſo preſumptuouſlie into the land of another prince, without his ſafe conduct. But when the ſaid emperour ſéemed to be ſorie for his offenſe, and to excuſe his innocencie and ſincere meaning, the king was pacified, & willed him to come to London, where at his comming thither, being the 22 daie of Aprill, he was honorablie receiued, and at his departure with rich gifts highlie honored, ſo that he had alwaie with him to the value of about ſeuen hundred marks as was reported. About this time alſo, Elianor the kings ſiſter (that was ſometime wife vnto William Marſhall earle of Penbroke) was now by the kings meanes married the ſecond time to Simon Montford, a man of high parentage and noble prowеſſe.

The counteſſe of Penbroke, ſiſter to the king married to Simon de Montford. Polydor.

This Simon was indowed with ſuch vertue, good counſell, courteous diſcretion, and other amiable qualities, that he was highlie fauoured as was ſuppoſed, both of God and man: inſomuch that he might right well, as for birth, ſo alſo for education and good demeanour be counted (as he deſerued) a notable Noble man, for he was ſo qualified as ſtandeth with the nature of true nobilitie, according to that of the poet,

——non cenſus, nec clarum nomen auorum,
Sed probitas magnos ingeniúmque facit.

Notwithſtanding all which noble indowments concurring in him, he was baniſhed out of France, vpon diſpleaſure, which Blanch the quéene mother conceiued againſt him. But now comming into England, he was ioifullie receiued of king Henrie, who not onelie gaue vnto him (as aboue is mentioned) his ſiſter in mariage with the earledome of Leiceſter in name of a dowrie, but alſo aduanced him vnto offices of greateſt honour within the realme of England. Howbeit, this marriage was verie diſpleaſant vnto Edmund the archbiſhop of Canturburie, bicauſe that the foreſaid Elianor, after the death of hir firſt huſband, had vowed perpetuall chaſtitie, and betaken hir (as was ſaid) to the mantell and the ring.

The archbiſhop of Canturburie diſpleaſed with the marriage.

As the prelat was not pleaſed with this match, ſo the king was as highlie offended with the archbiſhop for not fauouring the cauſe, inſomuch that the archbiſhop went ſoone after to Rome, where he not onelie complained of certeine iniuries receiued latelie at the kings hands, but alſo ſignified the eſtate of this marriage, to procure a diuorce. In like manner, Richard the kings brother found great fault with the king for the ſame matter, but chieflie, for that he ſtroke it vp without making him and other of the Nobles of councell therein. To be ſhort, it was not long yer this grudge grew ſo far, that ciuill war was verie likelie to haue followed therevpon. But when the king ſaw that all the lords leaned to his brother, he ſought to pacifie the matter by courteous means, and ſo by mediation of the legat, the king and his brother were reconciled, to the great griefe of the lords, which had brought the matter now to that point, that the king could not haue ſo reſiſted their force, but that they were in good hope to haue deliuered the realme out of bondage from all manner of ſtrangers, as well of thoſe Romans that were beneficed men, as of anie other.

He goeth to Rome to cōplaine of the king.

The earle of Cornewall is alſo offended for the ſame marriage. Matth. Paris.

Simon the earle of Leiceſter alſo perceiuing how the matter went, made ſhift another waie to get all the monie he could in preſt or otherwiſe (inſomuch that he had of one burges of Leiceſter, named Simon Curleuath, fiue hundred markes) and leauing his wife in the caſtell of Kelingworth, he ſecretlie departed out of the realme, and got him to Rome, to purchaſe a confirmation of his marriage, which he eaſilie obteined, notwithſtanding the archbiſhop of Canturburies former and verie behement information againſt him, and ſo hauing brought his purpoſe about, in the latter end of this yéere, he returned into England, and was ioifullie receiued, firſt of the king and after of his wife, whome he found at Kelingworth, néere to the time of hir trauell, and ſhortlie after deliuered of a yoong ſonne, whom they called Simon after the name of his father.

The earle of Leiceſter gathereth monie.

At the ſame time, Frederike the emperour going into Italie, had a great number of Engliſh ſouldiers with him, which king Henrie furniſhed for his aid, vnder the leading of a right valiant warriour, named Henrie de Trubleuille, with whome went alſo John Manſell, whoſe valiancie in that iournie well appeared, and William Hardell a citizen of London was treaſurer and paimaiſter to the ſouldiers. Herewith the pope was ſore offended, and wrote his mind thereof to the king, who forthwith returned an eloquent anſwer, requiring him to be more fauourable to the emperour, conſidering his cauſe was ſuch as could not iuſtlie offend his holineſſe. About the ſame time, or rather (as by ſome writers it ſhould appeare) ſomwhat before, the kings ſiſter Joane queene of Scotland, comming into England to ſee hir brother, fell into a ſickneſſe, and died.

Moreouer, the archbiſhop of Canturburie returned into England, who at his comming to Rome, obteined little or nothing touching the ſuit which he had before the pope, for (as ſome haue written) the legat Otho being his heauie freend, had ſo ſtopped the popes eares from hearing any of his complaints, that all his whole trauell did come to none effect. In like manner, Peter des Roches biſhop of Wincheſter died this yeare in his manor at Farnham, about the ninth of June, which prelat had gouerned that ſee about 32 yeares. He was a man of great wiſedome and dexteritie in ordering of weightie affaires touching the ſtate of temporall regiment. He builded manie goodlie monaſteries, as the abbeies of Hales, Tikborne and Seleborne, with the hoſpitall at Porteſmouth. He made alſo a notable teſtament, and beſides his bequeſts which were great, he left his biſhoprike ſo ſtored and throughlie furniſhed, that there was not ſo much diminiſhed of that which he found at his comming in value, as the cattell that ſerued to draw the verie ploughs.

The biſhop of winchester departeth this life.

About this time, a learned eſquire, or rather a clearke of the vniuerſitie of Oxenford, bearing ſome malice toward the king, fained himſelfe mad, and eſpieng thereby the ſecret places of his houſe at Woodſtoke where he then laie, vpon a night by a window he got into the kings bedchamber, and comming to the beds ſide, threw off the couerings, and with a dagger ſtrake diuers times into a pillow, ſuppoſing that the king had beene there, but as GOD would, that night the king laie in another chamber with the queene. In the meane time, one of the queenes chambermaids named Margaret Biſet, hauing eſpied the traitor, made an outcrie, ſo that the K. ſeruants which came to vnderſtand what the matter meant, preſentlie apprehended the ſaid clearke, who being conueied to Couentrie, was there arreigned, and by lawfull proofe had of his malicious intent, was condemned, and executed as a traitor. At his death he confeſſed, that he was ſent from * William de Mariſch the ſonne of Geffrie de Mariſch to murther the king by ſuch manner of means, not caring what had become of himſelfe ſo he might haue diſpatched his purpoſe.

¶ Theſe practiſes of treaſon In ſummo gradu, which cannot be committed without irrecouerable detriment to the whole eſtate (ſpeciallie where ſucceſſion is vncerteine) are of an old brewing, though they be neuer ſo newlie broched. And trulie, if the curſſed miſcreant which vndertaketh an enterpriſe of this qualitie, had the grace to conſider how manie murthers he committeth by implication in giuing the roiall perſon of the prince a deadlie wound; I doubt not, if he were a man and not a ranke diuell, he would be weaned from that outragious villanie. For, in wounding and killing the prince, he is guiltie of homicide, of parricide, of chriſticide, nay of deicide. And therefore a thouſand woes light on his hart that ſhall ſtretch out his hand, naie, that ſhall once conceiue in thought a murther ſo heinous, as both God and nature dooth abhorre; ſpeciallie if it be commenſed againſt a chriſtian prince, and ſuch a one as to whome true and vndefiled religion is no leſſe pretious and deere than life it ſelfe. Princes therefore had need to ſee to the ſafegard of their perſons, ſithens the ſafetie of manie millians dependeth therevpon. For certeine it is, that the ſtate of a poore priuat man is leſſe perillous by manie degrees than the ſtate of a potentat, which is ment by this true allegorie following.

Quatiunt altas ſæpè procellæ,
Aut euertit fortuna domos;
Minùs in paruis fortuna furit,
Raros patitur fulminis ictus

Variance betwixt the king and the earle of Penbroke.

In the three and twentith yeare of his reigne, king Henrie held his Chriſtmaſſe at Wincheſter, where a great grudge aroſe betwixt him and Gilbert the earle of Penbroke, by reaſon that the ſaid earle with his ſeruants (hauing tipſtaues) in their comming to the court, were not ſuffred to enter within the gates but were kept backe by the porters and other. Of which iniurie when he had complained, the king made him ſuch an ouerthwart anſwer, that the earle perceiuing him not to like verie well of his ſeruice, departed forthwith, and rode into the North countrie, ſo that from that day forth, neither he nor his brother Walter loued the king as they ought to haue doone. Soone after this departure of earle Gilbert, vpon Candlemas day the king gaue the earldome of Leiceſter vnto Simon de Mountford, and inueſted him thereinto, hauing firſt pacified earle Almerike that was elder brother to the ſame Simon. Yet about the beginning of the next Auguſt, the king was ſo incenſed againſt earle Simon, that both he and his wife were glad to get them ouer into France, till the kings wrath were more pacified.

Simon earle of Leiceſter fled ouer into France.

Vpon the ſixteenth day of June, the kings eldeſt ſonne named Edward, and after ſurnamed Longſhanke by the Scots in mockage, bicauſe he was a tall and ſlender man, was borne at Weſtminſter, who after his fathers deceaſe, ſucceeded him in the kingdome. ¶ Before the birth of this Edward, there appeared earlie in the morning certeine daies togither before the ſunne was vp, a ſtar of a large compaſſe, the which with ſwift courſe was caried through a long circuit of the aire, ſometimes ſhewing as it had borne fire with it, and ſometimes leauing as it were ſmoke behind it, ſo that it was after iudged, that the great deeds which were to be atchiued by the ſame Edward, were by this wonderfull conſtellation foreſhewed and ſignified.

A ſtrange ſtar.

About the ſame time, by reaſon of an accuſation made by a priſoner againſt Ranulfe Briton (ſometime the kings chancellour, but now leading a priuat life, being a canon of the cathedrall church of ſaint Paule in London) the ſame Ranulfe (by commandement from the king ſent to the maior of the citie William Joiner) was taken out of his houſe, had to the tower, and there impriſoned, wherevpon the deane of Paules, maiſter G. Lucie, in abſence of the biſhop accurſſed all thoſe that had preſumptuouſlie attempted to laie hands on the ſaid Ranulfe, and further, he put his owne church of ſaint Paule vnder interdiction.

Matth. Paris.

Ranulfe Briton taken out of his houſe, and led to the tower.

To conclude, through threatning of excommunication to be pronounced againſt the king, and other for this fact by the legat and the biſhops of the realme as namelie, Canturburie and London, the king was compelled to releaſe and ſet at libertie the foreſaid Ranulfe. Finallie, the priſoner that had accuſed the ſaid Ranulfe and other, being one of the kings purſeuants, when for his wicked doings he came to ſuffer death, openlie confeſſed, how he had accuſed thoſe perſons, onelie in hope to deferre his owne execuſion, being conuicted as acceſſarie to the treaſon of the clearke that ſuffered at Couentrie the laſt yeare. He had accuſed not onelie the ſaid Briton, but diuers of the nobilitie alſo to be priuie and giltie of the ſame conſpiracie. ¶ This yeare for the ſpace of foure moneths togither, fell exceeding great raine, yet at length it began to hold vp about Eaſter.

The legat beginneth to looke to his owne commoditie.

In this while, the lords of the realme practiſed ſundrie drifts likewiſe, as men that would faine haue beene rid of the legats companie: but the king did what he could on the otherſide (by ſending to the pope for licence) to haue him remaine ſtill here, who began now indeed to looke to his owne profit, as by way of procuracies and other meanes, ſo that he got togither great ſummes of monie, although in the beginning he ſeemed to forbeare, and not to ſeeke for anie ſuch gaine. Alſo, he tooke vpon him to beſtow benefices without conſent of the patrones that were temporall men, wherevpon complaint was made to the pope, namelie, by one ſir Robert de Twing, who claimed as patrone the preſentation of the rectorie of Luthun in Yorkeſhire, and could not be permitted to inioy it, by reaſon of the popes prohibition, but vpon the hearing of his title in the popes conſiſtorie, he obteined letters from the pope to be reſtored, and alſo an inhibition, that from thenceforth no perſon ſhould be promoted to anie ſpirituall benefice or church, without conſent of the patrone. The king and the peeres of the realme vnderſtanding themſelues to be touched in this wrong offered to this knight, had written in his fauour to the pope, ſo that his ſuit had the better ſucceſſe.

The Iewes puniſhed by the purſſe.

A ſynod holden at London.

Moreouer, the Iewes in this yeare, for a murther which they had ſecretlie committed, were greeuouſlie puniſhed, namelie by the purſſe to buy their peace, & they were glad to giue the king the third part of all their goods. The legat alſo aſſembled a ſynod of the clergie at London vpon the laſt of Iulie, in the which he demanded procuracies, but the biſhops vpon deliberation had in the matter, anſwered, that the importunatnes of the Romane church had ſo often con-
“ ſumed the goods of the Engliſh church, that they could
“ no longer ſuffer it, and therefore ſaid they; Let them
“ giue you procuracies which vnaduiſedlie haue called “ you into the realme, if they will, for of vs you ſhall
“ be ſure to come by none at all, howbeit he got his demand of the abbats and other religious men.

About the feaſt of the aſſumption of our ladie, Thomas earle of Flanders, vncle to the queene, arriued at Douer, and was receiued of the king with great ioy and gladneſſe, who rode thitherward to meet him, and ſo brought him to London, where the citizens came forth alſo, and meeting him in the waie, brought him into the citie with all honour that might be deuiſed. He did homage to the king (as authors write) and at his departure had in reward fiue hundred marks, and a penſion aſſured him of as much yearelie out of the eſcheker of the kings free gift. This earle Thomas was ſonne to the earle of Sauoy, and a little before his comming into England, he had married Ione counteſſe of Flanders, which had firſt beene coupled in marriage with Ferdinando, as in the life of king Iohn may further appeare.

Baldwin de Riuers earle of the Ile of wight.

In the 24 yeare of his reigne, king Henrie held his Chriſtmaſſe at Wincheſter, where he made Baldwine de Riuers knight, and inueſted him with the right of the earledome of the Ile of Wight, in the preſence of the earle of Cornewall, who procured him this honour, bicauſe he had the wardſhip of him, and married him to his daughter in law the ladie Amicia, that was daughter to his wife the counteſſe of Glouceſter by hir former huſband. The earle of Leiceſter alſo, meaning to go into the holie land, returned out of France, where he had remained a certeine time as an exile, but was now receiued honorablie of the king and other peeres of the realme, and after that he had ſeene the king and doone his dutie as apperteined, he went to his poſſeſſions to make monie for his furniture neceſſarie to be had in that iournie, for the which he ſold at that time his woods about Leiceſter, vnto the knights of the Hoſpitall, and to the canons of Leiceſter, receiuing of them for the ſame about the ſumme of a thouſand pounds.

Leolin prince of wales departeth this life.

About the ſame time, to wit, the 14 of Aprill, died Leolin prince of Wales, and then followed contention betwixt his ſons Griffin and Dauid for the principalitie, which at length Dauid obteined through king Henries ſupport (though he were the yonger brother) bicauſe he was begot in lawfull bed on the ſiſter of king Henrie. The whole countrie of Wales was maruellouſlie in trouble about their quarels. At length, a daie of meeting was appointed betwixt them, to grow by waie of talke vnto ſome quiet end; and Griffin meaning no deceit, came in peaceable wiſe with Richard biſhop of Bangor and others to the place aſſigned, where they ſhould haue met. But Dauid by a traine tooke Griffin, and committed him to priſon, wherevpon afterwards, the yeare inſuing, by continuall plaint and earneſt ſute of the biſhop of Bangor, king Henrie entred Wales with an armie, and conſtreined Dauid to ſubmit himſelfe, and to deliuer the ſaid Griffin into his hands, and further alſo to put in ſuerties to appeare at London, there to receiue ſuch order in the kings courts, as to him by law ſhould be orderlie awarded. Griffin ap Maddocke and diuerſe other great lords of Wales ioined with the king in this iournie againſt Dauid, as in the next yeare ye ſhall further heare.

Griffin ap Maddocke.

King Henrie aided the pope with monie againſt the emperour.

About the ſame time, there was great ſtrife and contention ſtill remaining betwixt the emperour Frederike and pope Innocent the fourth that ſucceeded Celeſtine the fourth, in ſomuch that ſore and mortall warre followed. But king Henrie by the procurement of the legat Otho, aided the pope with monie, though he was ſomewhat loth to doo it, bicauſe the ſaid emperour had married his ſiſter. Indeed, the emperour wrote to the king to ſtaie his hand, but the diligence of that legat was ſuch in furthering his maſters buſineſſe, that the monie was gone ouer yer the emperours letters came. At this time alſo, Edmund the archbiſhop of Canturburie greatlie diſalowed the often exactions and ſubſidies which the legat cauſed dailie to be leuied of the Engliſh clergie. Howbeit, in hope to haue his purpoſe the rather againſt the monks of Canturburie, with whom he was at variance, he firſt granted to the legats requeſt made on the popes behalfe in a ſynod holden at Reading, for the hauing of the fift part of ſpirituall mens reuenues, and ſo by his example others were inforced to doo the like.

Furthermore he gaue eight hundred marks to the pope, but whether of his owne free will, or by conſtreint, I cannot ſaie; but now vtterlie miſliking all things doone by the legat contrarie to his mind, after he had doone and ſaid what he could for redreſſe, and when he ſaw no hope at hand for anie reformation either in the king or legat, who eſteemed not his words, as a man not longer able to ſee his countrie ſo ſpoiled, he went ouer into France, and got him vnto Pontney, there to remaine in voluntarie exile, after the example of his predeceſſour Thomas Becket, whoſe doings he did follow in verie manie things. Verelie the collections of monie, which the pope in theſe daies by his legats gathered here in this realme, were great and ſundrie, ſo that (as it appeareth by hiſtoriographers of this time) the cleargie and other found themſelues ſore grieued, and repined not a little againſt ſuch couetous dealings and vnmeaſurable

And ſuerlie he is not worthie of a priuilege which abuſeth the ſame being granted. The king anſwered thoſe that went thus about to perſuade him, that he neither would nor durſt gainſaie the pope in any thing: and ſo the people were brought into miſerable deſpaire.

The cauſes that moued archbiſhop Edmund to depart the realme.

There be that write how that there were other occaſions of the archbiſhops departure out of the relme of the which this ſhould be one; when he ſaw religion not to be regarded, and that preeſts were had in no honor, neither that it laie in his power to reforme the matter, ſith the king gaue no eare to his admonitions, he determined to abſent himſelfe till the king (warned by ſome miſhap) ſhould repent him of his errours, and amend his miſdoings. Other ioine an other cauſe herevnto, which was this; whereas the king by the inſample of other kings (begun by William Rufus) vſed to keepe biſhops ſees, and other ſuch ſpirituall poſſeſſions in his hands, during the vacation, till a conuenient perſon were to the ſame preferred, the archbiſhop Edmund, for that he ſaw long delaies made oftentimes yer any could be admitted to the roome of thoſe that were deceaſſed, or by any other means depriued, he was in hand with the king, that the archbiſhop of Canturburie might haue power onlie to prouide for ſucceſſors in ſuch roomes as chanced to be vacant, aboue the tearme of ſix moneths, which thing the king for a certeine ſumme of monie granted: but afterward perceiuing what hinderance he ſuſteined thereby, he reuoked that grant, ſo much to the diſpleaſure of the archbiſhop, that he thought good no longer to continue in the realme.

At his comming to Pontney, he ſo ſeemed to deſpiſe all worldlie pompe and honor, giuing himſelfe wholie to diuine contemplation, to faſting and praier, that the former opinion, which men had conceiued of his vertues, was maruellouſlie confirmed. At length being ſore vexed with ſickneſſe, ſuppoſing that he might recouer helth by changing of aire and place, he cauſed himſelfe to be conueied into an other houſe of religion, named Soiſie, two daies iournie from Pontney, where finallie he died the ſixteenth of Nouember, and his bodie was brought againe to Pontney, and there buried, where alſo through ſundrie miracles ſhewed (as they ſay) at his graue, he was reputed a ſaint, and at length canonized by pope Innocent the fourth. He was borne at Abingdon, beſide Oxenford, and thereby ſome named him ſaint Edmund of Abingdon, and ſome S. Edmund of Pontney, after the place where he was inſhrined. The ſee of Canturburie was void more than three yeares after his deceaſe, till at length by the kings commandement, the monks of Canturburie elected one Boniface of Sauoie vncle to queene Elianor, being the 45 archbiſhop which ruled that church.

A Charterhouſe monke apprehended.

¶There was this yeare a certeine perſon of honeſt conuerſation, and ſober, repreſenting in habit one of the Carthuſian monks, taken at Cambridge, being accuſed for that he refuſed to come to the church to heare diuine ſeruice, and vpon his examination, bicauſe he anſwered otherwiſe than was thought conuenient, he was committed to ſecret priſon, and ſhortlie after ſent vp to the legat to be of him examined. This man openlie proteſted, that Gregorie was not the true pope, nor head of the church, but that there was another head of the church, and that the church was defiled, ſo that no ſeruice ought to be ſaid therein, except the ſame were newlie dedicated, and the veſſels and veſtments againe hallowed and conſecrated; The diuell (ſaid he) is loſed, & the pope is an heretike, for Gregorie, which nameth himſelfe pope, hath polluted the church.

Herevpon (in the preſence and audience of the abbat of Eueſham, maiſter Nic. de Fernham, and diuerſe other worſhipfull perſonages) the legat ſaid vnto him being thus out of the waie; Is not power granted to our ſouereigne lord the pope from aboue, both to loſe and bind ſoules, ſith he executeth the roome of S. Peter vpon earth? Now when all men looked to heare what anſwer he would make, beleeuing his iudgement to depend vpon the ſame, he ſaid by way of interrogation, and not by way of aſſertion; How can I beleeue, that vnto a perſon ſpotted with ſimonie and vſurie, and haplie wrapt in more greeuous ſins, ſuch power ſhould be granted as was granted vnto holie Peter, who immediatlie followed the lord, as ſoone as he was made his apoſtle, and followed him not onelie in bodilie footſteps, but in cleereneſſe of vertues. At which word the legat bluſhed, & ſaid to ſome of the ſtanders by; A man ought not to chide with a foole, nor gape ouer an ouen.

In this ſeaſon the king ſent his iuſtices itinerants in circuit about the land, the which vnder pretext of iuſtice puniſhed manie perſons, and ſo leuied great ſummes of monie to the kings vſe. Sir William of Yorke prouoſt of Beuerley was aſſigned to viſit the ſouth parts, and ſir Robert de Lexinton the north parts. Alſo Richard earle of Cornewall the kings brother, with a nauie of ſhips ſailed into Syria, where in the warres againſt the Saracens, he greatlie aduanced the part of the chriſtians. There went ouer with him the earle of Saliſburie William Longeſpee, and William Baſſet, Iohn Beauchampe, Geffrey de Lucie, Iohn Neuill, Geffrey Beauchampe, Peter de Breuſe, and William Furniuall. The erle of Montford alſo went ouer the ſame time: but where the earle of Cornewall tooke the ſea at Marſiles, the earle of Leiceſter paſſed through Italie, and tooke the water at Brandize, and with him went theſe perſons of name, Thomas de Furniuall, with his brother Gerard de Furniuall, Hugh Wake, Almerike de S. Aumond, Wiſchard Ledet, Punchard de Dewin, and William de Dewin that were brethren, Gerard Peſmes, Fouke de Baugie, and Peter de Chauntenaie. Shortlie after alſo, Iohn earle of Albemarle, William Fortis, and Peter de Mallow a Poictouin, men for their valiancie greatlie renowmed, went thither, leading with them a great number of chriſtian ſouldiors.

In this yeare and vpon the day of S. Remigius, was the church of S. Paule in the citie of London dedicated by Roger biſhop of that citie, the king and a great number of biſhops and other Noble men being preſent, which were feaſted the ſame day by the ſaid biſhop Roger and the canons. Moreouer, there died the ſame yeare the counteſſe Iſabell, wife to Richard earle of Cornewall, and two earles, William earle Warren, and Iohn earle of Lincolne, alſo the lord Iohn Fitz Robert, one of the cheefe barons in all the north parts of the realme. ¶Alſo in Februarie there appeared a comet or blaſing ſtarre verie dreadfull to behold, for the ſpace of thirtie daies togither. Moreouer, on the coaſt of England there was a great battell amongſt the fiſhes of the ſea, ſo that there were eleauen whales or thirlepooles caſt on land, beſide other huge and monſtruous fiſhes, which appeared to be dead of ſome hurts; and one of thoſe mightie fiſhes, comming into the Thames aliue, was purſued by the fiſhers, and could ſcarſe paſſe through the arches of London bridge. There was alſo a great ſound heard this yeare in ſundꝛie parts of England at one ſelfe time, as if it had beene the noiſe of ſome mightie mountaine that had fallen into the ſea. And vpon the ſeuenth of Maie there chanced a great boiſterous wind that ſoꝛe troubled the ſkie.

An oth receiued.

This yeare the king cauſed the citizens of London, and the gardians of the cinque poꝛts, and manie other to receiue an oth to be true and faithfull to his ſonne pꝛince Edward. The friers pꝛeachers and minoꝛs, and other men of the church that were diuines, abſolued ſuch as had taken on them the croſſe, receiuing of them ſo much monie as would ſuffice to haue boꝛne their charges in that iournie, and this not without ſlander redounding to the church. The ſame meanes to get monie was pꝛactiſed alſo by the legat Otho, hauing authoꝛitie therto of the pope. The ſame yeare the ſeneſhall of Aquitaine came ouer to the king, and let him know, that if timelie pꝛouiſion were not had, all thoſe countries on the further ſide of the ſea wold be loſt. No other incident chanced the ſame yeare neither in warre abꝛoad, noꝛ in the ſtate of gouernement of the common-wealth at home, whereof any great accompt is to be made, but that the legat Otho got great ſummes of monie diuerſe waies, of religious men to the popes behoofe: wherevpon certeine abbats made complaints to the king, but in place of comfoꝛt they receiued diſcomfoꝛt, & after knowledge thereof giuen to the legat, he was moꝛe extreame with them than he was befoꝛe.

Peter Roſſo.

Shoꝛtlie after one of the popes familiars and kinſman named maſter Peter Roſſo came from Rome, taking England in his waie to go into Scotland, and vſed in both ſuch diligence in the popes cauſe, that he got a fifteenth granted here, which he ſpeedilie gathered. About the ſame time one Peter de Supino was ſent into Ireland, and there likewiſe he got a vintieſme, bꝛinging from theſe the ſumme of 115 marks, and aboue. But the collection which Peter Roſſo got out of the Scottiſh confines doubled that ſumme, as was thought. In his returne alſo from thence, viſiting the houſes of religion, and ſearching the conſciences of religious perſons, by new ſhifts he craftilie got yet moꝛe monie to the popes vſe, cauſing them to ſweare to keepe this myſterie ſecret, as it were ſome pꝛiuitie of confeſſion foꝛ the ſpace of one halfe yeare, whereby he turned the harts of manie men from the loue of the church of Rome, wounding them with great greefe and remoꝛſe of conſcience to ſee this pillage.

Peter de Supino got a vintieſme, that is the 20 part of pꝛeeſts benefices.

In the 25 yeare of his reigne, king Henrie kept his Chꝛiſtmaſſe at Weſtminſter, at which time the legat was ſent foꝛ to returne vnto Rome, and after he had beene honoꝛablie feaſted of the king, on the 4 daie of Chꝛiſtmaſſe he departed from London towards the ſea ſide, after he had remained here aboue thꝛee yeares. Peter of Sauoie that was vncle to the queene came into England, and was honoꝛablie receiued and interteined of king Henrie, who had giuen to him the earledome of Richmont. His ſonne Boniface was this yeare alſo elected archbiſhop of Canturburie, a tall gentleman and of a goodlie perſonage, but neither ſo learned noꝛ otherwiſe meet foꝛ that roome. But ſuch was the kings pleaſure, who in fauour of the queene, to whom he was coſen germane ſought to aduance him, and getting the popes fauour in that behalfe, pꝛocured the monks & biſhops to grant their conſents, although much againſt their minds, if they might haue had their owne wils.

The earle of Coꝛnewall returning out of the holie land in ſafetie, after he had ſettled things there, by concluding an abſtinence of warre betwixt the Saracens and chꝛiſtians about the octaues of S. John Baptiſt, he arriued in Sicill, and hearing there in what place the emperour as then ſoiourned, he repaired vnto him, of whom and of his ſiſter the empreſſe he was moſt ioifullie receiued. Within a few daies after, he went to the court of Rome, to trie if he might dꝛiue ſome agreement betwixt the emperour and the pope, but finding the pope too hard, and nothing confoꝛmable, except he might haue had all his owne will (which was, that the emperour ſhould haue ſubmitted himſelfe to the popes pleaſure, and ſtand vnto what ſoeuer oꝛder the church ſhould appoint) he returned backe to the emperour without concluding any thing with the pope, declaring vnto him as he had found. After this he remained two moneths with the emperour, & then taking his leaue was honoured with great gifts at his departure, and ſo returning towards England, at length arriued at the towne of Douer on the moꝛrow after the feaſt of the Epiphanie in the yeare following.

About the ſame time that the earle of Coꝛnewall was in his returne foꝛth of the holie land, new wars ſuddenlie aroſe in Wales, which happened well foꝛ king Henrie. There were diuerſe of the Welſhmen that could not well like of the gouernement of Dauid, and therefoꝛe ſoꝛe lamenting the captiuitie of his bꝛother Griffin, whom befoꝛe (as ye haue heard) he had by a traine taken and kept ſtill as pꝛiſoner, began to make warre vpon the ſaid Dauid, and thoſe that tooke his part, the which on the other ſide ſought to oppꝛeſſe their aduerſaries, ſo that there inſued much bloudſhed and ſlaughter betweene the parties. The wife alſo of the ſaid Griffin, and ſuch other noble men as were become enimies vnto Dauid, ſent and wꝛit vnto king Henrie, requiring his aid, that Griffin might be deliuered out of his bꝛothers hands, pꝛomiſing him great helpe and furtherance, with large conditions of ſubmiſſion, and aſſurance furthermoꝛe to be at his commandement, and to receiue him foꝛ their true and ſoucreigne loꝛd.

Warres betweene the Welſhmen.

King Henrie goeth into Wales with an armie.

King Henrie vnderſtanding all their doings and intents, thought that this contention betweene the two bꝛethꝛen foꝛ the title of Wales would ſerue verie well foꝛ his purpoſe, and therefoꝛe he haſted foꝛth with a ſpeedie armie of men in that countrie, purpoſing to reduce the ſame vnder his obeiſance. Herewith Senena oꝛ Guenhera, the wife of Griffin (and other of the Welſh Nobilitie, that tooke part with hir) concluded a league with king Henrie, vpon certeine conditions as the ſame are conteined in an inſtrument oꝛ charter, the tenour whereof beginneth as followeth.

Conuenit inter dominum Henricum tertium regem Anglorum illuſtrem ex vna parte, & Senenam vxorem Griffini, filij Leolini, quondàm principis Northwalliæ, quem Dauid frater eius tenet carceri mancipatum, cum Owino filio ſuo, nomine eiuſdem Griff. ex altera, &c.

Articles of agreement betweene Henrie the third of that name, king of England of the one partie, and Senena the wife of Griffin, the ſonne of Leolin, ſometimes prince of Northwales, whom Dauid his brother deteineth in priſon, with Owen his ſonne, in the name of the ſaid Griffin of the other partie.

In pꝛimis, the ſaid Senena vndertaketh, that the ſaid Griffin hir husband will giue vnto the king ſix hundꝛed markes, vpon condition that the king doo cauſe the ſaid Griffin and Owen his ſonne to be deliuered from the pꝛiſon wherein they are kept, and will ſtand to the iudgement of the kings court, whether by law he ought to be impriſoned or no.

2 Item the ſaid Griffin and his heires will ſtand to the iudgement of the kings court, for and concerning that portion of the inheritance of the ſaid Leolin his father, which of right ought to apperteine vnto him.

3 Item the ſaid Senena vndertaketh for the ſaid Griffin and his heires, that the ſaid Griffin and his heires ſhall yeeld and paie yearelie to the king for the ſame lands, the ſumme of thrée hundred markes. Whereof the firſt third part to be paid in monie, the ſecond in kine, and the third in horſſes, by the eſtimation of indifferent men, and the ſame to be paid yearlie at Michaelmas and Eaſter by euen portions, by the hands of the ſhiriffe of the countie of Salop for the time being.

4 Item the ſaid Senena vndertaketh further for the ſaid Griffin and his heires, that they and euerie of them ſhall obſerue the peace againſt the ſaid Dauid, and ſuffer him quietlie to inioy ſuch portion of his fathers inheritance as to him ſhall be found to be due.

5 Item the ſaid Senena doth further vndertake for the ſaid Griffin hir huſband and his heires, that in caſe anie Welſhman hereafter ſhall happen to rebell againſt the king, they at their owne coſts and charges ſhall compell the ſaid offendor to make ſatiſfaction to the king for his diſobedience.

6 Item for the performance of the premiſſes, the ſaid Senena will deliuer vnto the lord the king, Dauid and Roderike hir ſonnes for pledges, with prouiſo that if the ſaid Griffin and Owen or either of them ſhall happen to die before their deliuerie out of the ſaid priſon, it ſhall be lawfull for the ſaid Senena to haue one of hir ſonnes releaſed, the other remaining with the king for pledge.

7 Item the ſaid Senena hath ſworne vpon the holie Euangeliſt, that the ſaid Griffin hir huſband and his heires, and euerie of them ſhall accompliſh and performe all the premiſſes on their behalfe, and further vndertaketh that the ſaid Griffin hir huſband, vpon his deliuerie out of priſon, ſhall take the ſame oth.

8 Item the ſaid Senena in the name of the ſaid Griffin hir huſband, ſubmitteth hir ſelfe concerning the obſeruation of the premiſſes vnto the iuriſdiction of the reuerend fathers the biſhops of Hereford and Lichfield, ſo that the ſaid biſhops or either of them at the kings requeſt ſhall compell the ſaid Griffin and his heires to obſerue all and ſingular the premiſſes on their behalfe, by ſentence of excommunication vpon their perſons, and interdiction vpon their lands.

9 Laſtlie, the ſaid Senena doth vndertake and promiſe (Bona fide) to ſée and procure the full performance of all the premiſſes, and that the ſaid Griffin hir huſband and his heires ſhall allow and performe the ſame, and thereof ſhall deliuer his inſtrument in writing to the king in forme aforeſaid. To this charter both parties put their ſeales, Griffin and Senena to that part which remained with the king, and the K. to that part which remained with Senena.

Finallie, for the performance of the articles in this inſtrument or writing conteined, the ſaid ladie in name of hir huſband, procured diuerſe Noble men to become ſuerties or pledges, that is to ſaie, Ralfe de Mortimer, Walter de Clifford, Roger de Monthualt ſeneſhall of Cheſter, Mailgun ap Mailgun, Meredoc ap Robert, Griffin ap Maddoc of Bromefield, Houwell and Meredoc brethren, Griffin ap Wenuwen: which perſons vndertooke for the ſaid ladie, that the couenants on hir part ſhould be performed, and therupon they alſo bound themſelues by their writings obligatorie vnto the ſaid king, in forme following.

Omnibus hoc ſcriptum viſuris Rogerus de monte alto ſeneſcallus Ceſtriæ ſalutem. Sciatis quod ego me conſtitui plegium, &c.

TO all and ſingular, to whome this writing ſhall come, Roger de monte alto the ſteward of Cheſter ſendeth greeting. Know yee that I haue conſtituted my ſelfe pledge for Senena the wife of Griffin the ſonne of Leolin, ſometimes prince of Northwales, and haue vndertaken for hir to our ſouereigne lord Henrie king of England, that the ſaid Senena ſhall accompliſh and performe all and ſingular thoſe couenants and articles, agreed vpon betweene our ſaid ſouereigne lord and the ſaid Senena, for and concerning the deliuerance of the ſaid Griffin hir huſband and Owen his ſonne out of the priſon of Dauid his brother, and the portion of inheritance due vnto the ſaid Griffin, which the ſaid Dauid keepeth from him by force. In witneſſe whereof to this preſent writing I haue put my ſeale. Dated at Salop, the mondaie before the feaſt of the Aſcenſion of the bleſſed virgin Marie, in the 15 yeare of his reigne.

But now to our purpoſe. When Dauid vnderſtood of the kings approach with ſo puiſſant an armie, he was brought into great perplexitie, and the more in déed, not onelie bicauſe there chanced the ſame yeare for the ſpace of foure moneths togither a great drouth, ſo that the mariſhes and bogges were dried vp and made paſſable for the kings people, but alſo for that manie of the Welſh Nobilitie, as chéefelie Griffin Maddoc and others, ſought his deſtruction in fauour of his brother Griffin (whoſe deliuerance they earneſtlie wiſhed) and for that he ſtood excommunicate by the pope. All which things well conſidered, cauſed him to doubt of a further miſchéefe to hang ouer his head: wherevpon he ſent to the king, ſignifieng that he would deliuer his brother Griffin fréelie into his hands, but letting him withall to wit by manie good reaſons, that if he did ſet him at libertie, he ſhould miniſter manie new occaſions of continuall warres.

Dauid driuen to his wits end.

Moreouer, this couenant Dauid required at the kings hands, that the king ſhould reſerue him ſo to his peace vnder the bond of fidelitie and hoſtages, that he ſhould not diſherit him: which when as the king courteouſlie granted, Dauid ſent vnto him his brother Griffin, to diſpoſe of him as he ſhould thinke requiſite. The king receiuing him, ſent him to London, vnder the conduct of ſir Iohn de Lexinton, togither with other mo (whome he had receiued as hoſtages both of Dauid and others the Nobles of Wales) appointing them to be kept in ſafetie within the tower there. There was alſo a charter or déed made by the ſame Dauid vnto king Henrie, conteining the articles, couenants, and grants made betwixt the ſaid prince and the foreſaid Dauid, as followeth.

Dauid deliuereth his brother to the K.

The charter of the articles of Dauids ſubmiſſion to the king.

Omnibus Chriſti fidelibus, ad quos præſentes literæ peruenerint, Dauid filius Leolini ſalutem. Sciatis quòd conceſſi domino meo Henrico regi Angliæ illuſtri, &c.

1 TO all chriſtian people, to whom theſe preſent letters ſhall come, Dauid the ſonne of Leolin ſendeth gréeting. Know ye that I haue granted and promiſed to deliuer liuer vnto the lord Henrie the noble king of England, Griffin my brother with his ſonne and heire whom I keepe in priſon, and all other priſoners, who by occaſion of the ſaid Griffin lie in durance.

2 Item I ſhall ſtand to the iudgement of the kings court, aſwell in that caſe, whether the ſaid Griffin ought to be deteined priſoner or no, as alſo for and concerning the part of the inheritance of the ſaid Leolin my father, claimed by the ſaid Griffin according to the cuſtomes of Wales: ſo that the peace be mainteined betweene me and the ſaid Griffin.

3 Item I and the ſaid Griffin, and either of vs ſhall hold our portions of land, of our ſaid ſoueraigne the king in Capite, acknowleging him chiefe lord therof.

4 Item I ſhall reſtore vnto Roger de monte alto ſteward of Cheſter, his land of Montalt or Mould, with the appurtenances.

5 Item I ſhall likewiſe reſtore to all other barons, all ſuch lands, lordſhips and caſtels, as were taken from them ſince the beginning of the warres betweene the lord Iohn king of England, and the ſaid Leolin prince of Wales my father, ſauing the right of all couenants and grants by writing, to be reſerued vnto the iudgement and determination of the kings court.

6 Item I ſhall giue and reſtore vnto our ſoueraigne lord the king all his charges in this preſent voiage laid out.

7 Item I ſhall make ſatiſfaction for all damages & iniuries doone by me, or anie of my ſubiects vnto the king or his, according to the conſideration of the kings court, and ſhall deliuer ſuch as ſhalbe malefactours in that behalfe.

8 Item I ſhall reſtore vnto the ſaid lord the king all the homages, which the late king Iohn his father had, & which the ſaid lord the king of right ought to haue, eſpeciallie of all the noble men of Wales: and if the king ſhall ſet at libertie anie of his captiues, the poſſeſſions of that man ſhall remaine to the king.

9 Item the land of Elſmer with the appurtenances ſhall remaine to the lord the king and his heires for euer.

10 Item I ſhall not receiue or ſuffer to be receiued within my countrie of Wales, any of the ſubiects of England, outlawed or baniſhed by the ſaid lord the king, or his barons of Mercia.

11 Item for confirmation and performance of all and ſingular the premiſſes on my behalfe, I ſhall prouide by bonds and pledges, and by all other waies and meanes as the ſaid lord the king ſhall award, and will accompliſh the commandement of the ſaid king, and will obeie his lawes.

In witneſſe whereof to this preſent writing I haue put my ſeale: dated at Alnet by the riuer of Elwey, in the feaſt of the decollation of S. Iohn Baptiſt, in the fiue & twentith yeere of the reigne of the ſaid king. For the obſeruation of theſe 11 articles, the ſaid prince Dauid and Ednivet Vachan were ſworne. Alſo the ſaid prince Dauid ſubmitted himſelfe to the iuriſdiction of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and of the biſhops of London, Hereford, and Couentrie, for the time being. That all, or one of them, whom the king ſhall appoint, may excommunicate him, and interdict his land vpon breach of anie the ſaid articles. And therevpon he procured the biſhops of S. Bangor, and S. Aſaph to make their charters to the lord the king, whereby they granted to execute and denounce all ſentences, aſwell of excommunication as of interdiction ſent from the foreſaid archbiſhop, biſhops, or anie of them.

The ſaid Dauid alſo ſent priuilie to the king, to deſire him that he would ſuffer him being his nephue, and the lawfull heire of Leolin his father, to inioy the principalitie of Wales rather than Griffin, which was but a baſtard, and no kin vnto the king. Giuing him withall to vnderſtand, that in caſe he did ſet Griffin at libertie, he ſhould be ſure to haue the war renewed. Wherevpon the king knowing theſe things to be true, and vnderſtanding alſo that Griffin was a valiant ſtout man, and had manie freends and fauourers of his cauſe, inclined rather to aſſent vnto Dauids requeſt than otherwiſe to be in danger of further troubles, & therfore willinglie granted the ſame.

Shortlie after Dauid did ſend his brother Griffin vnto the king, and other pledges for himſelfe, for performance of the ſaid articles, whom the king ſent forthwith to the towre of London, there to be ſafelie kept, allowing to Griffin a noble a daie for his finding. And within few daies after Michaelmas, prince Dauid comming to the kings court did his homage, and ſwore fealtie, who for ſo doing, and in that he was the kings nephue, was ſent home againe in peace. When Griffin ſaw how all things went, and that he was not like to be ſet at libertie, he began to deuiſe waies and meanes to eſcape out of priſon.

Wherefore deceiuing the watch one night, he made a long line of hangings, couerings, and ſheets, and hauing gotten out at a window, let downe himſelfe by the ſame from the top of the towre: but by reaſon that he was a mightie perſonage and full of fleſh, the line brake with the weight of his bodie, and ſo falling downe headlong of a great height, his necke and head was driuen into his bodie with the fall: whoſe miſerable carcaſſe being found the morow after, was a pitifull ſight to the beholders. The king being certified thereof, commanded Griffins ſonne to be better looked vnto, and puniſhed the officers for their negligence.

Matth.Paris, page,830.

About the ſame time there chanced a controuerſie to riſe betwixt the king and the biſhop of Lincolne, for the beſtowing of the benefice of Thame, the which Iohn Manſell the kings chapleine had gotten in poſſeſſion by the kings fauour, through prouiſion granted of the pope, where the biſhop alleging priuileges to the contrarie, had granted it to an other. At length the king hauing his fathers trouble before his eies, and doubting the biſhops words, threatning ſome euill miſhap to follow, if he ſhould ſtand long in the matter againſt the ſaid biſhop, gaue ouer his tenour: and therewithall prouided Iohn Manſell of a farre more rich benefice, that is to ſaie, of the perſonage of Maidſtone, whereinto the biſhop ſpeedilie inueſted him.

Iohn Manſell.

This yeare manie noble men ended their liues, as well ſuch as were gone with the earles of Cornewall and Leiceſter into the holie land, and others remaining ſtill at home. Amongſt which number were theſe: William Fortz earle of Albemarle, Walter Lacie, one of the chiefeſt nobles in all Ireland, Stephan de Segraue, Gilbert de Baſſet and his ſonne and heire named alſo Gilbert. Moreouer, Iohn Biſet high iuſtice of the foreſts, and Peter de Mallow, Hugh Wake, Robert Marmion, Peter de Bruis, Guiſcharde Laider, Euſtace Stoutuill, Eudo Hamon ſurnamed Peccham, Baldwin de Betun, Iohn Fitz Iohn ſteward in houſehold to earle Richard, Iohn de Beaulieu, Gerard de Furniuall. There died alſo the ladie Elianor the counteſſe of Britaine, wife vnto Geffrey, that was ſometime earle of Britaine (which counteſſe had beene long kept priſoner at Briſtow) with diuerſe other.

Moreouer, there died this yeare Roger biſhop of London, and Hugh biſhop of Cheſter. Alſo Gilbert Marſhall earle of Penbroke, in a torneie which he had attempted at Hereford againſt the kings licence, was by an vnrulie horſſe caſt, and ſo hurt, that immediatlie he died thereof. Neither was this yeare onelie mournefull to England for the loſſe of ſuch high eſtates, but alſo in other places manie notable perſonages departed out of this tranſitorie life. As two popes, Gregorie the ninth and his ſucceſſour Celeſtine the fourth, beſides cardinals: amongſt the which, Robert Somercote an Engliſh man was one. ¶ About the later end of this 25 yeare, the ſixt daie of October, there appeared a right ſore eclipſe of the ſunne, verie ſtrange to the beholders. ¶ In the 26 yeare died the empreſſe Iſabell, wife vnto Frederike the emperour.

1242

In this yeare alſo began the wars againe betwixt king Henrie, and Lewes the king of France, for the quarell of Hugh earle of March, who refuſed to doo homage vnto Alfonſe the brother of king Lewes, which Alfonſe had married the onelie daughter and heire of Raimund earle of Tholouſe, and therefore ſhould ſucceed the ſame earle in his eſtate and inheritance. His brother king Lewes had alſo giuen vnto him the earledome of Poictou, with all the lands of Aluergne: and bicauſe the earle of March would not doo homage vnto him, king Lewes made warre vpon the earle of March, who therupon ſought to procure king Henrie (whoſe mother he had married) to come ouer with an armie vnto his aid.

Wars renued betwixt the kings of England & France. The earle of March. Gaguinus. Matth. Weſt.

King Henrie being ſollicited with letters, not onelie from his father in law, but alſo from diuerſe other noble men of Poictou, who willinglie would haue beene vnder his gouernement, aſked aduiſe of his councell what he ought to doo in the matter. Some were of opinion, that ſith there had beene a truce taken betwixt the kings, it were not reaſon in anie wiſe to breake the ſame: but ſome other thought, that ſith the Frenchmen in times paſt had taken from king Iohn his lawfull heritage in Normandie and Poictou, and wrongfullie deteined the ſame ſtill in their poſſeſſion without reſtitution, it could not be at anie time vnlawfull vpon occaſion giuen to recouer the ſame out of their hands. This opinion was allowed for good, and the beſt that might be both of the king & alſo of the earle of Cornewall, who was latelie returned from his iournie which he had made into the holie land.

Sundrie opinions in the kings counſellers.

But now all the ſtaie reſted in gathering of monie, which being earneſtlie demanded in a parlement begun at Weſtminſter the tueſdaie before Candlemaſſe, was as ſtiffilie denied, alledging in excuſe their often paiments of ſubſidies and releeſes, which had beene gathered ſith the comming of the king to his crowne, as the thirteenth, fifteenth, ſixteenth and fortieth parts of all their moueable goods, beſides charugage, hidage, and ſundrie eſcuages, namelie the great eſcuage granted for the marriage of his ſiſter the empreſſe: and alſo beſide the thirtieth within foure yeares laſt paſt, or thereabouts, granted to him, which they thought remained vnſpent, bicauſe it could not be vnderſtood about what neceſſarie affaires for the common-wealth it ſhould be laid forth and imploied, whereas the ſame was leuied vpon condition, that it ſhould remaine in certeine caſtels, and not to be expended but by the aduiſe of foure peeres of the realme, as the earle of Warren, and others. Moreouer, they alledged, that the eſcheats and amercements which had beene gathered of late were ſuch as muſt needs fill the kings coffers: & ſo to conclude, they would not conſent to grant any ſubſidie.

Charugage a certeine dutie for euerie plowland.

Howbeit, the king ſo handled the matter with the richer ſort, and namelie thoſe of the ſpiritualtie, that partlie by gift and partlie by borrowing, he got togither a great maſſe of treaſure, and ſo prepared an armie and ſhips to paſſe ouer into Gaſcoine with all conuenient ſpeed. In the meane time, bicauſe he would leaue things in more ſuertie at home, he ſent the biſhop of Durham into Scotland, by whoſe diligence a marriage was concluded betwixt the lord Alexander eldeſt ſonne to the king of Scots, and the ladie Margaret daughter to king Henrie. Moreouer the marſhes of England adioining to Scotland were committed to the king of Scots as warden of the ſame, to keepe and defend whileſt king Henrie ſhould abide in the parts beyond the ſeas. The archbiſhop of Yorke, in the kings abſence, was alſo appointed cheefe gouernour of the realme.

When this prouiſion was once readie, about the middeſt of Maie, the king tooke the ſea, togither with the queene his wife, his brother Richard earle of Cornewall, and ſeauen other earles, and about three hundred knights or men of armes. The Poictouins had written to him that he needed not bring ouer with him any great armie of men, but rather plentie of monie to reteine ſuch as he ſhould find there readie to ſerue him at his comming. Whervpon he tooke with him thirtie barrels of ſterling coine: and at length (but not without contrarie winds) he arriued on the coaſt of Gaſcoine, in the mouth of the riuer of Garon, and taking land, was ioifullie receiued of the people, and namelie of Reignold lord of Pons.

The king paſſeth ouer into France.

The French king aduertiſed that the king of England was come ouer into France, to the aid of the earle of March, and other his ſubiects againſt him, prepared a mightie armie, in the which were reckoned to be to the number of foure thouſand men of armes, well prouided and armed at all points, beſides twentie thouſand eſquires, gentlemen, yeomen and croſſebowes: and with the ſame immediatlie he entred the dominions of the earle of March, and tooke from him diuerſe townes and caſtels, as Fountney, wherein he tooke one of the earls ſonnes: alſo Meruant with diuers other. In the meane while the king of England was aduanced forward and come neere vnto Tailborge, lieng with his armie in the faire medow by the riuer ſide of Charent faſt by the caſtell of Thonay: & he had there with him in campe ſixteene hundred knights, or rather men of armes, and twentie thouſand footmen, with ſeauen hundred that bare croſſebows. He made there his two halfe brethren, the ſonnes of the earle of March knights, and gaue to the one of them fiue hundred marks, and to the other ſix hundred marks yearelie, to be paid out of his eſcheker, till he had otherwiſe prouided for them in lands and reuenues equall to that penſion.

Now the French king being aduertiſed that king Henrie laie thus neere to Tailborge, marched thitherwards with all his puiſſance latelie reenforced with new ſupplies, and approching to Tailborge, had the towne deliuered vnto him. This chanced about the latter end of Iulie. Then after the French king had gotten poſſeſſion of Tailborge, he ment to paſſe the water, and if by mediation of a truce politikelie procured by the earle of Cornewall (and as it were at a narrow pinch) the king of England had not found means to remoue in the night ſeaſon, he had beene in great danger to haue beene taken, through want of ſuch aid as he looked to haue had at the hands of the Poictouins and other his confederats. But yet he got awaie (though with ſome ſtaine of honour) and withdrew to Xainctes, whither alſo the French king folowed, and comming neere to the towne, there was a ſharpe inconnter begun betwixt the French and the Engliſh, wherein the Engliſhmen were victors, and in which by the Frenchmens owne confeſſion, if the Engliſh power had beene like to theirs in number, they had fullie atchiued the honour of a foughten field, and for a light ſkirmiſh a ſound and perfect victorie.

Amongſt other alſo ſir John Manſell the kings chapleine, and one of his priuie councell did right worthilie, taking priſoner with his owne hands one Peter Orige a gentleman in good place. There was moreouer taken on the French part ſir John de Barris a man of good accompt, by William de Sey, beſide ſundrie others. After this incounter, by reaſon the French armie increaſed by new bands ſtill reſorting to their king, the earle of March ſecretlie ſought meanes to be reconciled vnto him: and finallie by the helpe of the duke of Britaine, his old acquaintance and fréend at néed, his peace was purchaſed, ſo that he had his lands againe to him reſtored, except certeine caſtels, which for further aſſurance the French king reteined in his hands by the ſpace of thrée yeares. The king of England, perceiuing himſelfe too too much deceiued in that he had put ſuch confidence in the earle of March and others of that countrie, which ſhould haue aided him at this preſent, and againe aduertiſed, that the French king meant to beſiege him within the citie of Xainctes, departed with all ſpéed from thence, and came to Blaie, a towne in Gaſcoigne, ſituat néere to the riuer of Garon, & diſtant ſeuen leagues from Burdeaux.

Now whileſt he laie here at Blaie, there came vnto him the counteſſe of Bierne (a woman monſtruous big of bodie) bringing with hir to ſerue the king, hir ſonne, and thrée ſcore knights, in hope to get ſome of his ſterling monie, whereof ſhe knew him to haue plentie: and ſo couenanting for hir interteinment, remained ſtill with him, and receiued euerie daie 13 pounds ſterling, and yet ſhe neuer pleaſured him the worth of a groat, but rather hindered him, in making him bare of monie, which ſhe receiued, purſſed vp and tooke awaie with hir when ſhe departed from him. But if to hir making and ſtature ſhe had bin indued with the courage of Voadicia, whom ſhe excéeded (as it ſhould ſéeme) in proportion, or with the proweſſe of Elfleda, hir ſeruice had béene no leſſe beneficiall to the K. than anie ſkilfull capteins marching vnder his banner. So that we ſée in this woman a deſire rather to ſatiſfie hir hydropicall humor of couetouſneſſe, than anie true affection to ſet forward the kings affaires; therefore it may well be ſaid of hir in reſpect of hir gréedineſſe to get from the king for hir owne commodities ſake, that ſhe was

In the meane time the lords de Pons, Mirabeau and Mortaigne ſuddenlie reuolted, & ſubmitted themſelues to the French king, with the vicount of Towars, and all other the lords and knights of Poictou, and the marches therabouts, that not long before had procured king Henrie to come ouer to their aid. The citie of Xainctes was likewiſe rendred to him immediatlie vpon king Henries departure from thence. At which ſeaſon the French king meant to haue followed him to Blaie, but by reaſon of a great death which chanced in his armie, he was conſtreined to alter his purpoſe. Suerlie, as authors haue recorded, that through peſtilence and vnwholeſomneſſe of the aire, a great manie of Frenchmen died at that time, and dailie more fell ſicke. The number of them that died (as Math. Paris, & Math. Weſtminſter affirme) amounted to twentie thouſand perſons, beſide foureſcore of the Nobilitie that bare banners or penons. King Lewes himſelfe alſo began to ware diſeaſed and craſie, ſo that he was conſtreined to renew the truce with king Henrie, & therewith departed home.

King Henrie remained at Blaie vntill the feaſt of the Aſſumption of our ladie, and then went to Burdeaux to viſit the quéene, who in this meane while was brought to bed about midſummer of a yong ladie, whom they named Beatrice after the quéenes mother. Now whileſt king Henrie was thus occupied in Poictou and Gaſcoine, William Mariſch, the ſonne of Geffrie Mariſch (by commandement ſent from the king) was put to death at London, with ſixtéene of his complices on the euen of S. James the apoſtle. This William Mariſch falling into the kings diſpleaſure, got him to the ſea, and plaied the rouer, kéeping the Ile of Lundaie in the weſt countrie, till finallie he was taken and brought priſoner vnto the tower, where he was charged with ſundrie articles of treaſon, as that he ſhould hire that counterfeit mad man which ſought to haue murthered the king at Woodſtoke, as before ye haue heard. Howbeit when he ſhould die, he vtterlie denied that euer he was priuie to anie ſuch thing. He was firſt had from Weſtminſter to the tower, & from thence drawne to the gibet, and there hanged till he was dead, and after being cut downe, had his bowels ripped out and burned, and when his head was cut off, the bodie was diuided into foure quarters, and ſent vnto foure of the principall cities of the realme. His complices were alſo drawne through the citie of London vnto the ſame gibet, and there hanged.

In the time of this warre alſo betwixt England and France, there was much hurt doone on the ſea betwixt them of the cinque ports and the Frenchmen of Normandie, and other: as the Caleis men and the Britons, which did make themſelues as ſtrong as they could againſt the Engliſhmen by ſea. Wherevpon diuerſe incounters chanced betwixt them, but more to the loſſe of the Engliſhmen, than of the Frenchmen: inſomuch that they of the ports were conſtreined to require aid of the archb. of Yorke the lord gouernour of the realme. About which time, and after the king was withdrawen to Burdeaux, diuers noble men, as the earles of Norffolke and Wincheſter, with others, got licence to returne into England. Soone after whoſe arriuall, eſcuage was gathered through the realme towards the bearing of the kings charges. Moreouer, in this yeare of the king there died ſundrie noble men of naturall infirmities, as the earle of Warwike, Gilbert de Gaunt, Baldwin Wake, Philip de Kime, and Roger Berthram of the north, with diuerſe other. Howbeit the king himſelfe returned not home, but laie all the winter time at Burdeaux, meaning to attempt manie enterpriſes, but he brought none to paſſe, ſauing that in protracting the time, he ſpent much monie, and to litle purpoſe.

Death of noble men.

About the beginning of the ſeuen and twentith yeare of his reigne, his brother the earle of Cornewall, miſliking the order of things which he ſaw dailie in the king his brothers procéedings, would néeds returne backe into England, but chieflie when he perceiued that his councell & aduiſe could not be heard. The king was ſore offended herewith, but he could not well remedie the matter, nor perſuade him to tarie. And ſo the ſaid earle of Cornewall, togither with the earles of Penbroke and Hereford, and diuerſe other noble men tooke the ſea, and after manie dangers eſcaped in their courſe, at length on S. Lucies daie they arriued in Cornewall, though ſome of the veſſels that were in the companie were driuen by force of the tempeſtuous weather vpon other contrarie coaſts. ¶ About this ſeaſon alſo, that is to ſaie, Herevpon were ſent ouer to him ten thouſand quarters of wheat, fiue thouſand quarters of otes, with as manie bakons. Alſo there was ſent vnto him great prouiſion of other things, as cloth for apparell and liueries, but much of it periſhed in the ſea by one meane or other, that little thereof came to his vſe, who remained ſtill at Burdeaux to his great coſt and charges, and ſmall gaine, ſauing that he recouered certeine townes and holds there in Gaſcoigne that were kept by certeine rebels. At which time, bicauſe he was inclined rather to follow the counſell of the Gaſcoignes and other ſtrangers than of his owne ſubiects, and gaue vnto them larger enterteinment, not regarding the ſeruice of his owne naturall people: he was maruellouſlie euill ſpoken of here in England, and the more in deed, bicauſe his iournie had no better ſucceſſe, and was yet ſo chargeable vnto him and all his ſubiects. The Noble men that remained with him, as the earles of Leiceſter and Saliſburie, with other, were conſtreined to borrow no ſmall ſummes of monie to beare out their charges: and ſo likewiſe the king himſelfe ran greatlie in debt, by taking vp monie towards the diſcharging of his importable expenſes.

At length by mediation of ſuch as were commiſſioners a truce was concluded betwixt him and the French king for fiue yeares, and then he returned toward England, but he arriued not there till the ninth of October, although the truce was concluded in March vpon S. Gregories day: for beſide other occaſions of his ſtaie, one chanced by ſuch ſtrife and debate as roſe amongſt the Gaſcoignes, which cauſed him to returne to land, that he might pacifie the ſame when he was alreadie imbarked, and had hoiſed his ſaile immediatlie to ſet forward. He left in Guien for his lieutenant one Nicholas de Mueles or Moles, to defend thoſe townes, which yet remained vnder his obeiſance, for he put no great confidence in the people of that countrie, the which of cuſtome being vexed with continuall warre, were conſtreined not by will, but by the change of times, one while to hold on the French ſide, and an other while on the Engliſh. In deed the townes, namelie thoſe that had their ſituation vpon the ſea coaſtes, were ſo deſtroied and decaied in their walles and fortifications, that they could not long be any great aid to either part, and therefore being not of force to hold out, they were compelled to obeie one or other, where by their willes they would haue doone otherwiſe.

This was the cauſe that the K. of England, oftentimes vpon truſt of theſe townes, which for the moſt part were readie to receiue him, was brought into ſome hope to recouer his loſſes, and cheefelie for that he was ſo manie times procured to attempt his fortune there, at the requeſt of the fickle-minded Poictouins, who whileſt they did ſeeke ſtill to purge their offenſes to the one king or to the other, they dailie by new treaſons defamed their credit, and ſo by ſuch means the king of England oftentimes with ſmall aduantage or none at all, made warre againſt the French king, in truſt of their aid, that could, or (vpon the leaſt occaſion conceiued) quickelie would doo little to his furtherance. And ſo thereby king Henrie as well as his father king John, was oftentimes deceiued of his vaine conceiued hope.

Death of Noble men.

In this ſeauen and twentith yeare of king Henries reigne, diuerſe noble perſonages departed this life, and firſt about the beginning of Januarie, deceaſſed the lord Richard de Burgh, a man of great honour and eſtimation in Ireland, where he held manie faire poſſeſſions, by conqueſt of that noble gentleman his worthie father. Alſo that valiant warriour Hugh Lacie, who had conquered in his time a great part of Ireland. Alſo the ſame yere on the ſeauenth of Maie, Hugh de Albenie earle of Arundell departed this life, in the middeſt of his youthfull yeares, and was buried in the priorie of Wimundham, which his anceſtours had founded. After his deceaſſe, that noble heritage was diuided by partition amongſt foure ſiſters.

Hugh Lacie.

About the ſame time, to wit, on the twelfth day of Maie, Hubert de Burgh earle of Kent departed this life at his manor of Banſtude, and his bodie was conueied to London, and there buried in the church of the Friers preachers, vnto the which Friers he had beene verie beneficiall. Amongſt other things, he gaue vnto them his goodlie palace at Weſtminſter adioining neere to the palace of the earle of Cornewall, which the archbiſhop of Yorke afterwards purchaſed. The monks of the Ciſteaux were this yeare ſomewhat vexed by the king, bicauſe they had refuſed to aid him with monie towards his iournie made into Gaſcoigne. Alſo the plees of the crowne were kept and holden in the towre of London. And in the night of the ſix and twentith day of Julie, ſtarres were ſeene fall from the ſkie after a maruellous ſort, not after the common manner, but thirtie or fortie at once, ſo faſt one after another and glanſing to and fro, that if there had fallen ſo manie verie ſtarres in deed, there would none haue beene left in the firmament.

The counteſſe of Prouance mother to the queene commeth ouer into England.

In the eight and twentith yeare of king Henries reigne, the queenes mother the ladie Beatrice counteſſe of Prouance arriued at Douer on the foureteenth day of Nouember, bringing with hir the ladie Sanctia hir daughter, and in the octaues of S. Martine they were receiued into London in moſt ſolemne wiſe, the ſtreets being hanged with rich clothes, as the maner is at the coronations of princes. On S. Clements day, Richard earle of Cornewall the kings brother married the ſaid ladie Sanctia, which marriage was ſolemnized in moſt roiall wiſe, and with ſuch ſumptuous feaſts and banketings, as greater could not be deuiſed. Finallie, the queens mother the counteſſe of Prouance, being a right notable and worthie ladie, was honored in euerie degree of hir ſonne in law king Henrie in moſt courteous and ſumptuous manner, and at hir departure out of the realme, which was after Chriſtmaſſe, ſhee was with moſt rich and princelie gifts honourablie rewarded.

William Ralegh biſhop of Norwich.

About the ſame time alſo, whereas William de Ralegh was requeſted to remoue from the ſee of Norwich vnto Wincheſter, and conſenting therevnto, without the kings licence, obteined his confirmation of the pope: the king was highlie diſpleaſed therewith, bicauſe he ment it to another. He ſteleth out of the realme.

At length the ſaid biſhop vpon greefe conceiued that the king ſhould be ſo heauie lord vnto him, got into a ſhip at London, and ſtale awaie into France, where he was well receiued of the French king, and greatlie cheriſhed. Alſo he found ſuch means that the pope in fauour of his cauſe wrote letters both to the king and to the queene, naming hir his coſen, but which waie that kindered ſhould come about, as yet it was neuer knowen. The biſhop to ſhew himſelfe thankefull for ſuch freendſhip, gaue the pope aboue ſix thouſand marks (as is ſaid) and the pope bicauſe he would not be accompted a diſdainefull perſon, turned not backe one pennie of that which was ſo gentlie offered him. At length partlie at contemplation of the popes letters, and partlie by reaſon the biſhop humbled himſelfe in anſwering the articles which the king had obiected againſt him in cauſe of the controuerſie betwixt them, he granted him his peace, and receiued him into the land, reſtoring to him all that had beene taken and deteined from him.

He giueth to the pope 6000 marks.

Martine the popes collectour.

Moreouer, in this meane while the pope truſting more than inough vpon the kings ſimplicitie and patience, who indeed durſt not in any caſe ſeeme to diſpleaſe him, had ſent an other collector of monie into England named Martine, not adorned with power legantine, but furniſhed with ſuch authorities and faculties as had not beene heard of. He was lodged in the temple, where he ſhewed what commiſſion he had to gather vp the popes reuenues, and to exact monie by ſundrie maner of meanes, and ſo fell in hand therewith, vſing no ſmall diligence therein, vnto the great greefe and hurt of conſcience of manie: he had power to ſtaie the beſtowing of benefices, till he was ſatiſfied to the full contentation of his mind. Benefices of ſmall value he regarded not greatlie, but ſuch as were good liuings in deed felt his heauie and rauenous hands extended towards them. He had power alſo to excommunicate, to ſuſpend, and to puniſh all ſuch as ſhould reſiſt his will, although neuer ſo wilfullie bent, in ſo much that it was ſaid, he had ſundrie blankes vnder the popes bulled ſeale, bicauſe that vpon the ſudden he brought forth ſuch as ſeemed beſt to ſerue for his purpoſe. He vſed this his vnmeaſurable authoritie to the vttermoſt, and therein did not forget his owne profit, but tooke palfries and other preſents of religious men.

¶ But to declare all the practiſes of this the popes agent, as it would be too long and tedious a proceſſe, ſo it is nothing ſtrange that theſe his landloping legats and Nuncios haue their manifold colluſions to couſen chriſtian kingdoms of their reuenues. For if they were not furniſhed with foxlike fraud and wooluiſh rauine, they were no fit factors for him; ſith it is required that like maiſter haue like man. And therefore he is aptlie deſcribed in the likeneſſe of a man, his head and face excepted, wherein he reſembleth a woolfe; beſides that, he is ſet forth with a croſiers ſtaffe in his hand, at the hooke whereof hangeth his Iudas purſſe, wherein are powched vp his pilfered Peter pence, and I wot not what extorted paiments and pretended duties. As for his deceits and crafts, he hath more varietie of them, than the cat of the mounteine hath ſpots in his ſkin, or the pecocke hath eies in his taile. Wherevpon it is trulie ſaid of a late poet,

But to proceed, when men ſaw ſuch vnreaſonable couetouſnes and polling, by the popes procurement; ſome of the nobilitie of the realme, not able longer to beare it, came to the king, and exhibited to him their complaint hereof, namelie for that the popes procurator beſtowed diuers rich prebends and other rooms in churches vpon ſtrangres knowne to be infamed for vſurie, ſimonie, and other heinous vices, which had no reſpect to preaching, nor to keeping of any hoſpitalitie, for maintenance whereof their anceſtors had giuen forth their lands to the inriching of the church, not meaning to haue the ſame beſtowed on ſuch maner of perſons. The king vnderſtood that truth it was which was told him, and therefore writ to the pope in humble wiſe, beſeeching him of his fatherlie care to take order for ſome redreſſe therein.

About this time the king began to renew his imagination for the following of the warres againſt the French king, and therefore aſked the aduiſe of his councell how he might beſt attempt the recouerie of thoſe lands in France which were wrongfullie deteined from him. The moſt part of all his ancient councellors were of this opinion, that to make warre againe in truſt of others aid, as had beene attempted ſo often before without any profit, ſhould be no wiſedome, and therefore he ought either to forbeare, or els ſo to prouide himſelfe of power ſufficient, without truſting to the ſupport of ſtrangers, as he might be able with his owne puiſſance and force to atchiue his enterpriſe, for otherwiſe his trauell ſhould proue but vaine and to verie ſmall effect. The king perſuaded with theſe ſound reaſons, thought not good to attempt any thing more touching the ſaid warre vnaduiſedlie: and to the end it ſhould not be ſaid how he truſted in vaine vpon the aid of ſtrangers, he cauſed all ſuch poſſeſſions as the Normans held in England to be confiſcated, to the intent that as well the Normans as Britons and Poictouins might well vnderſtand, that he minded not from thenceforth to credit the falſe promiſes of rebels, as he that would now vſe onelie the ſeruice of his owne people the Engliſhmen, which in reſpect of others painted promiſes he had before contemned.

Wherevpon ſome forſaking their lands in England, liued on thoſe which they had in France, and other forſooke thoſe liuings which they had in France, and came ouer into England to liue on thoſe poſſeſſions which they had here. But in the French kings doings was no inforcing of men, either to forſake the one or the other: wherfore the proceedings of the king of England ſeemed ſomewhat more iniurious, and partlie ſounded to the breach of the truce. Whileſt all things were thus in quiet, and the king himſelfe not troubled with any outward wars, the Welſhmen (who though they were ſubdued, yet could not reſt in quiet) receiued againe the fornamed Dauid to their prince, the which for a policie determined himſelfe to make offer to the pope to hold his land of him, yeelding therefore yearelie vnto him the ſumme of fiue hundred marks (as is ſaid) to the end that vnder the wings of the popes protection he might ſhadow himſelfe, and be defended againſt all men. Thus Dauid being incouraged herewith and ſuch other of the Welſhmen as tooke his part, at time appointed did ſet vpon the kings capteins as they ſtragled abroad, whom at the firſt brunt they put to flight, and ſlue manie of them here and there as they tooke them at aduenture. The Engliſhmen when night was come, and that the Welſhmen withdrew to reſt, aſſembled themſelues againe togither, and in the morning with new recouered force both of mind and bodie, came vpon the Welſhmen, and began with them a new battell, which continued the ſpace of three houres togither, till at length the Welſhmen, which raſhlie had entred the fight, began to ſhrinke backe, and fled to their wonted places of refuge, the woods and mareſhes. Their chiefe capteine Dauid fled into Scotland, hauing loſt in that battell the moſt part of all his ſouldiers which he had there with him. At his comming into Scotland, and whileſt he there remained, he incenſed king Alexander againſt king Henrie to his vttermoſt power, putting into his head, how reprochfullie the Engliſhmen did ſpeake of the Scots, reprouing them of cowardnes & lacke of ſtomach; alſo that they liued according to the preſcript of the Engliſh nation, as ſubiects to the ſame: and manie other things he forged, which had beene able to haue moued a moſt patient man vnto indignation and diſpleaſure.

The Welſhmen diſcomfited.

Dauid fled into Scotland.

He prouoketh the king of Scots to make warre againſt England.

Finallie, either by the prouoking of this Dauid, or by ſome other occaſion, king Alexander meant to make warres vpon king Henrie indeed, and in raiſing an armie made a rode into England, and did ſome hurt by incurſions, and further ſignified to king Henrie, as ſome write, that he neither ought nor would hold anie part or portion of Scotland of the king of England. King Henrie ſore offended herewith, purpoſed in time to be reuenged, and ſhortlie after called a parlement at Weſtminſter, in the which he earneſtlie moued the lords and other ſtates to aid him with monie towards the furniſhing of his coffers, being emptied (as they knew) by his exceeding charges in his laſt iournie into Gaſcoigne. He would not open his meaning which he had to make warre to the Scots, bicauſe he would haue his enterpriſe ſecretlie kept, till he ſhould be readie to ſet forward.

The king of Scots inuadeth Englãd.

Math. Paris.

King Henrie requireth an aid of monie of his ſubiects.

But although the king had got the pope to write in his fauour vnto the lords both ſpirituall and temporall, to aid him in that his demand of monie, there was much adoo, and plaine deniall made at the firſt, to grant at that time to anie ſuch paiment as was demanded: and eftſoones they fell in hand with deuiſing new orders, and namelie to renew againe their ſuit for the confirmation of the ancient liberties of the realme, ſo as the ſame might be obſerued, according to the grant thereof before made by the kings letters patents, without all fraud or contradiction. They alſo appointed, that there ſhould be foure lords choſen of the moſt puiſſant and diſcreeteſt of all other within the realme, which ſhould be ſworne of the kings councell, to order his buſineſſe iuſtlie and trulie, and to ſee that euerie man had right without reſpecting of perſons. And theſe foure chiefe councellors ſhould be euer attending about the king, or at the leaſt three or two of them: alſo that by the view, knowledge and witneſſe of them, the kings treaſure ſhould be ſpent and laid forth, and that if one of them chanced to fall awaie, an other ſhould be placed in his roome by the appointment of the reſidue.

New orders deuiſed by the lords.

They would alſo that the lord chiefe iuſtice and the lord chancellour ſhould be choſen by the generall voices of the ſtates aſſembled, and bicauſe it was needfull that they ſhould be oftentimes with the king, it was thought they might be choſen out of the number of thoſe foure aboue rehearſed conſeruators of iuſtice. And if the king at anie time chanced to take the ſeale from the lord chancellour, whatſoeuer writing were ſealed in the meane time ſhould be of none effect. They aduiſed alſo, that there ſhould be two iuſtices of the benches, two barons of the excheker, and one iuſtice for the Iewes; and theſe for that preſent to be appointed by publike voices of the ſtates, that as they had to order all mens matters and buſineſſe, ſo in their election the aſſents of all men might be had and giuen: and that afterwards, when vpon anie occaſion there ſhould be anie elected into the roome of anie of theſe iuſtices, the ſame ſhould be appointed by one of the afore mentioned foure councellors.

Vnreaſonable requeſts.

But as the Nobles were buſie in three weekes ſpace about the deuiſing of theſe ordinances and other, to haue beene decreed as ſtatutes, the enimie of peace and ſower of diſcord, the diuell, hindred all theſe things by the couetouſneſſe of the pope, who had ſent his chapleine maſter Martin, with authoritie to leuie alſo an aid of monie for his need to mainteine his wars withall againſt the emperour; and the emperour on the other part ſent ambaſſadours to the king, to ſtaie him and his people from granting anie ſuch aid vnto the pope: ſo that there was no leſſe hard hold and difficultie ſhewed in refuſing to contribute vnto this demand of the popes Nuncio, than vnto the kings. At length yet in another ſitting, which was begun three weekes after Candlemaſſe, they agreed to giue the king eſcuage to run towards the marriage of his eldeſt daughter, of euerie knights fee holden of the king twentie ſhillings to be paid at two termes, the one halfe at Eaſter, and the other at Michelmaſſe.

The pope ſendeth for ſome aid of monie to mainteine wars againſt the emperour.

Eſcuage granted the king.

After this, the king minding to inuade the Scots, cauſed the whole force of all ſuch as ought to ſerue him in the wars to aſſemble, and ſo with a mightie hoſt he went to new caſtell vpon Tine, meaning from thence to inuade the ſame, in reuenge of ſuch iniuries as the Scots had doone vnto him and his ſubiects, and namelie, for that Walter Cumin a mightie baron of Scotland and other noble men had built two caſtels neere to the Engliſh confines, the one in Galowaie, and the other in Louthian, and further had receiued and ſuccoured certeine rebels to the king of England, as Geffrey de Mariſch or Mareis an Iriſh man, and others. The king of Scots was aduertiſed of king Henries approch, and therefore in defenſe of himſelfe and his countrie, had raiſed an huge armie. Hereupon certeine noble men vpon either ſide, ſorie to vnderſtand that ſuch bloudſhed ſhould chance as was like to follow (and that vpon no great apparant cauſe) if the two kings ioined battell, tooke paine in the matter to agree them, which in the end they brought to paſſe, ſo that they were made freends and wholie reconciled. There was a publike inſtrument alſo made thereof by the king of Scots vnto king Henrie, ſigned with his ſeale, and likewiſe with the ſeales of other noble men, teſtifieng his allegiance which he owght to the king of England, as ſuperiour lord, in forme following.

We doo ſignifie vnto your holineſſe, that we haue receiued a corporall oth before the reuerend father Otho, deacon cardinall of S. Nicholas In carcere Tulliano, legat to the ſee apoſtolike, in England, Scotland and Ireland, and haue made our charter or deed, which beginneth thus; Sciant præſentes, &c. Which charter or deed indented and ſealed, remaineth with the king of England, and with vs. Alſo another deed or writing that beginneth thus; Ad omnium veſtrum notitiam volumus peruenire. Whereas therefore by the forme of our precedent deeds obligatorie, we haue ſubmitted our ſelues to your iuriſdiction, that you may bridle and reſtraine vs, and our heires by the eccleſiaſticall cenſures, if at any time we go againſt the ſaid peace.

And if it happen at any time, that any of vs all, or one of vs, ſhall fortune to preſume raſhlie and vnaduiſedlie to go againſt it, or be about, or herafter ſhall be about ſo to preſume, and therby may procure great perill as well to the ſoules of our owne ſelues, as of our heires, & no ſmall danger may alſo be readie through the ſame our default to light vpon our bodies & goods, we beſeech your holie fatherhood, that you will giue in commandement vnto ſome of the ſuffragans of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, that he doo compell vs and our heires vnto the obſeruing of the ſame peace, accordinglie as in the inſtruments thereof more fullie is conteined, or elſe to order by your authoritie vpon the ſame peace, that which ſhall be agreeable to the canons, &c. And to the performance of this our petition, we haue to this preſent writing ſet our ſeales.

When all things were throughlie concluded, and order taken in what ſort the aſſurances of this accord ſhould paſſe, the king of Scots returned into the inner parts of his realme, and the king of England likewiſe returned to London. At the ſame time alſo, the Welſhmen were verie buſie: for hearing that the kings of England and Scotland were agréed, they doubted leaſt all the burthen of the warre would be turned againſt them. Wherefore (as it were to preuent the matter) they began to waſt the Engliſh confines. Wherevpon when the Welſhmen vnderſtood that the king had broken vp his armie and was returned to London, they inuaded their enimies, namelie the ſaid earle of Herfords men and the Mortimers, ſleaing and cutting in péeces two valiant and noble knights, and maiming the third, they ſlue and ouerthrew of the footbands about an hundred, ſo that all the Engliſh armie was diſordered, and the Welſhmen with victorie returned to their places of refuge. Which when the foreſaid Hubert Fitz Matthew vnderſtood, the morrow after he made foorth with his thrée hundred waged men of armes, in hope to hem in and take the Welſhmen at aduantage: but he was preuented and by them diſtreſſed, in ſo much that he was conſtreined with loſſe of men and horſſes to returne to his holds, and ſcarſe could be ſuffered to remaine there in ſafetie. In the 29 yeare of his reigne, king Henrie hauing ſpent much treaſure with the great preparation of wars which he had taken in hand againſt the Scots, and alſo bicauſe he was conſtreined to be at further charges for the Welſh wars, he called a parlement to begin on the third daie of Nouember, in the which he demanded a great reliefe of monie, but the ſame being generallie denied of all men, he exacted it in particular of the richer ſort of his ſubiects, & amongſt other he cauſed the citizens of London to giue vnto him 15 hundred marks for a fine, bicauſe they had receiued a baniſhed man, one Walter Bukerell into their citie, contrarie to the law and order: but this they denied, affirming that his brother had got his pardon, as by the kings owne letters patents they could prooue, but they were anſwered, that the king was vnder age when theſe letters were purchaſed, and therefore were of none effect. About the ſame time, ſir Nicholas de Molis or Mules ſeneſhall of Gaſcoigne, hauing warres againſt the king of Nauarre, got the victorie in battell. ¶ About the midſt of Nouember, great thunder and lightning chanced, with a maruellous vntemperat ſeaſon for the ſpace of 15 daies togither, as a ſigne of ſome miſfortune to ſucceed.

Hughs daie died Margaret counteſſe of Penbroke the widow of Gilbert Marſhall late earle of Penbroke, & ſiſter to the king of Scots, and ſhortlie after the biſhop of Exceſter William de Brewer likewiſe deceaſed, as yet being in his floriſhing age, a man in manners, parentage, and knowledge right honorable, and highlie commended. ¶ On the daie of S. Marcellus was the quéene deliuered of a man child, which at the font was named Edmund.

In Lent following néere to the caſtell of Mountgomerie in Wales, thrée hundred Welſhmen were ſlaine by them that lay in garriſon there by a policie of the capteine, which faining a counterfeited flight, drew the Welſhmen within danger of an ambuſh, which he had laid to ſurpriſe them vnwares as if came euen to paſſe according to his deuiſe. Dauid that tooke himſelfe for king of Wales, coueting to be reuenged of this diſpleaſure, ceaſſed not daie nor night to make incurſions and to exploit enterpriſes to the damage of the marchers, the which valiantlie reſiſted the enimies, and droue them oftentimes into the mounteines, woods, bogs, and other places of refuge, and oftentimes the enimies hauing the aduantage of place, did much diſpleaſure to the Engliſhmen.

Vpon a time as they (being got to the heigth of an hill, to caſt downe ſtones and throw darts vpon the Engliſhmen that aſſailed them beneath) chanced amongſt other to ſlea with a mightie ſtone (which they threw downe by the ſide of the hill) ſir Hubert Fitz Matthew a right valiant knight, and a man of great accompt for his knowledge and ſeruice in warres. Thus the wars continued betwéene the parties, and oftentimes the Welſhmen by the ſudden inuaſions got the better: their prince Dauid comming to the caſtell of Monthault beſieged it, and within a ſhort time wan it, ſlaieng or taking all thoſe whome he found within it. The owner thereof the lord Roger de Monthault by chance was not at home, which happened well for him, where otherwiſe he had béene in great danger: but néere to the caſtell of Mountgomerie, the Welſhmen yet were eftſoons ouerthrowne and 200 of them ſlaine by an ambuſh that brake forth vpon their backs. About the middeſt of Lent the prelats of England were ſummoned to come to a generall councell, the which pope Innocent had appointed to be holden at the feaſt of S. Iohn Baptiſt next following.

A generall councell.

It chanced that about this time, a poſt comming from the pope with letters to his Nuncio maiſter Martin, conteining inſtructions how he ſhould procéed for the gathering of monie, was ſtaied at Douer, by the practiſe of ſuch noble men as were gréeued to ſée anie ſuch ſummes of monie to be conueied out of the realme in ſort as was vſed. He was had into the caſtell and his letters taken from him, wherein ſuch ſecrets were conteined for the getting of monie, as ought not to haue beene reuealed. Maiſter Martin hearing that the poſt was thus ſtaied and impriſoned, made a gréeuous complaint vnto the king, ſo that the poſt was ſet at libertie, had his letters to him reſtored, & ſo came vnto maſter Martin, and deliuered them vnto him that he might vnderſtand the popes pleaſure, which others to his griefe vnderſtood now as well as himſelfe.

The popes letters ſtaied.

The king this yeare cauſed inquiſition to be made through euerie countie within the realme, to vnderſtand the true valuation of all ſuch benefices and ſpirituall promotions as were in the hands of anie incumbents that were ſtrangers borne, and ſuch as had béene preferred by the court of Rome, and the whole ſumme of all their reuenues was found to be ſixtie thouſand marks. On Whitſundaie the king made the earle of Gloceſter, Gilbert de Clare knight, and 40 other yoong gentlemen that attended vpon him. And perceiuing by the late inquiſition what great reuenues the beneficed ſtrangers had and poſſeſſed within the realme, and againe conſidering the excéeding great ſummes of monie which the court of Rome had recouered of his ſubiects, he began to deteſt ſuch couetous dealing. And herevpon a letter was deuiſed by the whole bodie of the realme, wherein were conteined, the ſundrie extortions and manifold exactions of the popes legats, and other of his chapleines, which vnder colour of his authoritie they had vſed. There were appointed alſo to go with theſe letters vnto the generall councell, certeine honorable and diſcréet perſonages, as Roger Bigod earle of Northfolke, Iohn Fitz Geffrey, William de Cantlow, Philip Baſſet, and Ralfe Fitz Nicholas, with other, the which preſenting the ſame letters vnto the ſaid aſſemblie, ſhould declare the gréefe of the whole realme, and require ſome redreſſe and eaſement therein.

Moreouer, it chanced that there was a great number of lords, knights, and gentlemen aſſembled togither at Dunſtable and Luiton, to haue kept a martiall iuſts, and triumphant tornie, but they had a countercommandement from the king, not to go forward with the ſame: wherevpon, when they were Vpon occaſion of their being altogither, on the morrow after the feaſt of Peter & Paule, they ſent from them Fouke Fitz Warren, to declare vnto maiſter Martine the popes Nuncio, as then lodging at the temple in London, in name as it were of all the whole bodie of the realme, that he ſhould immediatlie depart out of the land. Fouke dooing the meſſage ſomewhat after a rough manner, maiſter Martine asked him what he was that gaue forth the ſaid commandement, or whether he ſpake it of himſelfe or from ſome other. This commandment (ſaith Fouke) is ſent to thee, from all thoſe knights and men of armes which latelie were aſſembled togither at Dunſtable and Luiton.

Fouke Fitz Warren commandeth the popes Nuncio to auoid the realme.

Maiſter Martine hearing this, got him to the court, and declaring to the king what meſſage he had receiued, required to vnderſtand whether he was priuie to the matter, or that his people tooke it vpon them ſo raſhlie without his authoritie or no. To whome the king anſwered, that he had not giuen them any authoritie ſo to command him out of the realme: but indeed (ſaith he) my barons doo ſcarſelie forbeare to riſe againſt me, bicauſe I haue mainteined and ſuffered thy pilling and iniurious polling within this my realme, and I haue had much adoo to ſtaie them from running vpon thee to pull thee in peeces. Maiſter Martine hearing theſe words, with a fearefull voice beſought the king that he might for the loue of God, and reuerence of the pope, haue free paſſage out of the realme: to whome the king in great diſpleaſure anſwered, The diuell that brought thee in carie thee out, euen to the pit of hell for me. Howbeit at length, when thoſe that were about the king had pacified him, he appointed one of the marſhals of his houſe, called Robert North or Nores, to conduct him to the ſea ſide, and ſo he did, but not without great feare, ſithens he was afraid of euerie buſh, leaſt men ſhould haue riſen vpon him and murthered him. Wherevpon, when he came to the pope, he made a greeuous complaint, both againſt the king and others.

The church of ſaint Peter at Weſtminſter was inlarged, and newlie repared by the king, ſpeciallie all the eaſt part of it, the old wals being pulled downe, and builded vp in more comelie forme. ¶ The generall councell, according to the ſummons giuen, was holden this yeare at Lions, where it began about midſummer, in which the Engliſh ambaſſadors being arriued, preſented to the pope their leters, directed from the whole bodie of the realme of England, requiring a redreſſe in ſuch things, wherewith (as by the ſame letters it appeared) the realme found it ſelfe ſore annoied. The pope promiſed to take aduiſe therein, but ſith the matter was weightie, it required reſpit. Finallie, when they were earneſt in requiring a determinate anſwer, it was giuen them to vnderſtand, that they ſhould not obteine their deſires, wherevpon in great diſpleaſure they came awaie, threatening and binding their words with oths, that from thenceforth they would neuer paie, nor ſuffer to be paid, anie tribute to the court of Rome, nor permit the reuenues of thoſe churches, whereof they were patrones, to be pulled awaie, by any prouiſion of the ſame court.

The Engliſh ambaſſadors threaten the pope, that he ſhould not haue any tribute out of England.

The pope hearing of theſe things, paſſed them ouer patientlie, but he procured the Engliſh biſhops to ſet their ſeales vnto that charter, which king Iohn had made concerning the tribute, againſt the mind of the archbiſhop of Canturburie Stephan Langton, who at that time, when king Iohn ſhould ſeale it, ſpake ſore againſt it. When king Henrie was informed hereof, he was greeuouſlie offended; and ſware in a great chafe, that although the biſhops had doone otherwiſe than they ought, yet would he ſtand in defenſe of the liberties of his realme, and would not ſo long as he had a day to liue, paie any dutie to the court of Rome, vnder the name of a tribute. In this meane while, the king with a puiſſant armie inuaded the Welſh rebels, to reduce them to ſome quiet, whereas with their continuall incurſions and other exploits, they had ſore harried, vexed, and waſted the lands of the kings ſubiects.

Matth. Paris.

Herevpon the king being entred the countrie, inuaded the ſame, vnto the confines of Snowdon, and there he began to build a ſtrong caſtell at a place called Gannoke, remaining there about the ſpace of ten weekes, during the which, the armie ſuffered great miſerie through want of vittels and other prouiſions namelie apparell, and other helps to defend themſelues from cold, which ſore afflicted the ſouldiers and men of warre, bicauſe they laie in the field, and winter as then began to approch. Moreouer, they were driuen to keepe watch and ward verie ſtronglie, for doubt to be ſurpriſed by ſudden aſſaults of the enimies, the which watched vpon occaſion euer to doo ſome miſcheefe.

The morrow after the Purification of our ladie, Iſabell de Boulbec counteſſe of Oxenford departed this life, and likewiſe the morrow after ſaint Valentines day died Baldwine de Riuers earle of Deuonſhire and of the Wight. Moreouer, Geffrey de March, a man ſometime of great honour and poſſeſſions in Ireland, after he had remained long in exile, and ſuffered great miſerie, ended the ſame by naturall death. Alſo Raimond earle of Prouance, father to the queenes of England and France deceaſſed this yeare, for whome was kept in England a moſt ſolemne obſequie. Alſo in the weeke after Palmeſundaie, died a right noble baron, and warden of the north parts of England, the lord Gilbert Humfreuile, leauing behind him a yong ſonne, the cuſtodie of whome the king forthwith committed to the earle of Leiceſter, not without the indignation of the earle of Cornewall, who deſired the ſame.

Finallie, after that the king had lien at Gannoke about the fortifieng of the caſtell there, the ſpace of ten weekes, and ſaw the worke now fullie finiſhed, he appointed forth ſuch as ſhould lie there in gariſon, and therewith, on the morrow after the feaſt of Simon and Iude, he raiſed his field, and returned towards England, leauing the Welſhmen in great miſerie, and like to ſtarue for want of neceſſarie food. For the Ile of Angleſey, which is as a nurſe to the Welſhmen, thoſe Iriſhmen that came to the kings aid, had vtterlie waſted and deſtroied. Againe, the king of purpoſe had conſumed all the prouiſion of corne and vittels which remained in the marſhes, ſo that in Cheſhire, and other the parts adioining, there was ſuch dearth, that the people ſcarſe could get ſufficient vittels to ſuſteine themſelues withall.

The king alſo gaue forth commandement, that no prouiſion of corne or vittels ſhould be conueied vnto the Welſhmen, out of any parts, either of England or Ireland, on paine of forfeiting life, lands & goods. Moreouer, he cauſed the brine pits in Wales to be ſtopped vp and deſtroied. The king hauing thus ordered his buſineſſe, returned into England, and ſhortlie after, taking diſpleaſure with the lord Maurice, cheefe iuſtice of Ireland, bicauſe he had not made ſuch ſpeed as had beene conuenient in bringing the Iriſhmen to his aid, he diſcharged him of the office of cheefe iuſtice, and placed in his roome Iohn Fitz Geffrey. In this thirtith yeare of king Henries reigne, Walter earle Marſhall and of Penbroke departed this life: and ſhortlie after, to wit, three daies before Chriſtmaſſe, his brother Anſelme that ſucceeded him in the inheritance, deceaſſed alſo without iſſue: and ſo all the fiue ſonnes of the great earle William Marſhall, being departed this world with-

The king this yeare held his Chriſtmas at London, and had there with him a great number of the nobilitie of his realme, which had béene with him in Wales, that they might be partakers of paſtime, mirth and pleaſure, as they had béene participants with him in ſuffering the diſeaſes of heat, cold, and other paines abroad in the fields and high mounteines of Wales, conſidering with himſelfe (as the truth is) that

But that no pleſure ſhuld paſſe without ſome ſtaine of gréefe, there was a rumor ſpred abroad, that the pope conceiued freſh rankor in his ſtomach againſt the king and realme of England, for the complaints which had béene exhibited in the councell at Lion by the Engliſh orator, for the oppreſſion done to the church of England: that thervpon, minding now to be reuenged, as was ſaid, he earneſtlie moued the French king to make warre againſt the Engliſhmen and to ſubdue them vnder his dominion: which enterpriſe the French king vtterlie refuſed, both for that he and the king of England were coſens, and againe, bicauſe the king of France had no iuſt title or right to make claime to England.

The pope requireth the French king to make war againſt England.

The French king refuſeth to gratifie the pope therein.

Further, there was as then a truce betwixt England and France, and before that England could be ſubdued, much giltleſſe blood ſhould be ſpilt. Alſo, the chriſtians in the holie land were ſore oppreſſed, and looked dailie for the arriuall of the king of France, and therefore he would be loth to attempt any new enterpriſe to hinder his iornie thither. But about the feaſt of the Epiphanie, other news came out of Prouance, that troubled the king of England worſe than the other before, as thus, That the counteſſe Beatrice his wiues mother had deliuered vp the countie of Prouance into the French kings hands, togither with ſixtéene caſtels, which in right of the quéene ought to haue remained vnto the king of England. For the ſafe kéeping wherof to his vſe, the ſaid counteſſe Beatrice had receiued yéerelie for the terme of fiue yeares laſt paſt, the ſumme of foure thouſand marks of the king of England, and yet now in the deliuering of them, with the reſidue of the countrie vnto the French king, ſhe neuer made any mention of his right.

The counteſſe of Prouance dealeth vniuſtlie with the king of England hir ſonne in law.

Shortlie after alſo, Charles the French kings brother maried the ladie Beatrice, yongeſt daughter of earle Raimond, and had with hir the ſame countie of Prouance, and ſo was intituled earle thereof, as in the French hiſtorie appeareth. Moreouer, the archbiſhop of Canturburie procured a grant from the pope to recouer for one yeare the firſt fruits of all cures that chanced to be void within the citie, dioceſſe, and prouance of Canturburie, by and during the tearme of ſeauen yeares then next following, till the ſumme of ten thouſand marks were leuied, towards the diſcharge of the ſaid archbiſhops debts. The collection of the which ten thouſand marks was aſſigned by the popes bulles vnto the biſhop of Hereford, who ſhould alſo leauie two thouſand marks of the reuenues belonging to the church of Canturburie, to be conuerted to the ſame vſe. The king at the firſt was ſore offended herewith, but ſhortlie after, he was pacified and ſo the archbiſhop had his will.

The archb. of Canturburie purchaſeth grant of the pope to leuie monie.

After this about the beginning of the next ſpring, Dauid prince of Wales departed this life, after great penſiueneſſe of mind, for the deſtruction and miſerie into the which his countrie had béene brought through the preſent warres with the Engliſhmen. After his deceaſſe, the Welſhmen elected to ſucceed in his place, the ſonne of Griffin, whom king Henrie had reteined in ſeruice, and honourablie vſed, euen of a child: but now that he heard that the Welſhmen had elected him to their prince, he ſtale away, and fled into Wales. ¶ On the day of the purification of our ladie, a robberie was committed vpon certeine Iewes at Oxenford, for the which fact, fiue and fortie of the offendors were put in priſon, but at the ſuit of Robert biſhop of Lincolne, they were deliuered by the kings commandement, bicauſe no man impeached them of anie breach of peace, or other crime. The citizens of London alſo about the beginning of the ſpring, were compelled to paie a talage, wherewith they found themſelues ſore aggreeued.

About the middeſt of Lent, there was a parlement holden at London, wherein diuerſe ſtatutes and ordinances were deuiſed, as penalties for thoſe that offended in other mens parks and warrens: but the chéefeſt occaſion of aſſembling this parlement, was to take aduiſe in matters touching the gréefes wherewith the church of England ſéemed to be oppreſſed by the pope and the court of Rome. The pope indeed to quiet the Engliſh ambaſſadors, and to put the king and realme in ſome good hope of reléefe and deliuerance out of ſuch oppreſſions, as were opened vnto him in the face of the whole councell, did not onelie promiſe largelie, but alſo cauſed diuerſe priuileges to be made and deliuered vnto the ſaid ambaſſadors verie fauorablie, in the behalfe of their requeſt. But yet the ſame notwithſtanding, ſith the breaking vp of the ſaid generall councell, and return to the ambaſſadors, manie things were doone, to the increaſing and continuation of the former gréefes, ſo that they ſtood in doubt of further oppreſſions to follow, rather than in hope of the promiſed redreſſe. Hervpon they concluded eftſoones to write vnto the pope, and to the cardinals, both in name of the king, of the biſhops and prelats, of the earles, barons, and other eſtates of the temporaltie, and of the abbats and priors. In the meane time, the pope for a while ſomewhat relented in the point of beſtowing benefices here in England, for when any of his fréends or kinſmen was to be preferred to any benefice within this realme, he would ſue to the king for his grant and good will, that ſuch a one might be admitted, and not ſéeme of himſelfe to grant it without the kings conſent.

The earle of Sauoy in the preſence of the archbiſhop of Canturburie, and the biſhop of Hereford and others, did homage to the king of England, acknowledging to hold of him certeine fées, as thoſe of Suſe, Auillian, S. Maurice de Chablais, and the caſtell of Bard, which he might well doo, not preiudicing the right of the empire, ſith he held nothing of the ſame empire, except Aigues and the paſſages. This yeare, the office of the earle Marſhall was giuen to Roger Bigod earle of Northfolke, in right of his wife the counteſſe, that was eldeſt daughter vnto the great earle William Marſhall. ¶ Moreouer, in this yeare the king holding his Eaſter at London, honored Harold king of Man with the order of knighthood. About the ſame time, diuerſe noble men of Wales ſubmitted themſelues, and were receiued vnto the kings peace. ¶ On ſaint Markes day was a great froſt and ſnow, which nipped the leaues of trées and hearbes in ſuch extreame wiſe, that for the more part they withered and faded awaie.

Furthermore, bicauſe the pope vnderſtood, that diuerſe rich beneficed men were of late dead in England inteſtate, as Robert Hailes the archdeacon of Lincolne, Almerike the archdeacon of Bedford, and Iohn Hotoſpe archdeacon of Northhampton, he ordeined a decrée, that all ſuch ſpirituall per-

Alſo, where the pope required a talage of the clergie, the king flatlie forbad it by his letters inhibitorie.

In this meane while, William Powis chapleine, and ſir Henrie de Lamere knight, which were ſent with the ſecond letters, deuiſed in the late parlement (as you haue heard) to be preferred vnto the pope and cardinals, returned againe without obteining anie towardlie anſwer, but rather (as they declared) they found the pope ſharp and rough in ſpéech, ſaieng, The king of England which now kicketh againſt the church, ⁊ beginneth to plaie Frederiks part, hath his counſell, ⁊ ſo likewiſe haue I, which I intend to follow. Other anſwer they cold not obteine. Againe, the Engliſhmen that were ſutors in the court of Rome, were ſtrangelie vſed, and could not get anie diſpatch in their buſineſſe, but were rather put backe as ſchiſmatikes, and with rebukes reuiled. Herevpon the king called a parlement at Wincheſter, to haue the aduiſe of his lords in this matter, where how ſoeuer they agréed, proclamation was immediatlie ſet forth, and publiſhed in euerie ſhire ⁊ countie through the realme, that no man ſhould conſent to the popes contribution, nor ſend anie monie out of the realme to his aid. When the pope heard of this, he wrote verie ſharplie to the biſhops, commanding them on paine of excommunication and ſuſpenſion, to ſatiſfie his Nuncio remaining at the new temple in London, before the feaſt of the Aſſumption of our ladie. And whereas the king minded to haue ſtood in the matter through threats of his brother the earle of Cornewall, and of certeine prelats, namelie, the biſhop of Worceſter (who had authoritie as was ſaid to interdict the land) he yéelded and ſuffered the pope to haue his will, to the great griefe and diſcomfort of manie.

On S. This yéere, ſundrie noble perſonages departed this world, as Iſabell the kings mother, wife to the earle of March in Poictou. Alſo, the counteſſe of Albemarle, the daughter of Alaine of Galloway, and ſiſter to the counteſſe of Wincheſter: wherevpon, a great part of Gallowaie that belonged to hir (for that ſhe died without iſſue) remained to Roger de Quincie earle of Wincheſter, that married the eldeſt ſiſter. Moreouer, John lord Neuill died this yeare, which had béene chiefe forreſter of England: but he was not onelie put out of that office for certeine tranſgreſſions, but alſo out of the kings fauor before he died, where (at firſt) none was more eſtéemed in the court than he. The biſhop of Saliſburie, named maſter Robert de Bingham, died alſo this yeare, and ſir Richard de Argenton knight, a right noble perſonage, which in the holie land had ſhewed good proofe of his high valiancie, manhood, ⁊ prowesse: likewiſe ſir Henrie Bailioll of the north, and diuerſe other.

In the beginning of the one and thirtith yeare of king Henries reigne, the pope ſent into England to haue the third part of one yeares profit of euerie beneficed man that was reſident, and of euerie one not reſident the one halfe. The biſhop of London ſhould haue ſéene this aid and collection leuied, but it would not be granted. And in a parlement called this yeare on the morrow after the Purification of our ladie, it was ordeined, that new letters ſealed with the common ſeale of the citie of London ſhould be ſent by ſufficient meſſengers, from all the eſtates of the realme, vnto the pope and cardinals, requiring a moderation to be had in ſuch exactions as were intollerable for the realme to beare. On S. Valentines euen, a great earthquake happened here in England, and namelie about London, on the Thames ſide, with the which manie buildings were ouerthrowen. Theſe earthquakes, the ſeldomer they chance in England, the more dreadfull the ſame are, and thought to ſignifie ſome great alteration. A little before this earthquake, the ſea had ceaſſed from ebbing and flowing for the ſpace of thrée moneths togither, by a long tract néere to the Engliſh ſhore, to the great maruell of many, for either it flowed not at all, or elſe ſo little that it might not be perceiued. There were at this time diuerſe ordinances decréed and enacted by waie of prohibition, to reſtreine the authoritie of ſpirituall perſons, as that no eccleſiaſticall iudge ſhould determine in cauſes of anie temporall man, except touching cauſes of matrimonie and teſtaments. They were alſo prohibited to ſue anie actions touching tithes, before anie ſpirituall iudge, and the writ whereby they were prohibited, was called an Indicauit. Sundrie other ſuch ordinances were deuiſed, which for bréefeneſſe we omit. What ſpéed or anſwer ſo euer the meſſengers had that were ſent to Rome with the letters deuiſed in the late parlement, truth it is, that the pope ſent ouer into England ſuch of his agents as gathered no ſmall ſums of monie amongſt the cleargie, as one Marinus, and an other named Johannes Anglicus a frier minor, the which were not intituled by the name of legats, to ſaue the priuileges which the king had, that no legat might come into the realme without his licence. The comming ouer of theſe men, bicauſe it was to gather monie, contented not manie mens minds, as well appeared in a parlement called at Oxford about reformation thereof, but yet notwithſtanding it was there agreed, that the pope ſhould haue eleuen thouſand marks to be leuied amongſt them of the ſpiritualtie, exempt perſons and places reſerued.

The cardinall hauing ſaluted the king, tooke leaue of him and came to Lin, where he ſtaied at the point of thrée moneths, making ſuch purchaſe amongſt religious men, that what by procuracies and other ſhifts, he got as was thought, a foure thouſand marks towards his charges, and ſo departed. Edmund Lacie earle of Lincolne, and Richard de Burgh, as then wards to the king, were married vnto two of thoſe yong ladies of Prouance, which Peter de Sauoy earle of Richmond brought ouer with him, whereat manie of the Engliſh nobilitie grudged.

Alſo, about the thirtéenth of Auguſt, the ladie Ione daughter to the lord Guarine de Monchencie, was married vnto William de Valence the kings halfe brother. The ſame ladie was heire to hir fathers lands, by the death of hir brother the ſonne of the ſaid lord Guarine. Sir William de Bucles knight a Norman borne, was made ſeneſhall of Gaſcoigne about this ſeaſon, and was ſore vexed with wars by Gaſton the ſonne of the counteſſe of Bierne and others, which Gaſton ſhewed himſelfe verie vnthankefull, for the king had giuen both to him and to his mother (a woman of a monſtrous ſtature) verie large interteinement to ſerue him in his wars at his laſt being in that countrie (as before ye haue heard.) The archbiſhop of Canturburie ſuſpended the préeſts of his prouince, bicauſe they would not conſent (according to the grant which he had purchaſed of the pope) that he ſhould haue the firſt fruits for one yeare, of euerie benefice that chanced to be vacant within the ſame prouince. The earles of Cornewall and Penbroke got much monie by waie of a collection, towards the reliefe of the warres in the holie land, hauing purchaſed of the pope certeine buls of indulgence for the ſame. Sir Fouke de Newcaſtell a valiant knight, and coſen germane to the king on the mothers ſide died at London, during the time of the parlement.

Pardon granted by biſhops

On the thirtéenth of October was a portion of the holie bloud of Chriſt (as it was then ſuppoſed) ſhewed in moſt reuerent wiſe in a ſolemne proceſſion, for the king comming to the church of S. Paule in London, receiued there the ſame bloud conteined in a chriſtalline glaſſe, the which he bare vnder a canopie ſupported with foure ſtaues, through the ſtréets, vnto the abbeie church of Weſtminſter. His armes were alſo ſupported by two lords as aids to him all the waie as he went. The maſters of the Templers and Hoſpitallers had ſent this relike to the king. To deſcribe the whole courſe and order of the proceſſion and feaſt kept that daie, would require a ſpeciall treatiſe. But this is not to be forgotten, that the ſame daie the biſhop of Norwich preached before the king in commendation of that relike, pronouncing ſix years and one hundred and ſixtéene daies of pardon, granted by the biſhops there preſent, to all that came to reuerence it.

The earle of Wincheſter remaining in Gallowaie, where he had faire poſſeſſions in right of his wife, was beſieged of his owne tenants, within a caſtell wherein he lodged, and being in danger either to die through famine, or elſe at the diſcretion of the enimies, he burſt forth, and making way with his ſword, eſcaped, and comming to the king of Scots, complained of the iniurie doone to him by his people, wherevpon the king tooke ſuch order, that the rebels were puniſhed, and the earle ſet in quiet poſſeſſion of his lands againe.

Toward the latter end of Nouember, William earle Ferrers & of Derbie departed this life, a man of great yeares and long troubled with the gout, a iuſt man and a peaceable. The ſame moneth the counteſſe his wife died alſo, a woman of yeares, vertue and fame like to hir huſband. Thomas Becket the archbiſhop of Canturburie did miniſter the préeſts office at their marriage. Their eldeſt ſonne William ſuccéeded his father in the earledome, a good man and a diſcreet, but vexed with the gout verie pitifullie, hauing that diſeaſe alſo as it were, by inheritance from his father. There died likewiſe other of the nobilitie, as Richard de Burgh, and William Fitz Ham. Beatrice the counteſſe of Prouance mother to the quéene, and Thomas de Sauoy late earle of Flanders, came into England to viſit the king and quéene, and were honorablie receiued, and at their departure backe towards home, richlie rewarded. This yeare in the octaues of the Purification, a parlement was holden at London, where all the nobilitie of the realme in manner was preſent. There were nine biſhops, as the archbiſhop of Yorke, with the biſhops of Wincheſter, Lincolne, Norwich, Worceſter, Chicheſter, Elie, Rocheſter and Carlell, with the earls of Cornewall, Leiceſter, Wincheſter, Hereford, Northfolke, Oxford, Lincolne, Ferrers, and Warwike, with Peter de Sauoy earle of Richmond, beſides lords and barons. The archbiſhop of Canturburie was at the court of Rome, & the biſhop of Dureſme was letted by ſickeneſſe.

In this parlement king Henrie earneſtlie required a ſubſidie, in reliefe of the great charges which he had diuerſe waies ſuſteined, wherevpon he was ſtreightwaies by the péeres of the realme noted both of couetouſneſſe, vnthankfulneſſe, and breach of promiſe, bicauſe he neuer ceaſſed gathering of monie, without regard had to his people: and where he had promiſed manie things, as that he would not be burdenous vnto them, and ſuch like; he had performed verie little of thoſe his gaie promiſes. Manie miſdemeanors, and wrongfull doings, to the gréeuance of his people were opened and laid before him, as cheriſhing and inriching of ſtrangers, & vſing his prerogatiues too largelie, to the great decaie & hinderance of the common-wealth. The king abaſhed herewith, and ſuppoſing that the confeſſion of his fault ſhould make amends, & aſwage the diſpleſure which his Nobles and other had conceiued at his miſgouernance, to content them all with one anſwer, he promiſed that he would reforme all that was amiſſe, and ſo quieting the minds of his barons, the parlement was prorogued till the quindene of the natiuitie of S. But yet (as Matthew Paris writeth) the pride and diſdaine of the Frenchmen was ſo great, that vpon ſpite and enuie conceiued at the Engliſhmens glorie, which bare themſelues right worthilie, the Frenchmen vſed the Engliſhmen nothing fréendlie; & namelie the earle of Arras ſticked not to ſpeake manie reprochfull words againſt the ſaid William de Longeſpée and his people, whereat they could not but take great indignation.

In the feaſt of All ſaints, the archbiſhop Bonifacius was inthronized at Canturburie, and kept a ſolemne feaſt, at the which the king and quéene, with the more part of all the prelats of the land were preſent. About this ſeaſon was a great tornie and iuſts holden at Brackley, where the earle of Gloceſter (contrarie to his accuſtomed maner) fauoured the part of the ſtrangers, wherby they preuailed. In ſomuch that William de Valence handled one ſir William de Odingeſelles verie roughlie, the ſame ſir William being a right worthie knight. About the ſame time, the counteſſe of Cornewall at Berkehamſtéed was deliuered of a ſonne named Edmund. This yeare about the beginning of the ſpring, the kings brother the earle of Cornewall with other Noble men of the realme, as the earle of Gloceſter, Henrie Haſtings baron, & Roger Thurkebie, went ouer into France in princelie arraie and furniture to viſit the pope, who held his court ſtill at the citie of Lions. The biſhop of Lincolne alſo and the biſhop of Worceſter went thither. For what cauſe the other went, it was not openlie knowne. But the biſhop of Lincolne went thither about ſuch buſineſſe as he had in hand againſt the Templers, Hoſpitalers, and ſuch other which had appealed from him to the court of Rome, where he could not bring his purpoſe to paſſe, for his aduerſaries with monie had purchaſed the iudges fauour. About this time, Guy de Luſignan the kings halfe brother came ouer into England, after his returne out of the holie land, and was of the king ioifullie receiued. Towards the releefe of his expenſes made in that iournie, the king gaue him fiue hundred pounds which he got of the Iewes. Moreouer, he gaue to his brother Geffrey the cuſtodie of the baron Haſtings lands, and ſo by ſuch liberall and bounteous gifts as he beſtowed on them and other ſtrangers, he greatlie incurred the hatred of his naturall people the Engliſhmen.

Guy de Luſignan brother to the king.

On the day of the Epiphanie, the earle of Leiceſter came to the king in great haſt out of Gaſcoigne giuing him to vnderſtand, that the Gaſcoignes were reuolted in ſuch number, that if ſpeedie ſuccour were not prouided, the whole countrie would fall from the Engliſh ſubiection. Hereupon the king furniſhed him with monie, and the earle himſelfe got all that he could make of his owne reuenues, and likewiſe of the Vmfreuilles lands, the heire whereof he had in cuſtodie. He made no long abode, but with all ſpeed returned, and reteined two hundred Rutters out of the duke of Brabants countries, and with them certeine croſbowes. Theſe were eger ſouldiers, and bloudie, but yet the Gaſcoignes prepared themſelues to reſiſt them all that they might: howbeit the earle put them ſtill to the worſe. Before his laſt returne from thence, he had raced the caſtell of Fronſacke flat with the ground, and likewiſe left deſolate the caſtell of Egremount.

He had of the king 3000 marks.

About this ſeaſon, one of the kings iuſtices named Henrie de Bath fell in the kings diſpleaſure, bicauſe he was accuſed that he had not exerciſed his office vprightlie, but to his owne priuat gaine, and peruerted iuſtice through bribes, vpon occaſion of a ſuit mooued betwixt him and one Euerard de Trumpington: he was appealed of falſhood and treaſon by Sir Philip Darcie knight. His wife was of kin to the Baſſets and Samfords, the which procured him great freendſhip at the hands of the earle of Cornewall, and of Iohn Manſell, and other of the kings councell. But for all that they could doo, he was in great danger to haue loſt his life at the parlement holden that yeare, and begun on the ſixteenth day of Februarie. For the king was ſo ſore mooued againſt him, that he cauſed proclamation to be made, that if any man had any thing to laie againſt the ſaid Henrie de Bath, they ſhould come forth, and their information ſhould be heard. Hereupon diuerſe came and preſented their complaints, and amongſt other, one of his owne fellowes, that was a iuſtice alſo, declared that he had ſuffered an offendor conuict, to eſcape vnpuniſhed, for a bribe, which he receiued to the preiudice of the king, and the danger of his aſſociats the other iuſtices, whereas it is required of one put in truſt with the adminiſtration of lawes, to be vncorrupt and ſound in iudgement, according to this true poſition,

A iuſtice accuſed for taking bribes.

Iudicio

Iudicis eſt recti nec munere nec prece flecti.

The king herewith roſe vp in a great fume,and ſaid openlie: If any man will ſlea Henrie of Bath, he ſhall not be impeached for his death: for I doo here plainelie declare him acquit and guiltleſſe for the ſame. Herewith diuerſe would haue run vpon him to haue murdered him, but that Iohn Manſell ſtaied their outrage, ſhewing them that the king might well herafter repent the words which he ſpake thus in his furie, and thoſe that ſhould doo any violence vnto the man, were not like to eſcape puniſhment: for both the biſhop of London would ſuerlie accurſe them,and other of his fréends would not faile to ſéeke reuenge by temporall force: and thus was Henrie of Bath in the kings high diſpleaſure for the time. Howbeit at length, through interceſſion of the earle of Cornewall,and the biſhop of London, he was put to his fine,and pardoned.

Henrie de Bath put to his fine.

About the ſame time, Athelmare the kings halfe brother was confirmed biſhop of Wincheſter by the pope, although he was thought ſcarſelie ſuffieient to haue the place, for lacke of learning and ripe yeares. About this time alſo,the biſhops aſſembling at Dunſtable,tooke aduiſe togither, how to preuent the archbiſhop of Canturburie,that he ſhould not viſit: and in the end they concluded to ſend their procurator vnto the court of Rome,to trie what purchaſe might be made there for monie to ſtaie the licence, and not to ſticke for the diſburſing of foure thouſand marks, if néed required. Their procurator did ſo much in the matter,that he found the pope fauourable vnto his cauſe, though no determinate anſwer was giuen of a long time, till at length,to gratifie the archbiſhop and his kin,as the duke of Sauoy and other,the pope granted him licence to viſit, but not generallie: for he might not viſit anie pariſh church, except the perſon required him thereto. And whereas he had libertie to viſit conuentuall churches, yet might he not receiue for procuracies aboue foure marks. For this moderation to be had, the procurator for the biſhops gaue vnto the pope ſix thouſand marks.

Athelmare or Odomare biſhop of Wincheſter confirmed.

Six thouſand marks giuen to the pope.

The ſame yeare the biſhop of Lincolne viſited the religious houſes within his dioceſſe, to vnderſtand what rule was kept amongſt them,vſing the matter ſomewhat ſtrictlie(as they thought:) for he entred into the chambers of the moonks & ſearched their beds. And comming to the houſes of the nuns, he went ſo néere as to cauſe their breaſts to be tried, that he might vnderſtand of their chaſt liuings. In Lent following he was ſuſpended by the pope, bicauſe he would not ſuffer an Italian that had no ſkill of the Engliſh toong to inioy a prebend in his church, which the pope had giuen to the ſame Italian. In this ſeaſon,Wales was brought to be ſubiect vnto the Engliſh lawes, and that part which ioineth to Cheſhire, was committed to the cuſtodie of Alain lord Zouch, the which gaue,for hauing of the profits thereof to farme,ii hundred marks, and ſupplanted lord Iohn Graie which ſhould haue had it for fiue hundred. Certeine vſurers and ſtrangers borne called Caorſini, had bought faire houſes at London,and ſo remained there as inhabitants, occupieng their trade without controlment,for the prelats durſt not ſpeake againſt them, bicauſe they alleged themſelues to be the merchants of the popes highneſſe: and the citizens durſt not trouble them bicauſe they were defended by certeine noble men,whoſe monie (as was ſaid) they occupied,to gaine after the manner of the court of Rome. Howbeit at length they were called before the ciuill magiſtrate by the kings procurement, and grieuouſlie accuſed for their vnlawfull occupieng of vſurie,and ſome of them committed to priſon, the reſidue hid themſelues out of the way, till at length for a ſumme of monie they were licenced to be at reſt, and ſo continued for a ſeaſon. The Iewes reioiſed hereat,to haue fellowes with them in their miſerie.

In this ſeaſon alſo there depended a controuerſie betwixt the archbiſhop of Canturburie with the biſhop of London and his canons of Paules, ſo that the ſaid biſhop of London & the deane of Paules,and other of the canons were excommunicated. But the biſhop perceiuing which way the world went,reconciled himſelfe: as for the deane, he ſtood long in the matter,& at length went himſelfe to the pope to vtter his gréefe. This controuerſie hanged long betwixt them, and was handled in ſuch wiſe, that laie-men laughed at their doings, for now and then whom the pope commanded to be abſolued, their aduerſaries by colour of the popes authoritie would command to be excommunicated.The firſt day of Iulie the earle of Leiceſter in Gaſcoigne ouercame manie of the kings enimies,and tooke from them a fortreſſe called Chattellon.

On S. About Michaelmaſſe quéene Dowager of Scotland, that was daughter to Monſieur de Couſie a Frenchman, came through England to returne into France where ſhe was borne,and was of the king honorablie receiued and welcomed. This yeare the nunrie of Marran not far from Lin was founded by the ladie Iſabell counteſſe of Arundell. ¶ Alſo this yeare the lord William de Cantlow departed this life,in whoſe heritage his ſon alſo named William ſucceeded. ¶ Moreouer,Iohn Cobham & Geffrey Spenſer (that was a man of great fame, and one of the kings councell)departed this life,Cobham before Eaſter, and Spenſer ſhortlie after the ſame feaſt. Alſo in the octaues of Pentecoſt,Paule Peiuer or Peure departed this life, he was one of the kings chéefe councellors, and lord ſteward of his houſe. This man at the firſt was not borne to anie great poſſeſſions, but by purchaſe atteined to great reuenues. The ladie Ione his wife compounded with the king for the marriage of hir ſon named Paule, after his father, but the lord Iohn Graie paied the monie,being fiue hundred marks, and ſo diſcharging hir of that debt,maried hir ſonne to one of his daughters at his manor of Eiton,and afterwards at London married the mother of his ſonne in law, wherewith the king was ſore diſpleaſed,for he had giuen the marriage of hir vnto a ſtranger, one Stephan de Salines, ſo that the lord Graie was glad to giue to the king the ſumme of fiftie marks, by way of a fine to haue his good will.

The building of that church, all charges accounted, ſtood the earle in ten thouſand marks, as he himſelfe confeſſed vnto Mathew Paris. ¶ About the ſame time the earle of Leiceſter and Guie de Luſignan the kings halfe brother came into England out of France, and landed at Douer, whome the king receiued with great ioy and gladneſſe. He gaue to his brother at his returne great rewards, as he was euer accuſtomed. In the feaſt of the Conception of our ladie at a iuſtes holden at Rocheſter, the ſtrangers were put to the worſe, and well beaten by the Engliſh batchlers and men of armes, ſo that the diſhonour which they did to the Engliſhmen at Brakley was now recompenſed with intereſt. For the ſtrangers fléeing to the citie for ſuccour, were met by the way by the Engliſh knights ſeruants and yeomen, which fell vpon them, beat them ſore with clubs and ſtaues, and handled them verie euill. Hereof ſprang a great hatred betwixt the Engliſhmen and ſtrangers, which dailie grew and increaſed more and more, the rather bicauſe the king had them in ſo good eſtimation, and reteined ſo manie of them within the realme.

The king did celebrate the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe at Yorke, whither came Alexander the yong king of Scots, and was there made knight by the king of England, and on ſaint Stephans day he married the ladie Margaret, daughter to the king of England, according to the aſſurance before time concluded. There was a great aſſemblie of noble perſonages at that feaſt. The quéene Dowager of Scotland mother to king Alexander, a French woman of the houſe of Coucie, had paſſed the ſea, & was preſent there with a faire companie of lords and gentlemen. The number of knights that were come thither on the king of Englands part were reckoned to be at the point of one thouſand. The king of Scots had with him thrée ſcore knights, and a great ſort of other gentlemen comparable to knights. The king of Scots did homage to the king of England at that time for the realme of Scotland, and all things were doone with great loue and fauour, although at the beginning ſome ſtrife was kindled about taking vp of lodgings.

This aſſemblie of the princes coſt the archbiſhop verie déerelie, in feaſting and banketting them and their traines. At one dinner it was reported he ſpent at the firſt courſe thréeſcore fat oxen. ¶ At requeſt of the K. of Scots, the K. of England receiued Philip Lunell againe into fauour, or rather Louell (as I take it) one of his councell, againſt whome he had conceiued diſpleaſure in the yeare laſt paſt, for ſuch briberie as he was thought to be giltie of for ſhewing fauour to the Iewes. The king of Scots when he ſhould depart, tooke his leaue in moſt courteous maner, and led with him his new married wife, on whome attended ſir Robert Norice knight marſhall of the kings houſe, and ſir Stephan Bauſan, and alſo the ladie Mawd, the widowe of the lord William Cantlow, with others. On the octaues of the Epiphanie chanced an excéeding great wind, which did much hurt in diuerſe places of the realme. The biſhop of Rocheſter returning frõ the court of Rome, brought with him a bull, authoriſing him to receiue to his owne vſe the fift part of the reuenues of all the beneficed men within his dioceſſe.

In this meane while the earle of Leiceſter remaining in England, the Gaſcoignes made ſore warre againſt ſuch as he had left behind him, and withall gaue information to the king that the earle of Leiceſter was a traitor, and one that had ſpoiled the kings ſubiects: and furthermore by his vniuſt dealings had giuen to the Gaſcoignes cauſe of rebellion. The king to boult out the truth of this matter, ſent firſt his chapleine Henrie Wingham, and afterwards ſir Nicholas de Moles de Valence, as commiſſioners to inquire of the earles dooing, who went and returned without finding any manifeſt crime in the earles demeanor. The earle was much offended that his innocencie ſhould be thus ſuſpected; but at length being appointed to returne into Gaſcoigne, he obeied and hauing a great ſumme of monie, he reteined a power of men of warre, as well Frenchmen as others, and meaning to be reuenged of thoſe that had giuen the information againſt him, he ſtrengthened himſelfe with the aid of the king of Nauarre, and of the earle of Bigorre and other, ſo that he oppreſſed his aduerſaries on ech hand, and ſo abated their pride, that if conuenientlie they might, they would haue yéelded themſelues to ſome other prince, and vtterlie haue renounced the K. of England for euer. Whereby it ſhould ſéeme that he was throughlie reuenged of them euen to their no ſmall ſmart, not in word and threatning, but with ſword and bloud-ſhedding, defending his innocencie, and manfullie ſhewing his warlike mind. But yet he had purchaſed to himſelfe a greater portion of praiſe, if he had not with weapon but with wiſedome made a conqueſt of the enimie: according to this ſound counſell of a ſage writer;

On the thirtéenth day of March, the new moone was ſéene, whereas the prime change by naturall courſe ſhould not haue béene till the ſixtéenth day following; and for the ſpace of fiftéene daies that then next inſued, the ſunne, the moone, and ſtarres appeared of a red colour. And herewith the whole face of the earth ſéemed as it had béene ſhadowed with a thicke miſt or ſmoke, the wind notwithſtanding remaining north and northeaſt. Then began a ſore drought, continuing a long time, the which togither with morning froſts, and northerlie winds, deſtroied the fruits and other growing things, which were blaſted in ſuch wiſe, that although at the firſt it was a verie forward yeare, and great plentie towards of corne and fruit, yet by the meanes aforeſaid, the ſame was greatlie hindered and ſpeciallie in the ſummer ſeaſon, when the ſunnes heat increaſed, and the drought ſtill continued.

A ſtrange wonder of the new moone.

A great drought.

The reſidue of ſuch fruits as then remained, withered awaie, ſo that ſcarſe a tenth part was left, and yet there was indifferent ſtore. For if the abundance which the bloſſomes promiſed had come forward, the trées had not béene able to haue borne the ſame. The graſſe was ſo burned vp in paſtures and medowes, that if a man tooke vp ſome of it in his hands, and rubbed the ſame neuer ſo little, it ſtreight fell to poulder, and ſo cattell were readie to ſtarue for lacke of meat. And bicauſe of the excéeding hot nights, there was ſuch abundance of fleas, flies, and gnats, that people were vexed and brought in caſe to be wearie of their liues. And herewith chanced manie diſeaſes, as ſweats, agues, and other. In the harueſt time fell there a great death and murren amongſt cattell, and ſpeciallie in Northfolke, in the fens and other parts of the ſouth. This infection was ſuch, that dogs and rauens féeding on the dead carrens, ſwelled ſtreightwaies and died, ſo that the people durſt eat no béefe, leaſt the fleſh happilie might be infected.

Manie diſeaſes reigned.

A murren of cattell.

Alſo this was noted not without great wonder, that yong heifers and bullockes followed the milchkine, & as it had béene calues ſucked the ſame kine. Alſo appletrées and peartrées, now after the time of yéelding their ripe fruit, began againe to bloſſome, as if it had béene in Aprill. The cauſe of the death of cattell was thought to come hereof. After ſo great a drought (which had continued by all the ſpace of the moneths of Aprill, Maie, Iune, and Iulie) when there folowed good plentie of raine, the earth began to yeeld hir increaſe moſt plentiouſlie of all growing things, though not ſo wholeſome nor of ſuch kindlie ſubſtance, as in due time and ſeaſon ſhe is accuſtomed to bring forth, and ſo the cattell which before were hungerſtarued, fed now ſo greedilie of this new graſſe ſprong vp in vndue ſeaſon, that they were ſuddenlie puffed vp with fleſh, and ſuch vnnaturall humors, as bred infections amongſt them, whereof they died.

The biſhop of Lincolne.

The biſhop of Lincolne would haue inforced all the beneficed men within his dioceſſe to be preeſts, but they purchaſed a licence from Rome, to remaine at the Vniuerſities for certeine yeares, without taking the order of preeſthood vpon them. ¶ The king meaning to go (as he pretended) into the holie land, had grant of the pope to leuie a tenth of his ſubiects both ſpirituall and temporall. The Gaſcoignes ſore repining at the earle of Leiceſter his ſtreict gouernance (who handled them more roughlie than they had beene accuſtomed) ſent the archbiſhop of Burdeaux ouer into England to exhibit a complaint againſt him in all their names. The earle of Leiceſter aduertiſed thereof, followed him, and comming to the court, found the archbiſhop readie to aduouch the information which he had made againſt the ſaid earle, cheefelie in that he had ſought the deſtruction of thoſe to whom the earle of Cornewall when he was ruler there, had granted life and peace, and whom ſir Henrie Trubleuile, and Waleran the Dutchman, late ſtewards of Gaſcoigne, vnder the king, had cheriſhed and mainteined. With manie other things the archbiſhop charged him, the which the earle wittilie refelled and diſproued, ſo as he was allowed in his iuſtification by thoſe that ſtood by, as the earle of Cornewall and others.

The biſhop of Lincolns authoritie to inſtitute vicars in churches impropriate.

The biſhop of Lincolne got authoritie of the pope to inſtitute vicarages in churches impropriat to religious men, where no vicars were; and where ſuch were as ſeemed too ſlenderlie prouided of ſufficient allowance, to augment the ſame as he thought expedient: which his authoritie he vſed more largelie than ſtood with the pleaſure of religious perſons, bicauſe he ſhewed great fauour to the vicars. The copie of the letters which the biſhop had procured of the pope, authoriſing him herein, followeth as we find the ſame in the chronicles of Matthew Paris.

The earle of Leiceſter ſent eftſoones into Gaſcoigne.

The earle of Leiceſter was eftſoones ſent into Gaſcoigne by the king, who had not cared if he had fallen into his enimies hands, as ſhould appeare. But the earle hired ſouldiers in France, and comming into Gaſcoigne, preuailed againſt his enimies, though in one conflict he was in danger of looſing both life and the honour of the field. But yet through his good hap, Gods fauour, and the valiancie of himſelfe and ſome of his retinue, he got the vpper hand, and put his enimies to flight, taking Ruſteine, one of the cheefe ringleaders, whom he cauſed to be preſented to the king. At the ſame time had the king inueſted his ſon Edward with the duchie of Aquitaine to the offenſe of the earle of Cornewall, to whom by charter he had before giuen and confirmed the ſame. In a iuſts holden at Walden, ſir Arnold de Monteinie a right valiant knight was ſlaine by ſir Roger de Lemborne, for which miſchance all the Nobles there aſſembled made great lamentation, and namelie the ſaid ſir Roger: but yet he was ſuſpected to be in blame, bicauſe the ſocket of his ſtaffe was poliſhed, & not abated. Hereby it ſhould appeare, that in qualitie of weapon, and not in maner of their running togither, theſe iuſts and tornies in thoſe daies practiſed differed from the verie order of warre.

The kings eldeſt ſon Edward created duke of Aquitaine.

Sir Arnold de Monteinie ſlaine.

The 17 of September the cathedrall church of Elie was dedicated, which the biſhop of that ſee named Hugh had builded of his owne proper coſts and charges, togither with the palace there. The king and a great number of the peeres & nobles of the realme both ſpirituall and temporall were preſent at this ſolemne feaſt, which was kept in moſt plentifull manner. The 13 day of October, the king held a great feaſt at London, and had called the ſtates of the realme, then and there to aſſemble in parlement, wherein he opened to them the popes grant, which he had obteined of the tenths due to the church, to be receiued by him for three yeares, towards his charges in his iournie which he meant to make into the holie land. The biſhops, and namelie Lincolne, vtterlie refuſed to be contributarie to his grant.

The church of Elie dedicated.

A parlement.

The king demandeth the tenths of the ſpiritualtie.

They alledged ſundrie reaſons for their excuſe, as the pouertie of the Engliſh church being alreadie made bare, with continuall exactions and oppreſſions; but cheeflie they excuſed themſelues by the abſence of the archbiſhops of Canturburie and Yorke, of whom the one was beyond the ſea, and the other at home in the north parts. All th'other Engliſh biſhops were there, except Hereford & Cheſter, which Cheſter was ſicke, and therefore without the conſent of thoſe that were abſent, and namelie their primat the archbiſhop of Canturburie, they could not conclude vpon any generall point touching the kings demand. And although the king fretted and ſtormed againſt them, yet could he not bring them to his purpoſe, ſo that the parlement for that time was diſſolued. Yet before their departure from London, he communed with the biſhops apart, to ſee if he might perſuade them to giue him ſome portion of monie towards his charges: but they had tuned their ſtrings all after one note, diſcording all from his tenor, ſo that not a penie could be got of them: wherefore he tooke high diſpleaſure againſt them, reuiling them in moſt reprochfull maner, and amongſt other he vpbraided his halfe brother (the elect of Wincheſter) of great vnthankefulneſſe, who alſo amongſt the reſidue ſtood againſt him.

The biſhops refuſe to yeeld to the popes grant.

The king highlie offended with the biſhops.

The king hauing this repulſe at the biſhops hands, began to fall in talke with the lords of the temporaltie touching the troubles in Gaſcoigne, where things were in broile by the hard doings of the earle of Leiceſter, againſt whom the Gaſcoignes ceaſſed not to make warre ſtill, and of late hauing beſieged him in the caſtell of Mountalbon, droue him to ſuch ſhift, that to eſcape the preſent danger he was glad to ſet at libertie certeine rebels, which he had before taken captiues.

The king aſſaieth to get monie of the lords temporall.

captiues. Therefore to reduce that countrie vnto quietneſſe, the king determined to go thither himſelfe, and to remoue the earle of Leiceſter out of his office: but when he came to the pith of the matter, which was to deſire their aid both of men and monie, the lords would not agree to grant him anie. And where he ſought to burthen the erle of Leiceſter with miſgouerning things againſt his honour, they excuſed the ſame earle, and ſo the lords alſo departed in diſpleaſure of the king as well as the biſhops. Howbeit the king got of the Londoners by way of princelie praier twentie thouſand marks of gold at that time. And to their further greefe for better meane to be reuenged againſt the biſhop of Elie, he cauſed the ſaid Londoners to keepe ſaint Edwards faire for fifteene daies togither at Weſtminſter, and in the meane time to keepe their ſhops ſhut through all the citie. Which thing (by reaſon of the foule weather chancing at that time) was verie greeuous vnto them, albeit there was ſuch repaire of people thither, that London had not beene fuller to the iudgement of old ancient men neuer at anie time in their daies to their remembrance.

The Londoners helpe at a pinch.

This yeare died ſir Nicholas Samford knight, a man of great reputation and valiancie. Alſo on the twentith day of October, the counteſſe of Wincheſter daughter to the earle of Hereford departed this life at Grobie, a manour place belonging to hir huſband the earle of Wincheſter, a little beſides Leiceſter, and was buried at Braklie. The ſaid earle ſhortlie after married an other wife in hope of iſſue. For neither by this his laſt wife, neither by his firſt that was daughter to the lord Alane de Galowaie had he any children. Alſo the ſame yeare, that noble ladie Margaret counteſſe of Liſle ſurnamed Riuers, ſomtime wife to Fouks de Brent, departed out of this world, about the ſecond day of October. In the ſeauen and thirtith yeare of king Henries reigne, one of the popes notaries called Albert came into England to offer vnto Richard earle of Cornewall the kings brother, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicill. But the earle ſuppoſing it not to ſtand with his honour, to depriue his nephue Henrie, ſonne to the emperor Frederike the ſecond, by his wife the empreſſe Iſabell that was ſiſter to the ſaid erle, refuſed to take that honour vpon him.

Anno Reg. 37.

The pope offereth the kingdome of Sicill vnto the earle of Cornewall.

About the ſame time, that is to ſay, on the octaues of ſaint Martin, Boniface the archbiſhop of Canturburie arriued in England, comming from the court of Rome, where he had beene long reſiant. ¶ At the ſame time there chanced a great occaſion of ſtrife betwixt the ſaid archbiſhop, and the biſhop of Wincheſter. For where maiſter Euſtace de Lin, officiall to the ſaid archbiſhop had firſt excommunicated, and after for his contumacie cauſed to be attached a preeſt which by authoritie of the elect of Wincheſter as dioceſane there, was entred into poſſeſſion of an hoſpitall in Southwarke, as gouernour thereof, by the name of prior, without conſent of the officiall: who pretended title as patrone in his maiſters name. The ſaid elect of Wincheſter cauſed a riotous ſort of perſons after the maner of warre to ſeeke reuenge hereof, the which after manie outrages doone, came to Lambeth, and there by violence tooke the ſaid Euſtace out of his owne houſe, and led him to Farnham, where he was kept as priſoner.

The archbiſhop thus ſerued at his firſt comming ouer, and taking the ſame but for a homlie welcome, was maruellouſlie offended, and comming to London accompanied with the biſhops of Chicheſter and Hereford, in the church of ſaint Marie bowe, being reueſted in pontificalibus, pronounced all thoſe accurſſed, which were authours or fauourers of ſuch a raſh and preſumptuous deed, and further commanded all the biſhops within his prouince, by vertue of their obedience, to denounce the ſame in their churches euerie ſundaie and holie day. The biſhop of Wincheſter on the other part, ſent commandement to the deane of Southwarke, to reſiſt the archbiſhop to his face, and to denounce his curſſe to be void, vaine, and of no force, but deuiſed of a craftie purpoſe and wicked meaning. The archbiſhop continuing in his conceiued diſpleaſure, went to Oxenford, and there on the morrow after ſaint Nicholas day, renewed the ſame curſſe in ſolemne wiſe before all the learned men, ſtudents, and ſcholers of the Vniuerſitie.

Howbeit, at length the matter was taken vp betwixt them, for the king in his brothers cauſe, and the queene for hir vncle the archbiſhop, tooke ſome paine to agree them: and ſo in the octaues of the Epiphanie they were made freends, and thoſe abſolued that were excommunicated, in which number William de Valence, and Iohn de Warren were thought to be conteined, as thoſe that ſhould be preſent in vſing the force againſt the officiall (as before ye haue heard.) By inquirie taken about this time by the diligence of the biſhop of Lincolne, it was found that the yeerlie profits and reuenues of ſpirituall promotions and liuings reſting in ſtrangers hands preferred by the popes prouiſions, amounted to the ſumme of threeſcore and ten thouſand marks, which was more by two third parts, than the kings reuenues belonging to his crowne.

The archb. of Canturburie and the biſhop of wincheſter made freends. william de Valence, and Iohn de warren.

The earle of Gloceſter and the lord William de Valence went ouer into France in moſt triumphant manner, to conclude a marriage betwixt the ſonne of the ſaid earle of Gloceſter, and the daughter of the lord Guie of Engoleſme. Which marriage the king had motioned for the affection which he bare towards the aduancement of his linage, by the mothers ſide. Whereat bicauſe they were ſtrangers, the Engliſh nobilitie ſomewhat repined. And whereas like luſtie yoong gentlemen they attempted a iuſts and tornie to ſhew ſome proofe of their valiant ſtomachs, they were well beaten by the Frenchmen, that diſdained to ſee yoong men ſo preſumptuous, to prouoke old accuſtomed warriours to the triall of ſuch martiall enterpriſes. About the beginning of Lent, the new moone was ſeene foure daies before ſhee ought to haue appeared by hir due and common courſe.

The new moone appeared before hir time.

The king by a ſhift got of the Londoners 1000 marks. For as it happened about the ſame time the youthfull citizens (for an exerciſe and triall of their actiuitie) had ſet forth a game to run at the quintine, and whoſoeuer did beſt, ſhould haue a peacocke which they had prepared for a priſe. Certeine of the kings ſeruants, bicauſe the court laie then at Weſtminſter, came (as it were in ſpite of the citizens) to the game, and giuing reprochfull names to the Londoners (which for the dignitie of the citie and ancient priuileges which they ought to haue inioied were called barons) the ſaid Londoners not able to beare ſo to be miſuſed, fell vpon the kings ſeruants, and bet them ſhrewdlie, ſo that vpon complaint, the king cauſed the citizens to fine for their raſh doings. Wherein the Londoners followed the counſell of him that in a caſe of ſtrife, ſaid

The Londoners called Barons.

Moreouer, about the ſame time, the king vpon diſpleaſure conceiued againſt the earle of Leiceſter, had cauſed him to reſigne his office of the wardenſhip of Gaſcoigne: and bicauſe the earle had it by patent, the king not able to find any iuſt cauſe of forfeiture, agreed to paie vnto him for the reſignation no ſmall portion of monie. And whereas the Gaſcoignes had charged the earle with too much ſtreict handling of them, whereby they were occaſioned to raiſe tumults, the matter was now nothing at all amended. For after the earle had reſigned, they continued ſtill in rebellion, ſo that the Rioll with S. Millions and other places were taken by the aduerſaries out of the kings hands, and great ſlaughter of people made in thoſe parts: wherefore the king minding to go thither, cauſed muſters to be taken, and men put in a redineſſe according to the cuſtome, that he might vnderſtand what number of able men furniſhed for the warre were to be had. He alſo tooke order that euerie man that might diſpend yeerlie fiftéene pounds in lands ſhould be made knight.

Knights to be made.

Moreouer, for the better preſeruation of peace and quietneſſe amongſt his people, he appointed watch to be kept by night in cities and borough townes. And further by the aduiſe of the Sauoiſines, which were about him, he ordeined that if any man chanced to be robbed, or by any meanes damnified by any théefe or robber, he to whom the kéeping of that countrie chéefelie apperteined where the robberie was doone, ſhould competentlie reſtore the loſſe: and this was after the vſage of Sauoy, but was thought more hard to be obſerued here, than in thoſe parts, where are not ſo manie bypaths and ſtarting corners to ſhift out of the waie. ¶ The Gaſcoignes continued in their ſeditious doings, and namelie Gaſcon de Bierne, who renouncing his dutie and obedience to the king of England ioined himſelfe to the king of Spaine, through his helpe to be the ſtronger & more able to annoie the Engliſh ſubiects. The euill intreating vſed towards the Gaſcoignes which brought hither wines, in that the ſame were oftentimes taken from them by the kings officers, and other, without readie monie allowed for the ſale, gaue occaſion to them to grudge and repine againſt the king.

An ordinance againſt robbers.

The cauſe yͭ moued the Gaſcoignes to rebellion.

In the quindene of Eaſter a parlement began at London, in which all the ſtates being aſſembled, the matter was mooued for aiding the king with ſome reléefe of monie towards the iournie which he ment to make into the holie land: and ſo at length it was agréed that a tenth part of all the reuenues belonging to the church was granted to him for thrée yeares ſpace, and that eſcuage ſhould be leuied for that yeare, after thrée markes of euerie knights féé, and the king on the other part promiſed faithfullie to obſerue and mainteine the grant of the great charter, and all the articles conteined within the ſame. For further aſſurance whereof, on the third day of Maie, in the great hall at Weſtminſter, in the preſence and by the aſſent of the king and the earles of Norfolke, Hereford, Oxford, Warwike, and other Noble men, by the archbiſhop of Canturburie as primate, and by the biſhops of London, Elie, Lincolne, Worceſter, Norwich, Hereford, Saliſburie, Durham, Exceſter, Carliell, Bath, Rocheſter, and S. Dauies, reueſted and apparelled in pontificalibus, with tapers, according to the maner, the ſentence of excommunication was pronounced againſt all tranſgreſſors of the liberties of the church, and of the ancient liberties and cuſtomes of the realme of England, and namelie thoſe which are conteined in the great charter, and in the charter of forreſt.

A parlement.

A tenth granted of the ſpiritualtie. Eſcuage granted.

Magna charta.

Whileſt the ſentence was in reading, the king held his hand vpon his breaſt with glad and chéerefull countenance, and when in the end they threw awaie their extinct and ſmoking tapers, ſaieng, So let them be extinguiſhed and ſinke into the pit of hell which run into the dangers of this ſentence; the king ſaid, So helpe me God, as I ſhall obſerue and kéepe all theſe things, euen as I am a chriſtian man, as I am a knight, and as I am a king crowned and annointed. But afterward when he through other counſell brake his promiſe therein, he was aduiſed by ſome to giue a portion of that monie which he got at this time, to the Pope, that he might of him be abſolued.

Godlie counſell no doubt.

Immediatlie after the breaking vp of the parlement, that is to ſaie, about the firſt of Iune, the king being earneſtlie called vpon by meſſengers ſent from the Gaſcoignes to prouide in time for the defenſe and ſafegard of that countrie, ſith otherwiſe he ſtood in danger to loſe it, with all ſpeed he reſolued to go thither; and therevpon cauſed ſummons to be giuen to all thoſe that held of him by knights ſeruice, to prepare to be at Porteſmouth, with horſſe and armour in the octaues of the Trinitie. Herewith he made great prouiſion of ſhips, the which being aſſembled, and the armie likewiſe come togither, through lacke of conuenient wind he was inforced to ſtay a long time, to his great gréefe and no leſſe charges.

The king purpoſeth to go himſelfe into Gaſcoigne.

Finallie, on the 6 of Auguſt he tooke the ſea, leauing his brother the earle of Cornewall, and the quéene in charge with gouernance of the realme, and of his ſonne the lord Edward. There departed with him from Porteſmouth thrée hundred ſailes of great ſhips, beſides a number of other ſmaller veſſels. And thus accompanied, he tooke his courſe to Gaſcoigne, & about our ladie day named hir Aſſumption, he arriued at Burdeaux, where he was of the citizens honorablie receiued. Immediatlie after his arriuall there, he cauſed the towne of the Rioll to be compaſſed about with a ſtrong ſiege, within the which a great number of rebels were incloſed, which valiantlie defended the place in hope of reſcue, which Gaſton de Bierne that was fled to the king of Spaine had promiſed to procure for them. But the king of England to preuent them in that point, ſent the biſhop of Bath, and his truſtie chapleine ſir Iohn Manſell vnto the ſaid king of Spaine, to conclude freendſhip and aliance with him, ſo that the lord Edward his eldeſt ſonne might marrie the king of Spaine his daughter.

He taketh the ſea.

He arriueth at Burdeaux.

Ambaſſadors ſent into Spaine.

After long treatie, by the diligence of the ſaid ambaſſadors, a full concluſion followed of their motion. And whereas the king of England had giuen and aſſigned the dominion of Gaſcoigne to his ſaid ſonne the lord Edward, the king of Spaine in the inſtrument that conteined the couenants of the marriage, reſigned and quite claimed all the right and title within Gaſcoigne which he had or might haue by the gift of king Henrie the ſecond, and by confirmation of the kings, Richard and Iohn. In this meane while, the townes and caſtels which the rebels held, were won and deliuered into the kings hands, and herewith followed a great dearth in the kings armie, ſo that a hen was ſold for ſix pence ſterling, a pound weight in bread was at two pence or thrée pence, a gallon of wine at two ſhillings, a coome of foure buſhels of wheat at twentie ſhillings, ſo that a knight with his eſquire, and coiſtrell with his two horſſes, might ſcarſe be competentlie found for two ſhillings in ſiluer. Wherefore the king to relieue his people there with him on that ſide the ſea, ſent the prior of Newbourgh with other into England, to cauſe prouiſion of vittels and other neceſſaries to be conueied and brought vnto him into Gaſcoigne, and ſo there was a great quantitie of graine and powdred fleſh taken vp and ſent awaie with all conuenient ſpéed.

A marriage concluded betwixt the K. of Englands ſonne & the K. of Spaines daughter.

A dearth in the kings campe.

The earle of Leiceſter came to the king, bringing with him out of France where he had remained for a time, a faire companie of ſouldiers and men of warre to the kings aid, and was verie courteouſlie receiued. The Gaſcoignes then perceiued the kings power to increaſe, and ſaw how not onelie the caſtels wherein they truſted to haue refuge were woone and gotten out of their hands by the king of England, but alſo that their vines (wherein chéefelie conſiſted their hope of ſuſtentation) were burned vp and de-

The biſhop of Chicheſter Richard witz and Groſted B. of Lincolne depart this life

The praiſe of Groſted.

This yeare died Richard Witz the biſhop of Chicheſter, a man of great vertue and ſingular knowledge. Alſo that famous clearke Robert Groſted biſhop of Lincolne departed this life on the day of S. Deniſe in the night, at his manor of Bugdon, whoſe learning coupled with vertue and vprightneſſe of life wan to him perpetuall commendation. He was a manifeſt blamer of pope and king, a reprouer of prelats, a corrector of moonks, a director of preeſts, an inſtructor of clearkes, a ſuſteinor of ſcholers, a preacher to the people, a perſecutor of incontinent liuers, a diligent ſearcher of the ſcriptures, a contemnor and a verie mallet of ſuch ſtrangers as ſought preferment in this realme by the popes prouiſions: in houſekeeping liberall, in corporall refection plentifull, and in miniſtring ſpirituall food, deuout and godlie affected: in his biſhoplike office diligent, reuerend, and neuer wearied: a ſingular example of a biſhop, ſpeciallie in thoſe daies, and at whoſe life our reformed biſhops may fetch light to abandon their darkeneſſe, and to amend that which is amiſſe in them, ſith Anno Reg. 38. The ladie Katherin the kings daughter borne.

Moreouer there died in Gaſcoigne, William de Veſcie a baron of great fame in the north parts. Alſo in the ſpring and ſummer of this yeare was a great drought, and in the harueſt ſeaſon fell ſuch wet, that great floods by the riſing of the riuers, and ouerflowing their banks, did much hurt in ſundrie places of the realme. Againe in the later end of harueſt about Michaelmaſſe, there was eftſoones ſuch a drought, that men could get no grinding at the milles, but were conſtreined to go in ſome places a daies iournie off, to haue their corne groond. In the eight and thirtith yeare of king Henries reigne, the quéene was deliuered of a daughter which was called Katherin, bicauſe the ſame was borne on ſaint Katherins daie.

A death of ſhéepe.

On S. Lucies daie, there fell a great ſnowe, and withall a winters thunder, for a token of ſome euill to follow. The king to ſettle the ſtate of the countrie of Gaſcoigne in better order, tarried there all the winter, and repared certeine decaied townes and caſtels. The quéene kept hir Chriſtmaſſe at London, where ſhe laie in child-bed, and was purified on the euen of the Epiphanie, making a roiall feaſt, at the which manie great lords were preſent, as the archbiſhop of Canturburie, the biſhop of Elie, the earls of Cornewall and Gloceſter, and manie other. She ſent ouer at the ſame time to hir huſband for a new yeers gift the ſumme of fiue hundred marks of hir owne reuenues, towards the maintenance of his warres. On the euen of the Circumciſion of our Lord, in the night ſeaſon, whileſt the aire was moſt cleare and bright with ſhining ſtarres, the moone being eight daies old, there appeared in the element the perfect forme and likeneſſe of a mightie great ſhip, which was firſt ſéene of certeine moonks of ſaint Albons, who remaining at ſaint Amphibalus, were got vp to behold by the ſtarres, if it were time for them to go to mattens; but perceiuing that ſtrange ſight, they called vp ſuch of their acquaintance as lodged néere at hand, to view the ſame. At length it ſéemed as the bourds and ioints thereof had gone in ſunder, and ſo it vaniſhed awaie. There followed a maruellous ſore later end of a winter, through cold and ouerſharpe weather, which continued till the feaſt of S. Gregorie in March next inſuing. Alſo there chanced the ſame yeare a great murren and death of ſhéepe and deere, ſo that of whole flocks and heards ſcarſe the one halfe eſcaped.

The king demandeth a ſubſidie.

Whileſt the king remained ſtill in Gaſcoigne, he ſent for his wife queene Elenor, with his eldeſt ſonne Edward, but bicauſe he could not make an end of all his buſineſſe that winter, he continued there the ſummer alſo. And forſomuch as he ſtood in need of monie, to haue ſome reaſonable pretenſe to demand a ſubſidie, in the beginning of March, he ſent to his brother Richard the earle of Cornewall (which was come ouer before cheefelie for that purpoſe) certeine inſtrnctions, to declare how there was like to follow great warre, by means of Alfonſe the tenth of that name king of Caſtile, who manaced verie ſhortlie to inuade the confines of Gaſcoigne perteining to the Engliſh dominion, and therefore he required of his faithfull ſubiects ſome aid of monie, wherby he might be able to reſiſt his aduerſarie the ſaid K. of Caſtile. Earle Richard did what he could to perſuade the people to this paiment, but he caſt his net in vaine before the face of the feathered foule, as the old prouerbe ſaith, Apparens rete fugêre volucria quæq;.

For though he ſet forth the matter to the vttermoſt in the preſence of the Nobles and other eſtates, yet would they not heare of anie paiment to be made, as thoſe that ſmelled out the feined fetch and forged tale of the kings need. For they had intelligence that there was an agreement concluded betwixt him and the king of Spaine. And for the ſame cauſe the quéene and the lord Edward were gone ouer, that the king of Spaine might haue a ſight of him, as he had required, when the couenants of the marriage were accorded.

The king offended with them that refuſed to helpe him with monie.

Edward the kings ſonne is ſent to the K. of Caſtile.

The ſtates of the realme were twiſe aſſembled at London about the grant of this paiment, but all in vaine; ſo that they were conſtreined to paſſe it ouer with ſilence, and to ſurceaſſe in the matter to their great gréefe, and namelie the earle of Cornewall, who had taken great paines therein. Yet for that he would not returne with emptie hand, he leuied by rigorous means a great ſumme of the Iewes (of whom a maine multitude inhabited at that ſeaſon in London) and therewith returning to his brother king Henrie, ſhewed him how he had ſped. The king was not a little offended with them that thus had denied to helpe him with monie, inſomuch that vpon euerie light occaſion, he was readie to reuenge his diſpleaſure towards them, in taking awaie ſuch grants of priuileges and liberties as before he had made. But now to auoid ſuſpicion of his feined pretenſe of war betwixt him and king Alfonſe, he ſent his ſonne Edward into Caſtile vnto the ſame Alfonſe, vnder a color to compound with him for peace, wheras the verie occaſion of his going thither, was to purchaſe him the ladie Elenor to wife, that was ſiſter to the ſaid king Alfonſe.

He marrieth the ladie Elenor daughter to K. Alfonſe.

Ran. Higd. Polydor.

At his comming to the court of Spaine, he was verie honorablie receiued of the king, and in the end, vpon conference had of his meſſage, obteined his ſuit, ſo that king Alfonſe was content to beſtow vpon him his daughter in marriage, with the countie of Pontieu in France, which ſhe held in right of hir mother queene Ione, the ſecond wife of Ferdinando the king of Caſtile, father vnto this king Alfonſe, which Ione was the onelie daughter and heire of Simon earle of Pontieu, and had iſſue by hir huſband the ſaid Ferdinando two ſonnes, Ferdinando and Lewes, with one daughter; to wit, the foreſaid Elenor, the which by reaſon hir brethren died yoong, was heire to hir mother. The lord Edward hauing diſpatched his buſineſſe according to his deſire, returned with a ioifull hart to his father, and declared to him what he had doone. His father moſt glad thereof, for an augmentation of honour, created him prince of Wales and earle of Cheſter, and appointed him to be his deputie and generall lieutenant both in Guien and in Ireland, and gaue to him the townes of Briſtow, Stamford and Grantham. Hereof came it, that euer after the kings eldeſt ſonne was made immediatlie vpon his birth prince of Wales and earle of Cheſter. He created alſo his other ſonne named Edmund earle of Lancaſter.

Ships of a ſtrange mold.

About this ſeaſon were certeine ſhips driuen by force of wind and weather into certeine hauens on the north coaſts of England towards Barwike, which ſhips were of a verie ſtrange forme and faſhion, but mightie and ſtrong. The men that were aboord the ſame ſhips were of ſome farre countrie, for their language was vnknowne, and not vnderſtandable to any man that could be brought to talke with them. The fraught and balaſt of the ſhips was armour and weapon, as habergeons, helmets, ſpeares, bowes, arrowes, croſbowes and darts, with great ſtore of vittels. There laie alſo without the hauens on the coaſt diuerſe other ſhips of like forme, mold and faſhion. Thoſe that were driuen into the hauens were ſtaied for a time by the bailiffes of the ports. But finallie, when it could not be knowne what they were, nor from whence they came, they were licenced to depart without loſſe or harme in bodie or goods.

Gaſton de Bierne attempteth to take the citie of Baion.

About Candlemaſſe, Gaſton de Bierne, aſſembling togither a multitude of the kings enimies, thorough the intelligence of ſome of the citizens of Baion that fauoured not the king, wrought ſo, that certeine of his number entred that citie, meaning to haue bereft the king of the dominion thereof. But other of the citizins (namelie thoſe of the meaner ſort which fauoured the king) made ſuch reſiſtance, that the enimies which were entred, were apprehended, and diuerſe of them ſuffered puniſhment, as they had well deſerued. After this, there chanced a mutinie in the Engliſh armie, bicauſe the kings brethren and the biſhop of Hereford tooke vpon them to puniſh certeine Welſhmen, for that without commiſſion they had beene abrod to ſpoile within the French confines. Therefore in aſmuch as the puniſhment ſeemed to exceed the degree and qualitie of the offenſe; and againe, for that the earle of Hereford being conſtable of the hoſt by inheritance ought to haue had the order of all corrections in caſes of ſuch offenſes, the Engliſhmen were in mind to haue ſlaine all the Poictouins in deſpite of the kings brethren, if the king had not in humble wiſe ſought to haue appeaſed their furie.

A mutinie in the Engliſh armie.

A mightie ſtorme of haile.

The wind continuing this yeare for the ſpace of three moneths and od daies northerlie, did greatlie hinder the growth and increaſe of flowres and fruits: and about the firſt of Iulie there fell ſuch a ſtorme of haile and raine, as the like had not beene ſeene nor heard of in thoſe daies, breaking downe the tiles and other couerings of houſes, with boughes of trees, by the violent aboundance and force of the water and haileſtones, which continued aboue the ſpace of an houre powring and beating downe inceſſantlie. After this, when the king had remained a whole yeare in Guien, he returned homewards through France, and comming vnto Charters, was honorablie there receiued of Lewes the French king, as then latelie returned out of the holie land, and from thence he was roiallie by the ſame king Lewes brought vnto Paris. The counteſſe of Cornewall went ouer with a noble traine of lords, gentlemen, and others, to be preſent at the meeting of hir two ſiſters, the queenes of England and France, ſo that the roialtie of the aſſemblie on ech part was great.

After that king Henrie had continued there for his pleaſure certeine daies, he returned to England, landing at Douer in Chriſtmaſſe weeke. This iournie into Gaſcoigne was verie coſtlie, and to ſmall purpoſe (as writers haue recorded) for the kings charges amounted to the ſumme of 27 hundred thouſand pounds and aboue, except lands and rents, which he gaue vnaduiſedlie to thoſe which little deſerued, but rather ſought the hinderance both of him and his realme, beſides the gift of 30 thouſand marks, which he beſtowed vpon his halfe brethren by the mothers ſide, not reckoning the lands nor rents, neither yet the wards nor the horſſes, nor iewels which he gaue to them beſides, being of price ineſtimable. Thus in two iournies which he made, the one into Poictou, which countrie he loſt; and the other into Gaſcoigne, which he hardlie preſerued; he ſpent more treaſure than a wiſe chapman would haue giuen for them both if they had beene ſet on ſale (as Matthew Paris writeth) ſo that it might be verified in him that is meant by the old prouerbe,

Qui procul excurrit, ſed nil mercatur ibidem,
Si via longa fuit, rediens triſtatur hic idem.

Moreouer to increaſe the kings vaine charges, ſo it fell out, that pope Innocent bearing grudge towards Conrade king of Sicill, offered that kingdome (as before is partlie touched) to Richard duke of Cornewall, who refuſed the offer, aſwell for other cauſes, as chieflie for that the pope would not agree to ſuch conditions as earle Richard thought neceſſarie for his aſſurance. Wherevpon the pope granted that kingdome vnto king Henrie, with manie godlie promiſes of aid to his furtherance for atteining the poſſeſſion thereof. King Henrie ioifullie receiued that grant, and called his ſonne Edmund openlie by the name of K. of Sicill, and to furniſh the pope with monie for the maintenance of his war againſt Conrade, he got togither all ſuch ſums as he could make, aſwell out of his owne coffers, and out of the excheker, as by borrowing of his brother earle Richard, and likewiſe what he could ſcrape from the Iewes, or otherwiſe extort by the rapine of the iuſtices itinerants: all which he ſent to the pope, who not content herwith (when he began eftſoones to want) wrote againe to the king for more.

The pope o fereth ÿ kin dome of Si cill vnto the king of Eng land,

The k keth great ſhift for mo to ſend to pope.

The king through the inſtinct of the diuell, to anſwer the popes auarice, ſent him letters patents obligatorie, ſigned with his roiall ſeale, by which he might take by way of lone ſuch ſummes of monie, as would largelie ſerue his turne of the merchants Italians, willing him not to ſticke at the diſburſing of treaſure, nor at the great quantitie of the intereſt riſing vpon the vſurie, for he would diſcharge all: and herevnto he bound himſelfe vnder paine to forfeit his kingdome and other his heritages. The pope conſenting herevnto, accepted this large offer. If he did well herein (ſaith Matthew Paris) the Lord the iudge of all iudges iudge it, to whom apperteineth the care of all things. To conclude, much monie was ſpent, for the pope ſpared not the king of Englands purſſe, though little good was done therewith. At length Conrade died, not without ſuſpicion of poiſon. The pope being aduertiſed of his death, reioiſed greatlie, as he well vttered in plaine words, saieng; Let vs all that be the children of the Romiſh church reioiſe, for now two of our greateſt enimies are diſpatched out of the waie; the one a ſpirituall man, that is to ſaie, Robert biſhop of Lincolne; and the other a laie-man, that is Conrade king of Sicill. But yet the pope miſſed of his purpoſe, for Manfred the baſtard ſonne of the emperour Frederike the ſecond, was ſhortlie after proclaimed king of Sicill, and ſo the ſecond errour was greater than the firſt.

A parlem

About the quindene of Eaſter, there was a parlement holden at London, at the which were aſſembled all the ſtates of the realme in greater number than had beene commonlie ſeene. This parlement was cheefelie called, to let them vnderſtand the kings neceſſitie of monie for diſcharging of his debts, and to require them of their aid towards the ſame. But whereas he requeſted more than was thought ſtood with reaſon, they would not agree thervnto, but deſired that he would confirme, and without all cauillation ſweare to obſerue the liberties which by the charter he had promiſed to hold. Moreouer they required, that by the common councell of the realme they might choſe to them the cheefe iuſtice, the chancellour and treaſuror, but they were anſwered plainelie by ſome of the priuie councell, that this requeſt would at no hand be granted.

The ſtates refuſe to grant a ſubſidie.

Furthermore, the prelats complained, that they were driuen to paie the tenths which they promiſed conditionallie, as it were now by conſtreint and of dutie, to the preiudice of the liberties of the church. The Nobles alſo found themſelues greeued for the exactions which they ſaw at hand, but finallie, after manie things had beene debated touching theſe matters, the parlement was adiourned till Michaelmas next, and euerie man departed to his home, with no great truſt of the kings good will towards them, nor anie hartie thanks receiued of him for their paines, as may be thought by that which writers haue recorded. Two Noble men, to whom the cuſtodie and guiding of the king and queene of Scots was committed, that is to ſay, Robert de Ros, and John de Bailioll, were accuſed, for miſuſing themſelues in the truſt and charge which they had taken vpon them. King Henrie was the ſame time at Notingham. The information came forth by a phyſician, who was ſent from the queene of England, vnto hir daughter the queene of Scots, to be about hir for gard of hir health, but bicauſe the ſame phyſician (whoſe name was Reignold of Bath) perceiued the queene of Scots to be impaired in health through anguiſh of mind, by reaſon of the miſdemeanor of ſuch as had the gouernement of hir and hir huſband, he ſticked not to blame and reproue them in their doings, for the which he was poiſoned, as ſome thinke: for the truth was, he ſhortlie after ſickened and died, ſignifieng vpon his death-bed vnto the queene of England what he miſliked and thought amiſſe in thoſe that had the doings about hir daughter and hir huſband the Scotiſh king.

The parlemẽt adiourned.

The mone ſuffered a maruellous eclipſe on the night following the day of S. Margaret in Julie. It began afore midnight, and continued foure houres. The king in the behalfe of his daughter the queene of Scots raiſed a power, and drew northwards, ſending before him the earle of Glouceſter, and John Manſell that was his chapleine and one of his councell. Theſe two ſo vſed the matter, that they came to Edenburgh, where the king and queene of Scots then laie in the caſtell, into the which they entred, and altred the order of the houſhold, ſo as ſtood with the contentation of the king and queene; which were in ſuch wiſe vſed before that time, that they were not ſuffered to lie togither, nor ſcarſe come to talke togither.

An eclipſe.

The earle of Glocester & John Manſell ſent into Scotland.

Robert de Ros was ſummoned to appeare before the king of England, to anſwer to ſuch things as might be laid to his charge. At the firſt he withdrew himſelfe, but afterwards he came in, and ſubmitted himſelfe to the kings pleaſure. Diuerſe of the nobles of Scotland tooke it not well, that the earle of Glouceſter and John Manſell ſhould thus come into the caſtell of Edenburgh, and order things in the kings houſe in ſuch ſort at their pleaſure: wherevpon they aſſembled a power, and beſieged the caſtell, but at length perceiuing their owne error, they raiſed their ſiege and departed. John de Bailioll being accuſed of the like crime that was laid to the charge of his fellow Robert de Ros, for a peece of monie bought his peace and was pardoned, but the lands of Robert de Ros were ſeized into the kings hands. Finallie, the king and queene of England came to an enteruiew with the king of Scots and the queene their daughter, and ſetting all things with them in ſuch order as was thought conuenient, they returned towards the ſouth parts.

Robert de Ros ſummoned to appeare.

In the meane ſeaſon, the biſhop of Hereford deuiſed a ſhift to helpe the K. with monie, towards the paiments of his debts, by obteining certeine autentike ſeales of the prelats of this land, wherewith he ſigned certeine inſtruments and writings, wherein was expreſſed, that he had receiued diuerſe ſummes of monie for diſpatch of buſineſſe perteining to them and to their churches, of this and that merchant of Florence or Siena, whereby they ſtood bound for repaiment thereof by the ſame inſtruments and writings ſo made by him their agent in their names. This ſhift was deuiſed by the ſaid biſhop of Hereford, with licence obteined therevnto of the king, and alſo of the pope, vnto whome for the ſame intent the ſaid biſhop was ſent, with ſir Robert Walerane knight. The pope was the ſooner perſuaded to grant licence for the contriuing of ſuch manner of ſhift, bicauſe the monie ſhould go to the diſcharging of the kings debts, into the which he was run, by bearing the charges of the warres againſt the king of Sicill.

A ſhift to get monie of the biſhops deuiſed by the biſh. of Hereford.

About the feaſt of ſaint Edward, the parlement began againe at London, in which the ſtates treated of a ſubſidie to be granted to the king, but they could not conclude thereof, neither would Richard earle of Cornewall diſburſe anie monie at that ſeaſon to his brother the king, bicauſe he allowed not the maner of laieng it out for the warres againſt Manfred, being taken in hand without his conſent. The ſame yeare, the king by the procurement of his brother Richard earle of Cornewall, had ſeized the liberties of the citie of London into his owne hands, vnder colour that the maior had not doone his dutie in the iuſt puniſhing of bakers for breaking of the aſſiſes of their bread. Herevpon, where the maior and communaltie of the citie had by the kings grant the citie to farme, with diuerſe cuſtomes and offices, at a certeine rate and ſtinted ſumme of monie; now the king ſet officers therein at his pleaſure, which were accomptable to him for all the reuenues and profits that grew within the citie.

A parlement.

Richard earle of Cornewall ſtandeth againſt his brother for the grant of a ſubſidie.

The liberties of London ſeized into the kings hands.

But whereas the malice which the earle of Cornewall bare to the citie, was, for that they would not exchange with him certeine grounds that belonged to their communaltie, they were glad to agree with him, and paie vnto him ſix hundred marks. After which agreement concluded, about the ninteenth daie of Nouember, they were ſhortlie after reſtored to their liberties. This chanced before the kings comming ouer, who at his comming to London, lodged in the tower, and vpon new diſpleaſure conceiued againſt the citie for the eſcape of a priſoner (being a clearke conuict) out of Newgate, which had killed a prior, that was of aliance to the king, as couſine to the queene, the king ſent for the maior and the ſhiriffs to come before him to anſwer the matter. The maior laid the fault from him to the ſhiriffes, for ſo much as to them belonged the keeping of all the priſoners within the citie: and ſo the maior returned home againe, but the ſhiriffes remained there as priſoners by the ſpace of a whole moneth or more, and yet they excuſed themſelues, in that the fault cheefelie reſted in the biſhops officers: for whereas the priſoner was vnder his cuſtodie, they at his requeſt had granted him licence to impriſon the offendor within their ward of Newgate, but ſo as his officers were charged to ſée him ſafe kept. The king notwithſtanding demanded of the citie thrée thouſand marks for a fine.

The king demandeth monie of the Iewes.

Moreouer, whereas he ſtood in great néed of monie, he required by way of a tallage eight thouſand marks of the Iewes, charging them on paine of hanging, not to deferre that paiment. The Iewes ſore impoueriſhed with gréeuous and often paiments excuſed themſelues by the popes vſurers, and reproued plainelie the kings exceſſiue taking of monie, as well of his chriſtian ſubiects as of them. The king on the other ſide, to let it be knowne that he taxed not his people without iuſt occaſion, and vpon neceſſitie that droue him thereto, confeſſed openlie, that he was indebted by his bonds obligatorie, in thrée hundred thouſand marks: and againe, the yearelie reuenues aſſigned to his ſonne prince Edward, aroſe to the ſumme of fiftéene thouſand marks and aboue, where the reuenues that belonged vnto the crowne were greatlie diminiſhed, in ſuch wiſe, that without the aid of his ſubiects, he ſhould neuer be able to come out of debt. To be ſhort, when he had fléeced the Iewes to the quicke, he ſet them to farme vnto his brother earle Richard, that he might pull off ſkin and all; but yet conſidering their pouertie, he ſpared them, and neuertheleſſe, to relieue his brothers neceſſitie, vpon a pawne he lent him an huge maſſe of monie. Theſe ſhifts did the king vſe from time to time, not caring with what exactions and impoſitions he burthened the inhabitants of his land, whereby he procured vnto himſelfe the name of an oppreſſor and couetous ſcraper. But what wonder is it in a king, ſith

An elephant ſent to the K.

An ewer of pearle, peraduenture an agat.

About the ſame time, Lewes the French king ſent vnto king Henrie for a preſent an elephant, a beaſt moſt ſtrange and woonderfull to the Engliſh people, ſith moſt ſeldome or neuer any of that kind had béene ſéene in England before that time. The French quéene alſo ſent for a preſent vnto the king of England an ewer of pearle like to a peacocke in forme and faſhion, garniſhed moſt richlie with gold, ſiluer, and ſaphires to furniſh him foorth in all points of fine and cunning workemanſhip, to the verie reſemblance of a liuing peacocke. ¶ Manie woonders chanced about this time. The ſea roſe with moſt high tides, riuers were ſo filled with abundance of water, by reaſon of the great continuall raine, that maruellous flouds followed therevpon. A comet alſo appeared, and manie high buildings were ſtriken by force of tempeſts. The death of Walter archbiſhop of Yorke followed theſe prodigious wonders, who had gouerned that ſée the ſpace of fortie yeares. After him ſucceeded one Seuall the 34 archbiſhop of that citie.

Elianor the wife of prince Edward cōmeth to the citie.

About the feaſt of S. Etheldred, the ladie Elianor wife of prince Edward the kings ſon, came to London, where ſhe was honorablie receiued of the citizens, & conueied through the citie to S. Iones without Smithfield, and there lodged for a ſeaſon, and yer long ſhe remooued to the Sauoy. It was not long after, that the king ſeized the liberties of the citie of London into his hands, for certeine monie which the quéene claimed as due to hir of a certeine right to be paid by the citizens, ſo that about the feaſt of S. Martine in Nouember, they gaue vnto the king foure hundred marks, and then had their liberties to them againe reſtored, and the kings vnder-treaſuror diſcharged, which for the time was made cuſtos or kéeper of the citie.

The liberties of the citie reſtored to the Londoners.

A legat from the pope named Ruſcand a Gaſcoigne.

About the ſame time came another legat from the pope, namelie, one Ruſcand a Gaſcoigne borne, to whom, with the archb. of Canturburie, and the biſhop of Hereford, the pope had granted authoritie to collect and gather the tenths of the ſpiritualtie within England, Scotland, and Ireland, to the vſe of the pope and the king, notwithſtanding all priuiledges, for what cauſe or vnder what forme of words ſo euer the ſame had paſſed. This Ruſcand alſo abſolued the king of his vow made to go into the holie land, to the end he might go againſt Manfred king of Sicill. He alſo preached the croſſe againſt the ſame Manfred, promiſing all thoſe remiſſion of their ſins which ſhould go to war againſt Manfred, as well as if they ſhould go into the holie land, to warre againſt Gods enimies there, whereat faithfull men much maruelled, that he ſhould promiſe as great méed for the ſhedding of chriſtian bloud, as the bloud of infidels.

Tenths gathered for the pope.

The croſſe preached againſt Manfred.

The craftie and ſlie fetches which were vſed in this ſeaſon by this Ruſcand the biſhop of Hereford, and other their complices, to get monie of the prelats and gouernors of monaſteries within this realme, were wonderfull, & verie gréeuous to thoſe that felt themſelues oppreſſed therewith; and namelie, for the debt which the ſaid biſhop of Hereford had charged them with, they being not priuie to the receipt, nor hauing any benefit thereby. Ruſcand called a councell at London, & propounded great cauſes why the prelats ought to aid the pope, and ſo therevpon demanded great ſummes of monie. Amongſt other ſummes, he demanded ſix hundred marks of the houſe of S. Albons.

A councell called at London by the legat.

Matth. Paris.

The church men being pinched by their purſes fret and fume againſt the popes procedings in that behalfe.

To conclude, his demands were eſtéemed vnreaſonable, ſo that the biſhops and abbats were in a maruellous perplexitie, perceiuing into what miſerable ſtate by reaſon of immoderate exactions the church of England was brought. The biſhop of London ſticked not to ſaie, that he would rather loſe his head, than conſent that the church ſhould be brought to ſuch ſeruitude as the legat went about to inforce. And the biſhop of Worceſter openlie proteſted, that he would ſooner ſuffer himſelfe to be hanged, than to ſée the church ſubiect to ſuch oppreſſion by their examples. Other alſo taking a boldneſſe vnto them, affirmed, that they would follow the ſteps of Thomas ſometime archbiſhop of Canturburie, which for the liberties of the church ſuffered himſelfe to haue his braines cut out of his head. Yet were thoſe prelats euill troubled, for the king was againſt them on the one ſide, and the pope gaping after monie was become their vtter enimie on the other: neither were the Noble men much mooued with pitie towards the church their mother (as the terme then went) now thus in miſerie.

The biſhops would rather become martyrs, than loſe their monie.

Finallie, the prelats appealed from Ruſcand, vnto the popes preſence, and would not obeie the wilfull and violent oppreſſions of the ſame Ruſcand, ſo that much adoo there was, and a great complaint made to the king by Ruſcand, of the ſtubborne diſobedience of the prelats, and namelie of the biſhop of London. The king was in a great chafe with him, and threatned that he would cauſe the pope to puniſh him according to that he well deſerued: but the biſhop anſwered thereto; Let the pope and king (ſaith he) which are ſtronger than I am, take from me my biſhoprike, which by law yet they cannot doo: let them take awaie my miter, yet an helmet ſhall remaine.

Anno Reg. 41.

This yeare after S. Lukes daie, the king aſſembled a great number of the nobilitie at London, and thither came the biſhop of Bologna la graſſe from the pope, bringing with him a ring, with the which he inueſted Edmund the kings ſonne king of Sicill and Naples. About the ſame time, the burgeſſe of Darbie obteined of the king for a ſumme of monie to haue the iuſtices itinerants to hold their aſſiſes at Darbie for the countie of Darbie, and likewiſe the ſhiriffes to kéepe their tournies there, and not at Nothingham, as before they had béene accuſtomed for both the ſhires. But now to returne to the biſhops.

Chro. Dun.

In the meane time, the biſhop of Hereford and Ruſcand ſought to ſet variance and diſcord amongſt the Engliſh prelats, whereby being diuided in parts, and not conſenting togither, they ſhould be leſſe able to giue true information to the pope, how the verie truth reſted. But finallie, bicauſe the archbiſhop of Canturburie was in the parts beyond the ſea, and for that alſo the ſée of Yorke was vacant, and diuerſe biſhops were abſent, the councell was proroged till the feaſt of S. Hilarie, and ſo they departed euerie man to his home in a maruellous doubt what waie were beſt for them to take, ſith they ſaw themſelues in great diſtreſſe, if Ruſcand did ſuſpend or excommunicate any of them either iuſtlie or otherwiſe. For ſure they were, that the king as a lion lieng in wait whome he might deuoure (to get monie) after fortie daies were paſt, if they ſubmitted not themſelues, would ſpoile them of all their goods as forfeited. So that the pope and the king ſéemed as though the ſhéepheard and woolfe had béene confederate togither to the deſtruction of the poore flocke of ſhéepe, threatning euerie mans vndoing, to their owne inriching: and not ceaſing, till with fulneſſe they were forced to fall from the fleſh, much like bloudſucking horſléeches, of whoſe nature it is notablie noted, that

Non miſſura priùs carnem, quàm plena cruoris,

Thus by reaſon of couetous gréedineſſe to get monie for the furniſhing of the popes warres againſt Manfred king of Sicill, both the pope and the king of England ran in ſlander and hatred of the Engliſh nation, namelie, of the ſpiritualtie, ſo that ſuch as recorded the acts and doings of that time, ſpared not to make manifeſt to the world by their writings, how iniuriouſlie they were handled, blaming the practiſes of the court of Rome in plaine terms, and affirming that the pope had power in thoſe things which worke to edification, and not to deſtruction. About this ſeaſon, Iohn lord Grey, being one of the chéefe councellors to the king, a right honourable knight, and for his good demeanor and high valiancie greatlie commended of all, withdrew himſelfe from the court, either by reaſon of age that deſireth reſt, or rather (as was thought) for that he doubted to beare blame for ſuch errors as were dailie committed by them that bare rule about the king, which could not but bring the authors into great infamie at length, and therefore was he loth to be partaker with them of ſuch ſlander as might haue redounded to him alſo, if he had ſtill continued and taried amongſt them.

Alſo, vpon the two and twentith of Nouember, were brought vnto Weſtminſter a hundred and two Iews from Lincolne, that were accuſed for the crucifieng of a child in the laſt ſummer, in deſpight of Chriſtes religion. They were vpon their examination ſent to the tower. The child which they had ſo crucified was named Hugh, about an eight yeares of age. They kept him ten daies after they got him into their hands, ſending in the meane time vnto diuerſe other places of the realme, for other of their nation to be preſent at the crucifieng of him. The murther came out, by the diligent ſearch made by the mother of the child, who found his bodie in a well, on the backe ſide of the Iews houſe, where he was crucified: for ſhe had learned, that hir ſonne was laſtlie ſéene plaieng with certeine Iews children of like age to him, before the dore of the ſame Iew. The Iew that was owner of the houſe, was apprehended, and being brought before ſir Iohn de Lexinton, vpon promiſe of pardon, confeſſed the whole matter. For they vſed yearelie (if they could come by their preie) to crucifie one chriſtian child or other. The king vpon knowledge had hereof, would not pardon this Iew that had ſo confeſſed the matter, but cauſed him to be executed at Lincolne, who comming to the place where he ſhould die, opened more matter concerning ſuch as were of counſell and preſent at the crucifieng of the poore innocent. Wherevpon at length alſo eightéene of them that were ſo brought to London, were conuinced, adiudged and hanged, the other remained long in priſon.

When the feaſt of ſaint Hilarie was come, the cleargie met againe at London, and fell to intreat of their former buſineſſe, at what time one maiſter Leonard aliàs Reignold that was choſen prolocutor for all the prelats, amongſt other anſwers made to the legat Ruſcand, when the ſame Ruſcand alledged that all churches were the popes; Truth it is ſaid Leonard, to defend, and not to vſe and appropriate them to ſerue his owne turne; as we ſaie, that all is the princes, meaning that all is his to defend, and not to ſpoile: and ſuch was the intent of the founders. Ruſcand ſore offended herewith, ſaid, he would that euerie man ſhould ſpeake afterwards for himſelfe, that as well the pope as the king might vnderſtand what euerie man ſaid in their buſineſſe and matters. The prelats were ſtriken in a dumpe herewith, for they perceiued how the matter went: they appealed yet againſt the demands that were made by Ruſcand, who would not change a word of that he had written, in which was conteined, that the prelats had acknowledged themſelues to haue borrowed of the merchant ſtrangers, no ſmall ſummes of monie, and the ſame to be conuerted to the vſe of their churches, which was moſt vntrue as all men well vnderſtood: wherevpon the prelats affirmed, and not without reaſonable cauſe, that there was a greater occaſion in this cauſe of martyrdome, than in that of Thomas ſometime archbiſhop of Canturburie.

The prolocutors anſwer to the popes legat.

The prelats appeale.

Marke the cauſe of martyrdome.

Ruſcand at length, perceiuing their manner, became ſomewhat more mild, and promiſed that he would talke with the pope of this matter. But firſt there was ſent to Rome the deane of Pauls in London, and certeine others, as attornies or agents for the whole cleargie of England. Theſe ſped ſo in their ſuit, that the pope tooke order that if the prelats paid the monie by force of the contriued writings, whereby they ſtood bound for them, their houſes, and churches; then, to eaſe their burthen, they might reteine in their hands ſuch parcell of tenths as they ought to paie to the king, for furniſhing of his wars againſt the Saracens, amounting to the ſumme which they ſhould be conſtreined to paie for the bonds made to the merchants, by the biſhop of Hereford (as before is recited.)

The deane of ſaint Paules ſent to Rome on the behalfe of the prelats.

In this ſeaſon the deuotion, which manie had conceiued of the pope and the church of Rome, began to wax cold, reputing the vertue which he ſhewed at his entring into the papaſie, to be rather a colourable hypocriſie, than otherwiſe, ſith his procéedings anſwered not to his good beginnings: for as it was manifeſt, where ſutors brought their complaints into the court of Rome, ſuch ſped beſt as gaue moſt bribes, and the two priors of Wincheſter, the one expelled, and the other got in by intruſion, could well witneſſe the ſame: and all the world knoweth that the viperous generation of Romaniſts, reckoning from the ringleader to the ſimpleſt ſhaueling, haue made gaine the ſcope of their holineſſe, and as it is truelie ſaid,

Mens deuotion towards the pope waxeth cold.

Magnus king of Man.

In the feaſt of Eaſter this yeare, the king adorned Magnus king of Man, with the order of knighthood, and beſtowed vpon him great gifts and honors. ¶ The counteſſe of Warren Aueſia or Ateſia (as ſome bookes haue) ſiſter to the king by his mother, departed this life in hir flouriſhing youth, vnto the great griefe of hir brother, but ſpeciallie of hir huſband John earle of Waren that loued hir intierlie. ¶ About the midſt of Maie, the Jewes that were in the towre, and in other priſons for the murther of the child at Lincolne, and had béene indited by an inqueſt vpon the confeſſion of him that had ſuffered at Lincolne, were now diſmiſſed and ſet at libertie, to the number of foure and thirtie of them. ¶ In Whitſuntide was holden a great iuſts at Blie, where the lord Edward the kings eldeſt ſonne firſt began to ſhew proofe of his chiualrie. There were diuerſe ouerthrowen and hurt, and amongſt other William de Longſpée was ſo bruſed, that he could neuer after recouer his former ſtrength.

A proclamation for knighthood.

A ſore tempeſt of wind and raine.

The king cauſed a proclamation to be ſet foorth, that all ſuch as might diſpend fiftéene pounds in lands, ſhould receiue the order of knighthood; and thoſe that would not or could not, ſhould paie their fines. This yeare, thrée daies after the feaſt of S. Ciricus, a maruellous ſore tempeſt of wind, raine, haile, and thunder chanced, that did excéeding much hurt. Mill-whéeles by the violence of waters were carried away, and the wind-milles were no leſſe tormented with the rage of wind. Arches of bridges, ſtackes of haie, houſes that ſtood by water ſides, and children in cradels were borne awaie, that both wonderfull and no leſſe pitifull it was to ſée. At Bedford the riuer of Ouſe bare downe ſix houſes togither, and did vnſpeakeable hurt thereabouts.

The king of Scots commeth into England.

John Manſell feaſted the two kings.

Alexander the third king of Scots with his wife quéene Margaret, came about the beginning of Auguſt into England, and found the king at his manor of Woodſtoke, where he ſolaced him a ſeaſon, and had the lands of the earle of Huntington reſtored vnto him, which his grandfather king William in his time loſt and forfeited. Here he did homage to king Henrie. Vpon the day of the decollation of S. John, the two kings with their quéenes came to London, where they were honorablie receiued, and ſo conueied vnto Weſtminſter. On the day of S. Auguſtine the biſhop, being the eight and twentith of Auguſt, John Manſell the kings chapleine beſought the two kings, and other ſtates, to dine with him on the morrow following, which they granted, and ſo he made a maruellous great dinner. There were ſeuen hundred meſſes ſerued vp, but the multitude of gheſts was ſuch, that ſcarſe the ſame ſufficed; his houſe was not able to receiue them all, and therefore he cauſed tents and booths to be ſet vp for them. The like dinner had not béene made by any chapleſne before that time. All thoſe that came were worthilie receiued, feaſted and interteined, in ſuch ſort, as euerie man was ſatiſfied.

Finallie, vpon good deliberation had in the matter, he conſented therevnto: wherevpon the lords that came with the meſſage, being right glad of their anſwer, returned with all ſpéed to ſignifie the ſame vnto thoſe from whom they had béene ſent. The treaſure of this earle Richard now elected king of Almaine, was eſtéemed to amount vnto ſuch a ſumme, that he might diſpend euerie day a hundred marks, for the terme of ten yeares togither, not reckoning at all the reuenues which dailie accrewed to him of his rents in Almaine and England.

the king,

In this meane time the vnquiet Welſhmen, after the death of their prince Dauid, choſe in his ſtéed one Leolin, that was ſon to the ſame Griffin that brake his necke as he would haue eſcaped out of the towre of London; and herewith they began a new rebellion, either driuing out ſuch Engliſhmen as laie there in gariſons within the caſtels and fortreſſes, or elſe entring into the ſame by ſome traitorous practiſe, they ſlue thoſe which they found within them, to the great diſpleaſure of their ſoueraigne lord Edward the kings eldeſt ſonne, who coueting to be reuenged of their rebellious enterpriſes, could not bring his purpoſe to paſſe, by reaſon of the vnſeaſonable weather and continuall raine which fell that winter, ſo raiſing the waters & ſetting the mariſhes on floods, that he could not paſſe with his armie.

Moreouer, his father the king wanted monie and treaſure to furniſh him withall, howbeit prince Edward borrowed of his vncle erle Richard foure thouſand marks towards the maintenance of that war. The rebellion of the Welſhmen ſpeciallie roſe by the hard dealing of ſir Geffrey de Langlie knight, the kings collector amongſt them, who handled them ſo ſtreightlie, that in defenſe of their countrie, lawes, and liberties (as they pretended) they put on armour. They tooke and deſtroied the lands and poſſeſſions which were great and large, of Griffin Brunet, being fled for ſafegard of his life vnto the king of England. There were of thoſe Welſh rebels at the point of twentie thouſand men, and of them ten thouſand were horſſemen, the which perceiuing the ſeaſon to make for their purpoſe, defended themſelues ſo manfullie, that they droue backe prince Edward and his armie, & ſo continuing the wars, did much hurt to the Engliſh mariſhes. Their power ſo increaſed, that at length they diuided the ſame in two equall parts, the better to recouer vittels, and in either armie there were eſtéemed thirtie thouſand armed men, after the maner of their countrie, of the which there were fiue hundred men of armes in either hoſt, with barded horſſes all couered in iron. Thus being of ſuch puiſſance, they did much miſchéefe to the Engliſhmen that inhabited on the marſhes, neither were the lords marchers able to reſiſt them, although the earle of Gloceſter aided the ſame lords all that he might.

King Henrie being hereof aduertiſed, ſent with all ſpéed Stephan Bauzan, a man ſkilfull in feats of warre, with a great number of ſoldiers into Wales, againſt the rebels, who comming into that countrie, and entring into the lands of a Welſh lord named

Riſe Vaughan, was intrapt by ſuch ambuſhments as his enimies laid for him, and thereby was ſlaine with the more part of his armie. This ouerthrowe chanced by the treaſon of Griffin de Brunet, who at that preſent reuolting from the Engliſh ſide to his countrimen, inſtructed them in all things, how they might vanquiſh their enimies. At that time, Northwales and Southwales ioined in league and fréendlie amitie togither, which commonlie was not ſéene in thoſe daies, they being for the more part at variance, the one rather ſéeking ſtill how to indamage the other: but now in defenſe of their liberties (as they pretended) they agréed in one.

The king ſore moued herewith, determined to go himſelfe into Wales, that he might take worthie puniſhment of thoſe his aduerſaries, that could neuer be ſufficientlie chaſtiſed. Whervpon raiſing a great power, he haſted forth, and comming into Wales, put the rebels in ſuch feare, that they withdrew to their accuſtomed places of refuge, I meane the woods and mareſhes. The king would faine haue had them forth, that he might haue puniſhed them according to their deſerts, and therefore to bring his purpoſe the better to paſſe, he ſent for an armie of ſoldiers into Ireland, and tarried for their comming at the caſtell of Brecknoke, but the yeare was farre ſpent yer his people could be gathered, ſo that by the aduiſe of his lords he ſtrengthened certeine caſtels, and ſo returned for that yeare into England, leauing the lord Roger Mortimer his lieutenant in Wales, to reſiſt the rebels. But now let vs ſpeake of other dooings which chanced in the meane while that the warres thus continued and laſted betwixt England and Wales.

Yée ſhall vnderſtand, that in the Lent ſeaſon, the archbiſhop of Meſſina came as legat from the pope hither into England, with letters of procuration, to demand and receiue, and alſo with power, to puniſh ſuch as ſhould denie and ſéeme to reſiſt, and ſo being here arriued with a great traine of ſeruants and horſes, he ſent forth his commandements in writing to euerie prelat, to prouide him monie by way of prorie ſo that of the houſe of S. Albons, and of the celles that belonged therevnto, he had one and twentie marks, and when the monks of S. Albons came to viſit him in his houſe, they could not be permitted to depart, but were kept as priſoners, till they had ſatiſfied his couetous demand: for whereas they alledged that they had not brought any monie with them, he aſked them whie they were ſuch beggers, and further ſaid, Send yée then to ſome merchant, that will lend you monie, and ſo it was doone: for otherwiſe they might not haue libertie to depart. This archbiſhop was of the order of the Friers preachers, in whome (ſaith Matthew Paris) we had hoped to haue found more abundant humilitie. About the ſame time, there appeared at London a new order of Friers, not knowen till thoſe daies, hauing yet the popes autentike bulles, which they openlie ſhewed, ſo that there ſéemed a confuſion of manie orders, as the ſame Matthew Paris recordeth, and bicauſe they were apparelled in ſackecloth, they were called ſacked Friers.

A new order of Friers.

About the middeſt of Lent, there was a great parlement holden, to the which the maiſters of the Vniuerſitie of Oxford were ſummoned, that peace might be concluded betwixt them and the biſhop of Lincolne, which had them in ſuit about their liberties. There came to the ſame parlement, the earle of Gloceſter, and ſir Iohn Manſell, latelie returned out of Almaine, where they had béene on ambaſſage from Richard the elect king of Almaine. Thither came alſo the ſame elect king of Almaine, and almoſt all the Nobilitie of the realme, so that ſcarſe might the citie of London receiue the number that repaired to that parlement. The king of Almaine meant to take his leaue at that time of the lords and péeres of the realme, purpoſing ſhortlie after, to take his iournie towards Almaine, and to ordeine the biſhop of London gouernor of all his lands and poſſeſſions within England.

A parlement.

Matth. Paris.

In this parlement, the lord Edmund the kings yonger ſonne was ſhewed as king of Naples and Sicill, for the obteining of the poſſeſſion of which dominions and kingdoms, his father king Henrie demanded no ſmall ſubſidie and aid of monie, both of the temporaltie and alſo of the ſpiritualtie, but namlie, he required to haue the tenths of ſpirituall mens liuings for the terme of fiue yeares, according to the new taxations without any deductions to be allowed except neceſſarie expenſes: alſo, the fruits for one yeare of benefices that chanced to fall void within the ſaid terme of fiue yeare. Moreouer, ſundrie other duties he required to haue of the ſpirituall men, ſore to their gréeuance, and ſpeciallie, bicauſe they knew that ſuch tyrannie firſt tooke beginning from the pope. In the end (though loth they were to conſent) yet conditionallie that the king would confirme the liberties conteined in the great charter, and obſerue the ſame throughlie, now after it had béene ſo manie times brought out and redéemed, they offered to giue him towards his inſtant neceſſitie two and fiftie thouſand marks, to the irrecouerable danger of impouerishing the church. And yet, as it is ſaid, the king refuſed the gift, as that which he thought not to be ſufficient.

¶ Truelie it ſhould ſéeme, that there was a great vntowardlie diſpoſition in the ſubiects of that time, for the helping of their king with neceſſarie aid of monie, towards ſuch great charges as he had béene diuers waies occaſioned to be at, ſince his firſt comming to the crowne. But bicauſe it was perceiued that he beſtowed no ſmall quantitie of his treaſure to the aduancing of his kinſfolke and aliance, namelie ſtrangers, and againe defraied great ſummes in vaine hope to obteine the kingdoms of both the Sicils which the pope offered to him fréelie inough in words, as before yée haue heard, the Engliſh ſubiects conceiued a great miſliking of the whole gouernement, and namelie, for that he ſéemed to be led and ruled by the aduiſe and counſell of thoſe ſtrangers, who being not throughlie acquainted with the nature of the Engliſh people, nor fullie inſtructed in the lawes and cuſtomes of the realme, cauſed him to doo manie things, that procured both to him and them much ill will, as well of the hie ſtates as of the commons, which as occaſion ſerued, they were readie inough to diſcouer, and therefore they were verie inquiſitiue, both to learne what he receiued, and alſo in what ſort he beſtowed that which he did receiue and take.

It was therefore knowne, that ſince he firſt began to waſte his treaſure, his charges amounted vnto the ſumme of 950000 marks, as the bookes of accompts remaining in the hands of the clearks of his cloſet plainelie witneſſed, and yet of all thoſe vaine expenſes no great aduantage was growne thereby to the king or realme, but rather diſaduantage, as the moſt part of men then tooke it, and no maruell: for there was ſuch hart-burning amongſt the nobilitie, one enuieng an others aduancement, & repining at each others dooings, that it was not poſſible to bring any good driſt forward amongſt men ſo far at ods togither. But we will let this paſſe as a thing manifeſt inough to them that ſhall well conſider the courſe of that time, and will returne to the parlement aboue mentioned.

Before the end of this ſolemne aſſemblie of ſtates, The archbiſh. of Cullen and other ambaſſadors of Almaine.

the archbiſhop of Cullen with a duke, & an other biſhop came ouer out of Almaine, vnto their elect king Richard, to whome they did fealtie and homage, as to their ſoueraigne liege lord and gouernor, which thing once done, he gaue to the ſaid archbiſhop fiue hundred marks to beare his charges, with a rich miter ſet with ſtones, & furniſhed with plates of beaten gold; which miter when the archbiſhop had ſet it vpon his head; He hath (ſaith he) giuen a rich gift to me and to my church, and verelie, euen as I haue put this miter on my head, ſo will I ſet on his head the crowne of the kingdome of Almaine; he hath mitered me, and I will crowne him. The other lords of Almaine, which at the ſame time did homage vnto earle Richard, were alſo preſented with great and rich gifts.

Six archbiſh. preſent at London in time of the parlement.

Hée is further to be noted, that there were preſent at this parlement ſix archbiſhops, Canturburie, Yorke, Dubline, Meſſina, Tarento and Cullen. The archbiſhop of Meſſina was come to the king to ſet him on dotage for the buſineſſe about the conqueſt of Naples and Sicill. At the feaſt of Eſter next following, the archbiſhop of Cullen returned into his countrie, and the third day after Eaſter, the elect king of Almaine tooke his leaue, and departed toward Yarmouth, where he purpoſed to take the ſea, to ſaile ouer into Almaine, but by reaſon of contrarie winds he was driuen to remaine there a long time, to his great gréefe and ineſtimable charges before he could paſſe ouer; yet finallie, about the latter end of Aprill, he got foorth to the ſea, and landed at Dordreigh the firſt of Maie next inſuing.

A ſynod.

About the ſame time, the archbiſhop of Canturburie called a ſynod of the biſhops and abbats inhabiting within his prouince, that inuocating the grace of the Holie-ghoſt, they might foreſée ſome redreſſe for reléefe of the Engliſh church, now in theſe late yeares ſore diſquieted by new oppreſſions, more gréeuous than had béene accuſtomed: for the king by counſell, or rather by the whiſpering of ſome flatterers and enimies to the realme, was ſo induced, that he permitted certeine euill cuſtoms, as thornie brembles to increaſe in the fruitfull garden of pleaſure, and to choke vp the trées that brought foorth fruit in great plentie. Moreouer in this yeare, king Henrie cauſed the walles of the citie of London, which were ſore decaied and deſtitute of turrets, to be repared in more ſéemelie wiſe than before they had béene, at the common charges of the citie.

Matth. Paris.

A decrée made by the pope.

There was an ordinance made at Rome by the pope and his cardinals (which verie diligentlie foreſaw to aduance their temporall commodities, not much paſſing for other mens aduantages) that euerie one which ſhould be choſen an exempt abbat, ſhould come to the court of Rome to be there confirmed, and receiue the popes bleſſing, by which heinous ordinance, religion was laid open to great danger, and the church depriued of temporall proſperitie (as ſaith Matthew Paris) for by this means (ſaith he) it was néedfull for religious men, to chooſe to their gouernour a man not religious, but rather halfe temporall, and ſuch a one as to whome rather Iuſtinians lawes than Chriſtes which conuerteth ſoules ſhould be familiar. The moonks of Durham, who onlie with the canons of Giſborne reſiſted the wicked procéedings of the popes exactors, and ſtood therefore interdicted a long time, at length, after manie altercations, were abſolued. Oh (ſaith Matth. Paris) if in that their tribulation they might haue had fellows, and in their conſtant doings aidors, how happilie had the church of England triumphed ouer hir tormentors and oppreſſors!

Matth. Paris

The moonks of Durham that were excōmunicated are now abſolued.

Matth. Paris.

You haue heard how Richard earle of Cornewall being elected king of Almaine, ſailed thither, where on the Aſcenſion day laſt, he was crowned king by the archbiſhop of Cullen, of whom, and diuerſe other great princes of Germanie he was holden for their lawfull king and gouernour (as in the Dutch hiſtories you may find more largelie expreſſed) though other of them had choſen Alfonſe king of Caſtile, the which Alfonſe wrote to the king of England, as his confederate and alie, requiring aid of him againſt the ſaid Richard that was his owne brother, to the which vnreaſonable requeſt the king would in no wiſe conſent.

Moreouer, in this fortie one yeare of king Henries reigne, by reaſon of a roll cloſed in gréene war and found in the kings Wardrobe at Windſor, conteining as it were an information againſt the maior and ſhiriffes of London, for oppreſſion and wrongs doone to the communaltie of the citie, the king tooke great diſpleaſure, and cauſed ſtreit inquiſition to be made, as well by Fouke Moots, as Ward Moots, & diuerſe other means. At length, the maior and ſhiriffes, with the chamberlaine of the citie, were diſcharged by Iohn Manſell, one of the kings iuſtices, afore whom and other the kings councell, the inquiſition was taken, and then was the cuſtodie of the citie aſſigned vnto the conſtable of the tower, and in place of the ſhiriffes were appointed Michaell Tonie, and Iohn Audrian. At length, the maior, ſhiriffes and Aldermen that were accuſed, perceiuing the kings diſpleaſure towards them, ſubmitted themſelues wholie to his mercie, ſauing to them and to all other the citizens their liberties & franchiſes, and ſo in the excheker chamber at Weſtminſter afore the king, there ſitting in iudgement vpon the matter, they were condemned to paie their fines for their offenſes committed, and further, euerie of them diſcharged of his ward and office. Shortlie after was William Fitz Richard by the kings commandement made maior, and Thomas Fitz Thomas, and William Grapiſgate ſhiriffes.

The archbiſhop of Yorke was accurſed by the popes commandement through all England, with booke, bell and candle, that by ſuch terror his conſtancie might he weakened. But the archbiſhop (ſaith Matthew Paris) informed by the example of Thomas Becket, and by the example and doctrine of ſaint Edmund ſometime his inſtructor, and alſo taught by the faithfulneſſe of bleſſed Robert, late biſhop of Lincolne, deſpaired not of comfort from heauen, in bearing patientlie the popes tyrannie; neither would he beſtow the wealthie reuenues of his church vpon Italians, being vnworthie perſons and ſtrangers; neither would he obeie and incline to the popes will like a faint-harted perſon, by leaning and ſetting apart the rigor of the law, leaſt therby he might ſéeme to reſult from his paſtorlike office, and animate the woolfe of Rome to breake into the ſhéepfold of the church, whoſe purpoſe was to ſucke the verie bloud quite and cleane out of euerie veine, yea to bite out bowels and all. About the beginning of the two and fortith yeare of king Henries reigne, the lord Iames Audelie that had béene ouer with the king of Almaine, and was latelie returned home in companie of the lord Henrie, ſonne to the ſaid king (who came backe from his father about the feaſt of ſaint Michaell laſt paſt) vnderſtanding how the Welſhmen in his abſence had burnt, waſted, and deſtroied his lands, poſſeſſions, and caſtels, which belonged vnto him in the confines of Wales, he meant to be reuenged of thoſe iniuries, and inuading them, he ſlue a great number of them, ſo reuenging the death of thoſe his freends, ſeruants and tenants, whome they before had murthered. The Welſhmen were not ſo diſcouraged herewith, but that they brake vpon him out of their ſtarting-holes and places of refuge through the mariſhes, and ſlaieng their enimies horſſes, put them backe to their power, & ceaſſed not to doo what miſcheefe they could, by ſpoiling, killing, and burning houſes and caſtels where they might come vnto them, and ſo the realme of England was dailie put to loſſes & hindcrances. For out of Wales, England was accuſtomed to be furniſhed with horſſes, cattell, and other things, to the great profit of both the countries. About the ſame time there was an ambaſſage ſent from the king of England to the French king by the biſhop of Worceſter, the elect of Wincheſter, the abbat of Weſtminſter, the earle of Leiceſter, & Hugh Bigod earle Marſhall, with Peter de Sauoy, and Robert Walcron. The effect of their meſſage was to require reſtitution of thoſe countries, lands, cities, and townes which had bene euicted out of the hands of king Iohn and others, apperteining by right of inheritance to the king of England. Theſe lords did their meſſage, but as was thought, they had no towardlie anſwer, but rather were put off with trifling words & ſcornefull tawnts, ſo that they returned ſhortlie againe all of them, the abbat of Weſtminſter onelie excepted, who remained there behind for a fuller anſwer, not onelie to thoſe requeſts exhibited on the part of the king of England, but alſo on the behalfe of the king of Almaine. The marſhes towards Wales in this ſeaſon were brought almoſt deſert, by reaſon of the continuall wars with the Welſhmen, for what with fire & ſword, neither building nor liuing creature, nor any other thing was ſpared, that fire & ſword might bring to ruine.
